ADVERTISEMENT.

THE two former Volumes of this Collection having become extremely scarce, the Proprietors deemed it expedient to republish in ONE VOLUME, a select number of Sermons, taken from the two former, together with several others never before inserted, because not published, but calculated to obviate the Errors of the Times, and to enrich the pages of this Edition with the Piety and Wisdom of such Preachers as a HORSLEY and a PALEY.

CONTENTS.

Sermon

1. RICHARD BENTLEY, D. D. The Folly of Atheism, and (what is now called) Deism; even with respect to the present Life . . . 1

Psal. xiv. 1. The fool has said in his heart, 'There is no God; they are corrupt, they have done abominable works, there is none that doeth good.

2. ——— A Confutation of Atheism from the Origin and Frame of the World . . . 11

Acts, xiv. 15—17. That ye should turn from these vanities unto the living God, who made heaven and earth, and the sea, and all things that are therein: who in times past suffered all nations to walk in their own ways. Nevertheless, he left not himself without witness, in that he did good, and gave us rain from heaven, and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and gladness.

3. ——— The same Subject continued . . . 22

4. ——— The same Subject continued . . . 33

5. ——— Of Revelation and the Messias . . . 45

1 Pet. iii. 15. Be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you.

6. SAMUEL CLARK, D. D. Of Faith in God . . . 55

Heb. xi. 6. But without Faith it is impossible to please him; For he that cometh to God, must believe he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him.

Sermon

7. Bishop ATTERBURY. On the Incarnation of our Lord . . . 61

Mat. xi. 6. Blessed is he whosoever shall not be offended in me.

8. ——— The difficult Passages of Scripture vindicated from such Objections as are usually made to them; and proper Directions given, how we are to use them . . . 66

2 Pet. iii. 16. In which are some things hard to be understood: Which they that are unlearned and unstable wrest, as they do also the other scriptures, unto their own destruction.

9. ——— The same Subject continued . . . 72

10. ——— The same Subject continued . . . 77

11. Bishop SHERRLOCK. On the Prejudices formed, or Offences taken, against the Gospel of Jesus CHRIST . . . 82

Mat. xi. 6. Blessed is he whosoever shall not be offended in me.

12. ——— The same Subject continued . . . 86

13. ——— The same Subject concluded; . . . 91

14. ——— Salvation by Jesus Christ 94

Heb. vi. 25. Wherefore he is able also to save them to the uttermost, that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them.

CONTENTS.

Sermon

15. Bishop SHERLOCK. On the Sufferings of Christ . . . 99

Isaiah liii. 3. He is despised and rejected of men, a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief.

16. — — On the Resurrection and last Judgment . . . 104

2 Cor. v. 10, 11. We must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ, that every one may receive the things done of his body, according to that he hath done whether it be good or bad.

Knowing therefore the terrors of the Lord, we persuade men.

17. Bishop HORSLEY. On Belief in Christ . . . 113

John, xx. 29. Thomas, because thou hast seen me, thou hast believed: Blessed are they who have not seen and yet have believed.

18. JOSEPH WHITE, D.D. On the Life and Character of Christ 118

2 Cor. iv. 10. That the life also of Jesus might be made manifest.

19. Bishop PORTEUS. On the Causes of Unbelief . . . 127

John iii. 19. This is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil.

20. THOMAS LELAND, D.D. Prevalence of Infidelity no Proof nor Presumption against Christianity . . . 132

John, xii. 48. Have any of the rulers, or of the Pharisees, believed on him?

21. MATTHEW HOBBERY, D.D. The Doctrine of Divine Grace stated and explained . . . 139

John, iii. 8. The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth: so is every one that is born of the Spirit.

- — The Inspiration of the moral Parts of Scripture asserted . . . 145

2 Tim. iii. 16, 17. All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness: that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works.

- GLOUCESTER RIDLEY, LL. B.

Divinity and Personality of HOLY GHOST asserted from New Testament . . . 1.

Acts, xix. 1, 2, 3. And it came to pass that while Apollos was at Corinth, Paul having passed through the upper coasts, came to Ephesus: and finding certain disciples,

He said unto them, Have ye received the Holy Ghost since ye believed? And they said unto him, We have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost.

And he said unto them, Unow what then were ye baptized? And they said, unto John's baptism.

24. — — Why necessary to receive the Holy Ghost . . . 164

Titus, iii. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7. For we ourselves also were sometimes foolish, disobedient, deceived, serving divers lusts and pleasures, living in malice and envy, hateful and hating one another.

But after that the kindness and love of God our Saviour toward man appeared,

Not by works of righteousness, which we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us, by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost;

Which he shed on us abundantly, through Jesus Christ our Saviour:

That being justified by his grace, we should be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life.

25. — — The Means of Grace 169

Titus, iii. 4, 5, 6, 7. But after that the kindness and love of God our Saviour toward man appeared,

Not by works of righteousness, which we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us, by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost;

Which he shed on us abundantly, through Jesus Christ our Saviour:

That being justified by his grace, we should be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life.

26. — — The same Subject continued . . . 178

27. JOHN BALGUY, M.A. On the Excellence and Immortality of the Human Soul . . . 186

Eccles. xii. part of the 7th verse. And the spirit shall return unto God who gave it.

CONTENTS.

28. JOHN BALGUY, M.A. The same Subject continued . . . 191

29. WILLIAM PALEY, D.D. Seriousness in Religion indispensable above all other Dispositions . . . 197

1 Pet. — Be ye therefore, sober, and watch unto Prayer.

30. ——— On Purity of the Heart and Affections . . . 204

1 John. iii. 2, 3. Beloved, now are we the sons of God; and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is. And every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as he is pure.

31. ——— How Virtue produces Belief, and Vice Unbelief . . . 207

John. vi. 17. If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God.

32. ——— The Efficacy of the Death of Christ . . . 211

Heb. ix. 26. Now once in the end of the world hath he appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself.

33. ——— Pure Religion . . . 213

James, i. 27. Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this, To visit the fatherless and widow in their affliction, and to keep himself unpolluted from the world.

34. ——— The Agency of Jesus Christ since his Ascension . . . 216

Heb. xii. 8. Jesus Christ the same yesterday, and to day, and for ever.

35. ——— Neglect of Warnings . . . 222

Deut. xxxii. 29. Oh that they were wise, that they understood this, that they would consider their latter end!

36. ——— Preservation and Recovery from Sin . . . 225

Titus, ii. 11, 12. For the grace of God, that bringeth salvation, hath appeared unto all men, teaching us, that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world.

Sermon

[Preached March 7, 1691-2.]

The Folly of Atheism, and (what is now called) Deism; even with respect to the present Life.

PSALM xiv. 1.

The Fool hath said in his heart, There is no God; they are corrupt; they have done abominable works, there is none that doeth good.

I SHALL not now make any inquiry about the time and occasion and other circumstances of composing this Psalm: nor how it comes to pass, that with very little variation we have it twice over, both here the 140th, and again number the 53^d. Not that these and such like are not important considerations in themselves; but that I think them improper now, when we are to argue and expostulate with such persons as allow no divine authority to our text; and profess no greater, or, it may be they will say, less veneration for these sacred hymns, than for the profane songs of Anacreon or Horace. So that although I myself do really believe, that all such as say in their hearts, There is no God, are foolish and corrupt, both in understanding and will; because I see infinite wisdom itself has pronounced them to be so: nevertheless this argument would at present have no force upon these men, till in due time and method we have evinced the sufficient authority of holy scripture. But however there are other books extant, which they must needs allow of as proper evidence; even the mighty volumes of visible nature, and the everlasting tables of right reason; wherein, if they do not wilfully shut their eyes, they may read their own folly written by the finger of God, in a much plainer and more terrible sentence, than Belshazzar's was by the hand upon the wall. (Dan. v. 5.)

And as the impious principles of these persons do preclude any argumentation from the revealed work of God; so they prevent us also from speaking at present to the second part of the text. The whole verse hath apparently two propositions; the one denoting the folly of atheism, The Fool hath said in his heart, There is no God: the second declaring the corruption and flagitiousness of life which naturally attend it; They are corrupt, they have done abominable works, there is none that doeth good. Now this latter part to a genuine atheist is mere jargon, as he loves to call it; an empty sound of words without any signification. He allows no natural morality, nor any other distinction of good and evil, just and unjust, than as human institution and the modes and fashions of various countries denominate them. The most heroic actions or detestable villainies are in the nature of things indifferent to his approbation; if by secrecy they are alike concealed from rewards or punishments, from ignominy or applause. So that till we have proved in its proper place the eternal and essential difference between virtue and vice, we must forbear to urge atheists with the corruption and abominableness of their principles. But I presume, the first part of the text, the folly and sottishness of atheism, (which shall be the subject of this discourse,) will be allowed to come home to their case; since they make such a noisy pretence to wit and sagacity, and I believe several of them first engage in that labyrinth of nonsense and folly, out of an absurd and preposterous affectation of seeming wiser than their neighbours.

But before I proceed any farther, it will be necessary to clear and vindicate this expression of the Psalmist, The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God. For I know not any interpreters that will allow it to be spoken of such as flatly deny the being of God; but of them, that, believing his existence, do yet exclude him from directing the affairs of the world, from observing and judging the actions of men. I suppose they might be induced to this, from the commonly received notion of an innate idea of God, imprinted upon every soul of man at their creation, in characters that can never be defaced. Whence it will follow, that speculative atheism does only subsist in our speculation; whereas really human nature cannot be guilty of the crime: that indeed a few sensual and voluptuous persons may for a season eclipse this native light of the soul; but can never so wholly smother and extinguish it, but that at some lucid intervals it will recover itself again, and shine forth to the conviction of their consciences. And therefore they believed, that the words would not admit of a strict and rigorous interpretation; but ought to be so tempered and accommodated to the nature of things, as that they may describe those profane persons, who, though they do not, nor can really doubt in their hearts of the being of God, yet openly deny his providence in the course of their lives. Now if this be all that is meant by the text, I do not see how we can defend, not only the fitness and propriety, but the very truth of the expression. As to that natural and indelible signature of God, which human souls in their first origin are supposed to be stamped with, I shall shew at a fitter opportunity that it is a mistake, and that we have no need of it in our disputes against atheism. So that, being free from that prejudice, I interpret the words of the text in the literal acceptation, which will likewise take in the expositions of others. For I believe that the royal Psalmist in this comprehensive brevity of speech, There is no God, hath concluded all the various forms of impiety; whether such as excludes the Deity from governing the world by his providence, or judging it by his righteousness, or creating it by his wisdom and power. Because the consequence and result of all these opinions is terminated in downright atheism. For the divine inspection into the affairs of the world doth necessarily follow from the nature and being of God. And he that denies this, doth implicitly deny his existence; he may acknowledge what he will with his mouth, but in his heart he hath said, There is no God. A God, therefore a providence, was a general argument of virtuous men, and not peculiar to the Stoics alone. And again, No providence, therefore no God, was the most plausible reason, and the most frequent in the mouths of atheistical men. So that it seems to be agreed on all hands, that the existence of God and his government of the world do mutually suppose and imply one another.

There are some infidels among us, that not only disbelieve the Christian religion, but oppose the assertions of providence, of the immortality of the soul, of an universal judgment to come, and of any incorporeal essence: and yet to avoid the odious odious name of atheists, would shelter and screen themselves under a new one of deists, which is not quite so obnoxious. But I think the text hath cut them short, and precluded this subterfuge; in as much as it hath declared, that all such wicked principles are coincident and all one in the issue with the rankest atheism: The fool, that doth exempt the affairs of the world from the ordination and disposal of God, hath said in his heart, There is no God at all. It was the opinion of many of the ancients, that *Epicurus introduced a deity into his philosophy, not because he was persuaded of his existence, (for when he had brought him upon the stage of nature, he made him only mula persona and interdicted him from bearing any part in it,) but purely that he might not incur the offence of the magistrate. He was generally therefore suspected verbis reliquisse Deum, re sustulisse to have framed on purpose such a contemptible paltry hypothesis about him, as indeed left the name and title of God in the world; but nothing of his nature and power. Just as a † philosopher of our own age gave a ludicrous and fictitious notion about the rest of the earth, to evade the hard censure and usage which Galileo had lately met with. For my own part, as I do not exclude this reason from being a grand occasion of Epicurus's owning a God; so I believe that he and Democritus too were compelled to it likewise by the necessity of their own systems. For seeing they explained the phenomena of vision, imagination, and thought itself, by certain thin fleeces of atoms, that flow incessantly from the surfaces of bodies, and by their subtilty and fineness penetrate any obstacle, and yet retain the exact figures and lineaments of the several bodies from which they proceed; and in this manner insinuating themselves through the pores of human bodies into the contexture of the soul, do there excite sensation and perception of themselves: in consequence of this hypothesis they were obliged to maintain, that we could have no fancy or idea, or conception of any thing, but what did really subsist either intire or in its several parts. Whence it followed, that mankind could have no imaginations of Jupiter or Mars, or Minerva or Isis;

if there were not actually such beings in nature to emit those effluvia, which gliding into the soul must beget such imaginations. And thence it was, that those philosophers adapted their description of the deity to the vulgar apprehensions of those times; gods and goddesses innumerable, and all of human figure: because otherwise the conceptions of mankind about them could not possibly be accounted for by their physiology. So that if Epicurus and Democritus were in earnest about their philosophy, they did necessarily and really believe the existence of the gods. But then as to the nature and authority of them; they bereaved that Jupiter of his thunder and majesty: forbidding him to look or peep abroad, so much as to enquire what news in the infinite space about him; but to content himself and be happy with an eternal laziness and dozing, unless some rambling troops of atoms upon the dissolution of a neighbouring world might chance to awake him. Now because no Israelite in the days of the Psalmist is likely to have been so curious about natural knowledge, as to believe the being of a God for such a quaint and airy reason as this, when he had once boldly denied his dominion over the world; and since there is not now one infidel living, so ridiculous as to pretend to solve the phenomena of sight, fancy or cogitation, by those fleeting superficial films of bodies: I must beg leave to think, both that the fool in the text was a thorough confirmed atheist; and that the modern disguised deists do only call themselves so for the former reason of Epicurus, to decline the public odium and resentment of the magistrate; and that they cover the most arrant atheism under the mask and shadow of a deity: by which they understand no more, than some eternal inanimate matter, some universal nature, and soul of the world, void of all sense, and cogitation, so far from being endowed with infinite wisdom and goodness. And therefore in this present discourse they may deservedly come under that character which the text hath given of them, of fools that have said in their hearts, There is no God.

And now having thus far cleared our way; in the next place we shall offer some notorious proofs of the gross folly and stupidity of atheists.

If a person that had a fair estate in es-version, which in all probability he would speedily be possessed of, and of which he might reasonably promise to himself a long and happy enjoyment, should be assured by some skilful physician, that in a very short time he would inevitably fall into a disease, which would so totally deprive him of his understanding and memory, that he should lose the knowledge of all things without him, nay all consciousness and sense of his own person and being: If, I say, upon a certain belief of this indication, the man should appear overjoyed at the news, and be mightily transported with the discovery and expectation; would not all that saw him be astonished at such behaviour? Would they not be forward to conclude, that the distemper had seized him already, and even then the miserable creature was become a mere fool and an idiot? Now the carriage of our atheists or deists is infinitely more amazing than this; no dotage so infatuate, no frenzy so extravagant as theirs. They have been educated in a religion that instructed them in the knowledge of a supreme being; a spirit most excellently glorious, superlatively powerful and wise and good, creator of all things out of nothing; that hath endued the sons of men, his peculiar favourites, with a rational spirit, and hath placed them as spectators in this noble theatre of the world, to view and applaud these glorious scenes of earth and heaven, the workmanship of his hands; that hath furnished them in general with a sufficient store of all things, either necessary or convenient for life; and particularly to such as fear and obey him, hath promised a supply of all wants, a deliverance and protection from all dangers: that they that seek him, shall want no manner of thing that is good. Psal. xxiv. 9. Who besides his munificence to them in this life; hath so loved the world, that he sent his only begotten son (John, iii. 16.) the express image of his substance, and partaker of his eternal nature and glory, to bring life and immortality to light (2 Tim. i. 10.), and to tender them to mankind upon fair and gracious terms; that if they submit to his easy yoke, and light burden (Matth. xi. 30.), and observe his commandments which are not grievous (1 John, v. 3.) he then gives them the promise of eternal salvation (Heb. v. 9.) he hath reserved for them in heaven an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away (1 Pet. i. 4.); he hath prepared for them an unspeakable, unconceivable perfection of joy and bliss, things that eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man. (1 Cor. ii. 9.) What a delightful and ravishing hypothesis of religion is this? And in this religion they have had their education. Now let us suppose some great professor in atheism to suggest to some of these men, that all this is mere dream and imposture; that there is no such excellent being, as they suppose, that created and preserves them; that all about them is dark senseless matter, driven on by the blind impulses of fatality and fortune; that men first sprung up like mushrooms, out of the mud and slime of the earth; and that all their thoughts, and the whole of what they call soul, are only various action and repercussion of small particles of matter, kept awhile a moving by some mechanism and clock-work, which finally must cease and perish by death. If it be true then (as we daily find it is) that men listen with complacency to these horrid suggestions; if they let go their hope of everlasting life with willingness and joy; if they entertain the thoughts of final perdition with exultation and triumph; ought they not to be esteemed most notorious *fools, even destitute of common sense, and abandoned to a callousness and numbness of soul?

What, then, is heaven itself, with its pleasures for evermore (2 Tim. iv. 8.), to be parted with so unconcernedly? Is a crown of righteousness, a crown of life, (Jam. i. 12.) to be surrendered with laughter? is an exceeding and eternal weight of glory (2 Cor. iv. 17.) too light in the balance against the hopeless death of the atheist, and utter extinction? It was a noble saying of the emperor Marcus, That he would not endure to live one day in the world, if he did not believe it to be under the government of providence. Let us but imagine that excellent person confuted and satisfied by some Epicurean of his time; that all was but atoms, and vacuum, and necessity, and chance. Would he have been so pleased and delighted with the conviction? would he have so triumphed in being overcome? or rather, as he hath told us, would he not have gone down with sorrow and despair to the grave? Did I but once see an atheist lament and bewail himself; that upon a strict and impartial examination he had found to his cost, that all was a mistake; that the prerogative of human nature was vanished and gone; those glorious hopes of immortality and bliss, nothing but cheating joys and pleasant delusions; that he had undone himself by losing the comfortable error, and would give all the world to have better arguments for religion; there would be great hopes of prevailing upon such an atheist as this. But, alas! there are none of them of this temper of mind; there are none that understand and seek after God (Psal. xiv. 2.); they have no knowledge (ver. 4.), nor any desire of it; they thrust the word of God from them, and judge themselves unworthy of everlasting life, (Acts xiii. 46.); they willingly prefer darkness before light, and obstinately chuse to perish for ever in the grave, rather than be heirs of salvation in the resurrection of the just. These certainly are the fools in the text, indocile, intractable fools, whose stolidity can baffle all arguments, and be proof against demonstration itself; whose end (as the words of St. Paul do truly describe them) whose end and very hope is destruction, an eternal deprivation of being; whose God is their belly, the gratification of sensual lusts; whose glory is in their shame, in the debasing of mankind to the condition of beasts; who mind earthly things (Phil. iii. 19.), who if (like that great apostle) they were caught up to the third heaven (2 Cor. xii. 2.), would (as the spies did of Canaan) bring down an evil report (Num. xiii. 32.) of those regions of bliss. And I fear, unless it please God by extraordinary methods to help their unbelief (Mar. ix. 24.), and enlighten the eyes of their understanding (Eph. i. 18.); they will carry their atheism with them to the pit; and the flames of hell only must convince them of their error.

This supine and inconsiderate behaviour of the atheists is so extremely absurd, that it would be deemed incredible, if it did not occur to our daily observation; it proclaims aloud that they are not led astray by their reasoning, but led captive by their lusts to the denial of God. When the very pleasures of paradise are contemned and trampled on, like pigs cast before swine, there is small hope of reclaiming them by arguments of reason. But

however, as Solomon adviseth, we will answer these fools not according to their folly, lest we also be like unto them (Prov. xxvi. 4.). It is expedient that we put to silence the ignorance of these foolish men, that believers may be the more confirmed and more resolute in the faith.

Did religion bestow heaven without any terms or conditions indifferently upon all; if the crown of life was hereditary, and free to good and bad; and not settled by covenant upon the elect of God only; such as live soberly and righteously and godly in this present world (Tit. ii. 12.): I believe there would be no such thing as an infidel among us. And without controversy it is the way and means of attaining to heaven, that makes profane scorners so willingly let go the expectation of it. It is not the articles of the creed, but the duty to God and their neighbour, that is such an inconsistent incredible legend. They will not practise the rules of religion, and therefore they cannot believe the promises and rewards of it.

But, however, let us suppose them to have acted like rational and serious men; and perhaps upon a diligent inquisition they have found, that the hope of immortality deserves to be joyfully quitted, and that either out of interest, or necessity.

1, And first, One may conceive indeed, how there might possibly be a necessity of quitting it. It might be tied to such terms, as would render it impossible ever to be obtained. For example, if it should be required of all the candidates of glory and immortality, to give a full and knowing assent to such things as are repugnant to common sense, as contradict the usual injury, the universal notions and indubitable maxims of reason; if they were to believe, that one and the same thing may be and not be at the same time and in the same respect; if allowing the received ideas and denominations of numbers and figures and body, they must seriously affirm, that two and two do make a dozen, or that the diameter of a circle is as long as the circumference, or that the same body may be all of it in distant places at once; I must confess that the offers of happiness upon such articles of belief as these, would be mere tantalizing of rational creatures; and the kingdom of heaven would become the inheritance of only idiots and fools. For whilst a man of common capacity doth think and reflect upon such propositions, he cannot possibly bribe his understanding to give a verdict for their truth. So that he would be quite frustrated of the hope of reward, upon such unpracticable conditions as these: neither could he have any evidence of the reality of the promise, superior to what he is conscious to of the falsity of the means. Now if any atheist can shew me in the system of Christian religion any such absurdities and repugnances to our natural faculties; I will either evince them to be interpolations and corruptions of the faith, or yield myself a captive and a proselyte to his infidelity.

II. Or, 2dly, they may think it is the interest of mankind, that there should be no heaven at all: because the labour to acquire it is more worth than the purchase: God almighty (if there be one) having much overvalued the blessings of his presence. So that upon a fair estimation, it is a greater advantage to take one's swing in sensuality, and have a glut of voluptuousness in this life, freely resigning all pretences to future happiness; which, when a man is once extinguished by death, he cannot be supposed either to want or desire; than to be tied up by commandments and rules so contrary to flesh and blood; to take up one's cross, to deny himself (Mark, viii. 31.), and refuse the satisfaction of natural desires. This indeed is the true language of atheism, and the cause of it too. Were not this at the bottom, no man in his wits could condemn and ridicule the expectation of immortality. Now what power or influence can religion have upon the minds of these men; while not only their affections and lusts, but their supposed interest, shall plead against it? But if we can once silence this powerful advocate, we shall without much difficulty carry the cause at the bar of impartial reason.

Now here is a notorious instance of the folly of atheists, that while they repudiate all title to the kingdom of heaven, merely for the present pleasure of body, and their boasted tranquillity of mind: besides the extreme madness in running such a desperate hazard after death, (which I will not now treat of,) they deprive themselves here of that very pleasure and tranquillity they seek for. For I shall now endeavour to shew, That religion itself gives us the greatest delights and advantages even in this life also, though there should prove in the event to be no resurrection to another. Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace (Prov. iii. 17.).

But before I begin that, I must occur to one specious objection both against this proposition and the past part of my discourse; namely, that religion doth perpetually haunt and disquiet us with dismal apprehensions of everlasting burnings in hell; and that there is no shelter or refuge from those fears, but behind the principles of atheism.

(1.) First, therefore, I will freely acknowledge to the atheist, that some part of what hath been said is not directly conclusive against them; if they say, that before they revolted from the faith, they had sinned away all expectation of ever arriving at heaven: and consequently had good reason so joyfully to receive the news of annihilation by death, as an advantageous change for the everlasting torments of the damned. But because I cannot expect, that they will make such a shameless and senseless confession, and supply us with that invincible argument against themselves: I must say again, that to prefer final extinction before a happy immortality, does declare the most deplorable stupidity of mind. Nay, although they should confess, that they believed themselves to be reprobates, before they disbelieved religion; and took atheism as a sanctuary and refuge from the terrors of hell; yet still the imputation of folly will stick upon them: in as much as they chose atheism as an opiate to still those frightening apprehensions, by inducing a dulness and lethargy of mind; rather than they would make use of that active and salutary medicine, a hearty repentance; that they did not know the riches of the goodness and forbearance and long suffering of God (Rom. ii. 4.), and that a sincere amendment of life was never too late, Jesus Christ being the saviour of all men (1 Tim. iv. 10.), and a propitiation for the sins of the whole world (1 Joh. v. 14.); who came into the world to save sinners, even the chief of them all (1 Tim. i. 15.); and died for the ungodly, and his bitterest enemies (Rom. v. 6—10.).

(2.) And secondly, As to the fears of damnation; those terrors are not to be charged upon religion itself, which proceed either from the want of religion, or superstitious mistakes about it. For as an honest and innocent man doth know the punishments, which the laws of his country denounce against felons and murderers and traitors, without being terrified or concerned at them: So a Christian in truth as well as in name, though he believe the consuming vengeance prepared for the disobedient and unbelievers, is not at all dismayed at the apprehensions of it. Indeed it adds spurs, and gives wings to his diligence, it excites him to work out his salvation with fear and trembling (Phil. ii. 12.); a religious and ingenuous fear, that is tempered with hope and with love and unspeakable joy. But he knows, that if he fears him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell (Matth. x. 28.), he needs not fear that is own soul or body shall ever go thither.

I allow that some debauched and profligate wretches, or some designing perfidious hypocrites, that are religious in outward profession, but corrupt and abominable in their works, are most justly as well as usually liable to these horrors of mind. It is not my business to defend or excuse such as these; I must leave them, as long as they keep their hardness and impenitent hearts, to those gnawing and excruciating fears, those whips of the divine Nemesis, that frequently scourge even atheists themselves. For the atheists also can never wholly extinguish those horrible forebodings of conscience. They endeavour indeed to compose and charm their fears, but a thousand occasions daily awaken the sleeping tormentors. Any slight consideration either of themselves, or of any thing without; whatsoever they think on, or whatsoever they look on; all administer some reasons for suspicion and diffidence, lest POSSIBLY THEY MAY BE IN THE WRONG; and then it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God (Heb. x. 31.): There are they in great fear, as it is in the 5th verse of this psalm, under terrible presages of judgment and fiery indignation. (Heb. x. 27.) Neither can they say, that these terrors, like tales about spectres, may disturb some small pretenders and puny novices, but dare not approach the vere adepts, the masters and rabbies of atheism. For it is well known both from ancient and modern experience, that the very boldest of them, out of their debauches and company, when they chanced to be surprised with solitude or sickness, are the most suspicious and timorous and despondent wretches in the world: and that the boasted happy atheist in the indolence of body, and an undisturbed calm and serenity of mind, is altogether as rare a creature, as the vir sapiens was among the stoics; whom they often met with in idea and description, in harangues and in books, but freely owned that he never had or was like to exist actually in nature.

And now as to the present advantages which we owe to religion, they are very conspicuous; whether we consider mankind, (1.) separately, or (2.) under society and government.

1. And first, in a single capacity. How is a good Christian animated and cheered by a stedfast belief of the promises of the gospel; of an everlasting enjoyment of perfect felicity, such as after millions of millions of ages is still youthful and flourishing and inviting as at the first? no wrinkles in the face, no grey hairs on the head of eternity; no end, no diminution, no satiety of those delights. What a warm and vigorous influence does a religious heart feel from a firm expectation of these glories? Certainly this hope alone is of inestimable value; it is a kind of anticipation and pledge of those joys; and at least gives him one heaven upon earth, though the other should prove a delusion. Now what are the mighty promises of atheism in competition with these? let us know the glorious recompences it proposes: utter extinction and cessation of being; to be reduced to the same condition, as if we had never been born. O dismal reward of infidelity! at which nature does shrink and shiver with horror! What some of the learnedest † Doctors among the Jews have esteemed the most dreadful of all punishments, and have assigned for the portion of the blackest criminals of the damned; so interpreting Tophet, Abaddon, the vale of slaughter, and the like, for final excision and deprivation of being: this atheism exhibits to us, as an equivalent to heaven. It is well known, what hath been disputed among schoolmen to this effect. And it is an observation of Plutarch, * that the generality of mankind, πάντες καὶ ἄνθρωποι, as well women as men, chose rather to endure all the punishments of hell, as described by the poets; than part with the hope of immortality, though immortal only in misery. I easily grant, that this would be a very hard bargain; and that, not to be at all, is more eligible, than to be miserable always: our Saviour himself having determined the question; Wo to that man, by whom the son of man is betrayed; good were it for that man, if he had never been born (Matth. xxvi. 24.) But however thus much it evidently shews, that this desire of immortality is a natural affection of the soul; it is self-preservation in the highest and truest meaning; it is interwoven in the very frame and constitution of man. How then can the atheist reflect on his own hypothesis without extreme sorrow and dejection of spirit? Will he say, that when once he is dead, this desire will be nothing: and that he that is not, cannot lament his annihilation? So indeed it would be hereafter, according to his principles. But nevertheless, for the present, while he continues in life (which we now speak of) that dusky scene of horror, that melancholy prospect of final perdition will frequently occur to his fancy; the sweetest enjoyments of life will often become flat and insipid, will be damped and extinguished, be bittered and poisoned by the malignant and venomous quality of this opinion.

Is it not more comfortable to a man, to think well of himself, to have a high value and conceit of the dignity of his nature, to believe a noble origination of his race, the offspring and image of the great king of glory: rather than that men first proceeded, as vermin are thought to do, by the sole influence of the sun out of dirt and putrefaction?

Is it not a firmer foundation for contentment and tranquillity, to believe that all things were at first created, and are since continually ordered and disposed for the best, and that principally for the benefit and pleasure of man: than that the whole universe is mere bungling and blundering; no art or contrivance to be seen in it; nothing effected for any purpose and design; but all ill-favourably cobbled and jumbled together by the unguided agitation and rude shuffles of matter?

Can any man wish a better support under affliction, than the friendship and favour of omnipotence, of infinite wisdom and goodness; that is both able and willing, and knows how to relieve him? Such a man can do all things through Christ that strengtheneth him (Phil. ix. 13.) he can patiently suffer all things with cheerful submission and resignation to the divine will. He has a secret spring of spiritual joy, and the continual feast of a good conscience within, that forbid him to be miserable. But what a forlorn destitute creature is the atheist in distress? He hath no friend in extremity, but poison or a dagger, or a halter or a precipice. A violent death is the last refuge of the Epicureans, as well as the Stoics. This says Lucretius, is the distinguishing character of a genuine son of our sect, that he will not endure to live in exile, and want and disgrace, out of a vain fear of death; but dispatch himself resolutely into the state of eternal sleep and insensibility. And yet for all this swaggering, not one of a hundred of them hath boldness enough to follow the direction. The base and degenerate saying of one of them is very well known, † That life is always sweet, and he should still desire to prolong it; though, after he had been maimed and distorted by the rack, he should lastly be condemned to hang on a gibbet.

And then, as to the practical rules and duties of religion: as the miracles of our Lord are peculiarly eminent above the lying wonders of dæmons, in that they were not made out of vain ostentation of power, and to raise unprofitable amazement; but for the real benefit and advantage of men, by feeding the hungry, healing all sorts of diseases, ejecting of devils, and reviving the dead: so likewise the commands which he hath imposed on his followers are not like the absurd ceremonies of pagan idolatry, the frivolous rites of their initiations and worship, that might look like incantation and magic, but had no tendency in their nature to make mankind the happier. Our Saviour hath enjoined us a reasonable service (Rom. xii. 1.); accommodated to the rational part of our nature. All his laws are in themselves,

abstracted from any consideration of recompence, conducting to the temporal interest of them that observe them. For what can be more availing to a man's health, or his credit, or estate, or security in this world, than charity and meekness, than sobriety and temperance, than honesty and diligence in his calling? Do not pride and arrogance infallibly meet with contempt? Do not contentiousness and cruelty and study of revenge seldom fail of retaliation? Are not envious and covetous, discontented and anxious minds tormentors to themselves? Do not we see, that slothful and intemperate and incontinent persons destroy their bodies with diseases, their reputation with disgrace, and their families with want? Are adultery and fornication forbidden only by Moses and Christ? or do not heathen lawgivers punish such enormities with fines or imprisonment, with exile or death? It was an objection of * Julian the apostate, that there were no new precepts of morality in our religion: Thou shalt not kill, Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's wife. Why all the world, says he, is agreed about these commandments; and in every country under heaven, there are laws and penalties made to enforce all the ten, excepting only the Sabbath and the worship of strange gods. We can answer him another way; but he may make our infidels ashamed to complain of those ordinances as hard impositions, which the sense of all nations has thought to be reasonable: which not only the philosophers of Greece and Italy and the learned world, but the banians of Mogul, the talapoins of Siam, the mandarins of China, the moralists of Peru and Mexico, all the wisdom of mankind have declared to be necessary duties. Nay, if the atheists would but live up to the ethics of Epicurus himself, they would make few or no proselytes from the Christian religion. For none revolt from the faith for such things as are thought peculiar to christianity; not because they must love and pray for their enemies (Matth. v. 44.), but because they must not poison or stab them; not because they must not look upon a woman to lust after her (ver. 28.), but because they are much more restrained from committing the act. If wanton glances and lascivious thoughts had been permitted by the gospel, and only the gross act forbidden; they would have apostatized nevertheless. This we may conjecture from what † Plato and others have told us, that it was commonly ἀνέχοντες τὴν κατὰ τὴν φύσιν ἐπιθυμίαν, (immoderate affections and lusts), that in the very times of paganism induced men to be atheists. It seems their impure and brutal sensuality was too much confined by the religion of those countries, where even Venus and Bacchus had their temples. Let not therefore voluptuous atheists lay all the fault of their sins upon the infirmity of human nature; nor plead that flesh and blood cannot resist those temptations which have all their force and prevalence from long custom and inveterate habit. What enticement, what pleasure is there in common profane swearing? yet neither the fear of God nor of the law will persuade men to leave it. It is prevailing example that hath now made it fashionable, but it hath not always been so, nor will be hereafter. So other epidemical vices, they are rife and predominant only for a season, and must not be ascribed to human nature in the lump. In some countries intemperance is a necessary part of conversation; in others sobriety is a virtue universal, without any respect to the duties of religion. Nor can they say, that this is only the difference of climate, that inclines one nation to concupiscence and sensual pleasures; another to blood-thirstiness and desire of revenge. It would discover great ignorance in history, not to know that in all climates a whole people has been over-run with some recently invented or newly imported kind of vice, which their grandfathers never knew. In the latest accounts of the country of Guiana, we are told that the eating of human flesh is the beloved pleasure of those savages: two nations of them by mutual devouring are reduced to two handfuls of men. When the gospel of our Saviour was preached to them they received it with gladness of heart; they could be brought to forego plurality of wives: though that be the main impediment to the conversion of the East Indies. But the great stumbling block with these Americans, and the only rock of offence, was the forbidding them to eat their enemies: that irresistible temptation made them quickly to revolt and relapse into their infidelity. What must we impute this to? to the temperature of the air, to the nature of the soil, to the influence of the stars? Are these barbarians of man-eating constitutions, that they so hanker after this inhuman diet, which we cannot imagine without horror? Is not the same thing practised in other parts of that continent? Was it not so in Europe of old, and is it not now so in Africa? If an eleventh Commandment had been given, Thou shalt not eat human flesh; would not these cannibals have esteemed it more difficult than all the ten? And would not they have really had as much reason as our atheists, to plead the power of the temptation, and the propensity of flesh and blood? How impudent then are the atheists, that traduce the easy and gracious conditions of the gospel, as unreasonable and tyrannical impositions? Are not God's ways equal, O ye children of destruction, and are not your ways unequal?

II. Secondly and lastly, For the good influence of religion upon communities and governments, habemus confiteles reos; it is so apparent and unquestionable, that it is one of the objections of the atheist, that it was first contrived and introduced by politicians, to bring the wild and straggling herds of mankind under subjection and laws. Out of thy own mouth shalt thou be judged, thou wicked servant (Luke xix. 22.) Thou wisest that the wise institutors of government, souls elevated above the ordinary pitch of men, thought religion necessary to civil obedience. Why then dost thou endeavour to undermine this foundation, to undo this cement of society, and to reduce all once again to thy imaginary state of nature, and original confusion? No community ever was or can be begun or maintained, but upon the basis of religion. What government can be imagined without judicial proceedings? and what methods of judicature without a religious oath? which implies and supposes an omniscient being, as conscious to its falsehood or truth, and a revenger of perjury. So that the very nature of an oath (and therefore of society also) is subverted by the atheist; who professeth to acknowledge nothing superior to himself, no omnipresent observer of the actions of men. For an atheist to compose a system of politics is as absurd and ridiculous, as Epicurus's sermons were about † sanctity and religious worship. But there was hope, that the doctrine of absolute uncontrollable power and the formidable name of Leviathan might flatter and bribe the government into a toleration of infidelity. We need have no recourse to notions and supposition; we have sad experience and convincing example before us, what a rare constitution of government may be had in a whole nation of atheists. The natives of ‡ Newfoundland and New France in America, as they are said to live without any sense of religion, so they are known to be destitute of its advantages and blessings; without any law or form of community; without any literature or sciences or arts: no towns, no fixed habitations, no agriculture, no navigation. And it is entirely owing to the power of religion, that the whole world is not at this time as barbarous as they. And yet I ought not to have called these miserable wretches a nation of atheists. They cannot be said to be of the atheist's opinion; because they have no opinion at all in the matter; They do not say in their hearts, There is no God; for they never once deliberated, if there was one or no. They no more deny the existence of a deity; than they deny the Antipodes, the Copernican system, or the Satellites of Jovis; about which they have had no notion or conception at all. It is the ignorance of those poor creatures, and not their impiety; their ignorance as much to be pitied, as the impiety of the atheists to be detested and punished. It is of mighty importance to the government to put some timely stop to the spreading contagion of this pestilence that walketh by day, that dares to disperse its cursed seeds and principles in the face of the sun. The fool in the text had only said in his heart, There is no God: he had not spoken it aloud, nor openly blasphemed, in places of public resort. There is too much reason to fear, that some of all orders of men, even magistracy itself, have taken the infection: a thing of dreadful consequence and most imminent danger. § Epicurus was somewhat wiser than ordinary, when he so earnestly advised his disciples against med-

dling in public affairs: He knew the nature and tendency of his own philosophy; that it would soon become suspected and odious to a government, if ever atheists were employed in places of trust. But because he had made one great rule superior to all, That every man's only good was pleasure of body and contentment of mind; hence it was that men of ambitious and turbulent spirits, that were dissatisfied and uneasy with privacy and retirement, were allowed by his own principle to engage in matters of state. And there they generally met with that fortune, which their master foresaw. Several cities of * Greece that had made experiment of them in public concerns, drove them out, as incendiaries and pests of commonweals, by severe edicts and proclamations. Atheism is by no means tolerable in the most private condition: but if it aspire to authority and power; if it acquire the command of an army or a navy; if it get upon the bench or into the senate, or on a throne: What then can be expected, but the basest cowardice and treachery, but the foulest prevarication in justice, but betraying and selling the rights and liberties of a people, but arbitrary government and tyrannical oppression? Nay, if atheism were once, as I may say, the national religion; it would make its own followers the most miserable of men: it would be the kingdom of Satan divided against itself; and the land would be soon brought to desolation. † Josephus, who knew them, hath informed us, that the Sadducees, those Epicureans among the Jews, were not only rough and cruel to men of a different sect from their own; but perfidious and inhuman one towards another. This is the genuine spirit and the natural product of atheism. No man that adheres to that narrow and selfish principle, can ever be just or generous or grateful; ‡ unless he be sometime overcome by good nature and a happy constitution. No atheist, as such, can be a true friend, an affectionate relation, or a loyal subject. The appearance and show of mutual amity among them, is wholly owing to the smallness of their number, and to the obligations of a faction. It is like the friendship of pickpockets and highwaymen, that are said to observe strict justice among themselves, and never to defraud a comrade of his share of the booty. But if we could imagine a whole nation to be cutpurses and robbers; would there then be kept that square dealing and equity in such a monstrous den of thieves? And if atheism should be supposed to become universal in this nation, (which seems to be designed and endeavoured, though we know the gates of hell shall not be able to prevail, farewell all ties of friendship and principles of honour; all love for our country and loyalty to our prince; nay, farewell all government and society itself, all professions and arts, and conveniences of life, all that is laudable or valuable in the world.

May the Father of mercies and God of infinite wisdom reduce the foolish from their errors, and make them wise unto salvation; convert the sceptical and wavering minds, and so prevent us, that stand fast, in all our doings, and further us with his continual help, that we may not be of them that draw back unto perdition, but of them that believe to the saving of the soul. Amen.

SERMON II.

By RICHARD BENTLEY, D.D.

[Preached October the 3d, 1692.]

A Confutation of Atheism from the Origin and Frame of the World.

ACTS xiv. 15—17.

That ye should turn from these vanities unto the living God, who made heaven and earth, and the sea, and all things that are therein: who in times past suffered all nations to walk in their own ways. Nevertheless, he left not himself without witness, in that he did good, and gave us rain from heaven, and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and gladness.

ALL the arguments that can be brought, or can be demanded, for the existence of God, may, perhaps not absurdly, be reduced to three general heads: the first of which will include all the proofs from the vital and intelligent portions of the universe, the organical bodies of the various animals, and the immaterial souls of men. Which living and understanding substances, as they make incomparably the most considerable and noble part of the naturally known and visible creation; so they do the most clearly and cogently demonstrate to philosophical enquirers the necessary self existence, and omnipotent power, and unsearchable wisdom, and boundless beneficence of their Maker. This first topic therefore was very fitly and divinely made use of by our Apostle in his conference with philosophers and that inquisitive people of Athens : the latter Chap. xvii. 2.) spending their time in nothing else, but either to tell or hear some new thing ; and the other, in nothing, but to call in question the most evident truths that were delivered and received of old. And these arguments we have hitherto pursued in their utmost latitude and extent. So that now we shall proceed to the second head, or the proofs of a Deity from the inanimate part of the world ; since even natural reason, as well as holy Scripture, assures us, (Psal. xix. 1.) that the heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament sheweth his handy-work ; (Jer. li. 15.) that he made the earth by his power, he hath established the world by his wisdom, and hath stretched out the heaven by his understanding ; (Psal. cxlviii. 5, 6.) that he commanded, and they were created ; he hath also established them for ever and ever ; (Psal. cxlvii. 8.) he covereth the heaven with clouds, he prepareth rain for the earth, (Psal. lxxv. 11.) he crowneth the year with his goodness.

These reasons for God's existence, from the frame and system of the world, as they are equally true with the former, so they have always been more popular and plausible to the illiterate part of mankind ; inasmuch as the * Epicureans, and some others, have observed, that men's contemplating the most ample arch of the firmament, the innumerable multitude of the stars, the regular rising and setting of the sun, the periodical and constant vicissitudes of day and night, and seasons of the year, and the other affections of meteors and heavenly bodies, was the principal and almost only ground and occasion that the notion of a God came first into the world : making no mention of the former proof from the frame of human nature, that in God we live, and move, and have our being. Which argument being so natural and internal to mankind, doth nevertheless (I know not how) seem more remote and obscure to the generality of men ; who are readier to fetch a reason from the immense distance of the starry heavens and the outmost walls of the world, than seek one at home, within themselves, in their own faculties and constitutions. So that hence we may perceive how prudently that was waved, and the second here insisted on by St. Paul to the rude and simple semi-barbarians of Lycaonia : he left not himself without witness, in that he did good, and gave us rain from heaven, and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and gladness. Which words we shall now interpret in a large and free acceptance ; so that this second theme may comprehend all the brute inanimate matter of the universe, as the former comprised all visible creatures in the world, that have understanding, or sense, or vegetable life. These two arguments are the voices of nature, the unanimous suffrages of all real beings and substances created, that are naturally knowable without revelation. And if, lastly, in the third place, we can evince the divine existence from the adjuncts and circumstances of human life ; if we find in all ages, in all civilized nations, an universal belief and worship of a divinity ; if we find many unquestionable records of supernatural and miraculous effects ; if we find many faithful relations of prophecies punctually accomplished ; of prophecies so well attested, above the suspicion of falsehood ; so remote, and particular, and unlikely to come to pass, beyond the possibility of good guessing, or the mere foresight of human wisdom : if we find a most warrantable tradition, that at sundry times and in divers manners God spake unto mankind by his Prophets, and by his Son, and his Apostles, who have deli- vered to us in sacred writings a clearer revelation of his divine nature and will; if, I say, this third topic from human testimony be found agreeable to the standing vote and attestation of nature, what further proofs can be demanded or desired? What fuller evidence can our adversaries require, since all the classes of known beings are summoned to appear? Would they have us bring more witnesses than the all of the world? and will they not stand to the grand verdict and determination of the universe? They are incurable infidels, that persist to deny a Deity; when all creatures in the world, as well spiritual as corporeal, all from human race to the lowest of insects, from the cedar of Libanus to the moss upon the wall, from the vast globes of the sun and planets to the smallest particles of dust, do declare their absolute dependance upon the first author and fountain of all being, and motion, and life, the only eternal and self-existent God; with whom inhabit all majesty, and wisdom, and goodness, for ever and ever.

But, before I enter upon this argument from the origin and frame of the world; it will not be amiss to premise some particulars that may serve for an illustration of the text, and be a proper introduction to the following discourses.

As the Apostles, Barnabas and Paul, were preaching the Gospel at (Acts xiv. 8.) Lystra, a city of Lycaonia in Asia the Less, among the rest of their auditors there was a lame cripple from his birth, whom Paul commanded with a loud voice, to stand upright on his feet; and immediately by a miraculous energy he leaped and walked. Let us compare the present circumstances with those of my former text, and observe the remarkable difference in the Apostle's proceedings. No question but there were several cripples at Athens, so very large and populous a city; and, if that could be dubious, I might add, that the very climate disposed the inhabitants to impotency in the feet: (Lucret. lib. vi.) Atthide tentantur gressus, oculique in Achæis Finibus—are the words of Lucretius; which it is probable he transcribed from Epicurus, a Gargettian and native of Athens, and therefore an unquestionable evidence in a matter of this nature: Neither is it likely that all the Athenian cripples should escape the sight of St. Paul, (Ver. 17.) since he disputed there in the market daily with them that met him. How comes it to pass then, that we do not hear of a like miracle in that city; which one would think might have greatly conduced to the Apostle's design, and have converted, or at least confuted and put to silence, the Epicureans and Stoics? But it is not difficult to give an account of this seeming disparity, if we attend to the qualifications of the lame person at Lystra; whom Paul stedfastly beholding, and (Ver. 9.) perceiving that he had FAITH to be healed, said with a loud voice, Stand upright on thy feet. This is the necessary condition that was always required by our Saviour and his Apostles: (Luke xviii. 42.) And Jesus said unto the blind man, Receive thy sight, thy FAITH hath saved thee; and to the woman that had the issue of blood, (Luke viii. 48.) Daughter, be of good comfort; thy FAITH hath made thee whole: go in peace. It was want of FAITH in our Saviour's countrymen, which hindered him from shedding among them the salutary emanations of his divine virtue; (Matt. xiii. 58.) And he did not many mighty works there, because of their unbelief. There were many diseased persons in his own country, but very few that were rightly disposed for a supernatural cure. St. Mark hath a very observable expression upon the same occasion: (Mark vi. 5.) And he could do no mighty works there, save that he laid his hands upon a few sick folk, and healed them. καὶ ἐκ τῆς ἡλιότητος οὐκ ἔδυνάμην ποιεῖν αὐτοῖς. We read in St. Luke, ch. v. 17. And the POWER (δύναμις) of the Lord was present to heal them. And, chap. vi. ver. 19. And the whole multitude sought to touch him: for there went virtue (δύναμις) out of him, and healed them all. Now since δύναμις and ἰσχύς are words of the same root, and signification, shall we so interpret the Evangelist, as if our Saviour had not power to work miracles among his unbelieving countrymen? This is the passage which that impious and impure Atheist (Vanini Dial. p. 459.) Lucilio Vanino singled out for his text in his pretended and mock apology for the Christian religion; wickedly insinuating, as if the prodigies of Christ were mere impostures and acted by confederacy: and therefore, where the spectators were incredulous, and consequently watchful and suspicious, and not easily imposed on, he could do no mighty work there; there his arm was shortened, and his power and virtue too feeble for such supernatural effects. But the gross absurdity of this suggestion is no less conspicuous than the villainous blasphemy of it. For, can it be credible to any rational person, that St. Mark could have that meaning? that he should tax his Lord and Saviour, whom he knew to be God Almighty, with deficiency of power? He could do no mighty works; that is, he would do none, because of their unbelief. There is a frequent change of those words in all languages of the world. And we may appeal with * St. Chrysostom to the common custom of speech, whatever country we live in. This therefore is the genuine sense of that expression; Christ would not heal their infirmities, because of the hardness and slowness of their hearts, in that they believed him not. And I think there is not one instance in all the history of the New Testament of a miracle done for any one's sake, that did not believe Jesus to be a good person, and sent from God; and had not a disposition of heart fit to receive his doctrine. (See John, ch. ix. and Matth. xvi. 14.) For to believe he was the Messiah and Son of God, was not then absolutely necessary, nor rigidly exacted; the most signal of the prophecies being not yet fulfilled by him, till his passion and resurrection. But, as I said, to obtain a miracle from him, it was necessary to believe him a good person, and sent from God. (Luke xxiii. 8.) Herod therefore hoped in vain to have seen some miracle done by him: (Mark viii. 11, 12.) and when the Pharisees sought of him a sign from heaven, tempting him, they received this disappointing answer, Verily I say unto you, There shall no sign be given to this generation. And we may observe in the Gospels, that where the persons themselves were incapable of actual faith; (Matt. xvii. 15. xv. 22. Luke viii. 4.) yet the friends and relations of those dead that were raised again to life, of those lunatics and demoniacs that were restored to their right minds, were such as sought after him and believed on him. (Luke xxii. 52.) And, as to the healing of Malchus's ear, it was a peculiar and extraordinary case: for, though the person was wholly unworthy of so gracious a cure, yet in the account of the meek Lamb of God it was a kind of injury done to him by the fervidness of St. Peter, who knew not yet what spirit he was of, and that his Master's kingdom was not of this world. But, besides this obvious meaning of the words of the Evangelist, there may perhaps be a sublimer sense couched under the expression. For in the divine nature will and can are frequently the selfsame thing; and freedom and necessity, that are opposites here below, do in heaven above most amicably agree and join hands together. And this is not a restraint or impotency, but the royal prerogative of the most absolute King of Kings; that he wills to do nothing but what he can, and that he can do nothing which is repugnant to his divine wisdom and essential goodness. God cannot do what is unjust, nor say what is untrue, nor promise with a mind to deceive. Our Saviour therefore could do no mighty work in a country of unbelievers, because it was not fit and reasonable. And so we may say of our Apostle, who was acted by the spirit of God; that he could do no miracle at Athens, and that because of their unbelief. There is a very sad and melancholy account of the success of his stay there. * Howbeit CERTAIN men clave unto him, and believed; a more diminutive expression, than if they had been called a few. And we do not find, that he ever visited this city again, as he did several others, where there were a competent number of disciples. And indeed if we consider the genius and condition of the Athenians at that time, how vicious and corrupt they were; how conceited of their own wit, and science, and politeness, as if they had invented corn and oil, and distributed them to the world; * and had first taught civility and learning; and religion, and laws to the rest of mankind; how they were puffed up with the fulsome flatteries of their philosophers, and sophists, and poets of the stage; we cannot much wonder, that they should so little regard an unknown stranger, that preached unto them an unknown God.

I am aware of an objection, that, for aught we can now affirm, St. Paul might have done several miracles at Athens, though they be not related by St. Luke. I confess I am far from asserting, that all the (See John xxi. 25. and 2 Cor. xii. 12.) miracles of our Saviour are recorded in the Gospels, or of his Apostles in the Acts. But nevertheless, in the present circumstances, I think we may conjecture, that, if any prodigy and wonder had been performed by our Apostle among those curious and pragmatical Athenians, it would have had such a consequence, as might have deserved some place in sacred history, as well as this before us at Lystra; (Acts xiv. 11.) where, when the people saw what Paul had done, they lift up their voices, saying in the speech of Lycaonia, The gods are come down to us in the likeness of men; and the priests came with oxen and garlands, and would have sacrificed to them, as to Jupiter and Mercurius. That this was a common opinion among the Gentiles, that the gods sometimes assumed human shape, and conversed upon earth as strangers and travellers, must needs be well known to any one that ever looks into the ancient poets. Even the vagabond life of Apollonius Tyaniensis shall be called by a bigoted sophist, † περιημία ἐς ἀνθρώπων, διὰ, a peregrination of a god among men. And when the Lystrian assay, θεοὶ ἄνθρωποι, gods in the shape of men, they mean not, that the gods had other figure than human even in heaven itself, (for that was the received doctrine of most of the vulgar heathen, and of some sects of philosophers too,) but that they, who in their own nature were of a more august stature and glorious visage, had now contracted and debased themselves into the narrower dimensions and meaner aspects of mortal men. Now, when the Apostles heard of this intended sacrifice, (Acts xiv. 14.) they rent their clothes, and ran in among the people, crying out, &c. St. Chrysostom upon this place hath a very odd exposition. He enquires why Paul and Barnabas do now at last reprove the people, when the priest and victims were even at the gates; and not presently, when they lift up their voice, and called them gods: for which he assigns this reason, ‡ that because they spoke Λυκαονιστί, in the Lycaonian tongue, the Apostles did not then understand them; but now they perceived their meaning by the oxen and the garlands. Indeed it is very probable, that the Lycaonian language was very different from the Greek as we may gather from § Ephorus, and Strabo that cites him, who make almost all the inland nations of Asia Minor to be barbarians; and from || Stephanus Byzantius, who acquaints us, that αἰκισία, a juniper-tree, was called δολύμια in the speech of the Lycaonians, ἐν τῇ τῶν Λύκων ὁμιλίᾳ. But, notwithstanding we can by no means allow that the great Apostle of the Gentiles should be ignorant of that language: he that so solemnly affirms of himself, 1 Cor. xiv. 18.) I thank my God, I speak with tongues more than you all; and at the first effusion of this heavenly gift, (Acts ii.) the dwellers in Cappadocia, in Pontus and Asia, Phrygia and Pamphylia, (some of them near neighbours to the Lycaonians,) heard the Apostles speak in their several tongues the wonderful works of God. And how could these two Apostles have preached the Gospel to the Lystrians, (Acts xiv. 7.) if they did not use the common language of the country? And to what purpose did they (Ver. 15.) cry out and speak to them, if the hearers could not apprehend? or how could they by those (Ver. 18.) sayings restrain the people from sacrificing, if what they said was not intelligible? But it will be asked, why then were the Apostles so slow and backward in reclaiming them? and what can be answered to the query of St. Chrysostom? When I consider the circumstances and nature of this affair, I am persuaded they did not hear that discourse of the people.

For I can hardly conceive, that men under such apprehensions as the Lystrians then were, in the dread presence and under the very nod of the almighty Jupiter, no an idol of wood or stone, but the real and very God, (as the *Athenians made their compliment to Demetrius Poliorcetes,) should exclaim in his sight and hearing: this, I say, seems not probable nor natural; nor is it affirmed in the text: † but they might buzz and whisper it to one another, and silently withdrawing from the presence of the Apostles, they then lift up their voices, and noised it about the city. So that Paul and Barnabas were but just then informed of their idolatrous design, when they rent their clothes, and ran in among them, and expostulated with them; (Acts xiv. 15.) Sirs, why do ye these things? We also are men of like passions with you; ὁμοιοπαθεῖς ὑμῖν, ‡ mortal men like yourselves, as it is judiciously rendered in the ancient Latin version; otherwise the antithesis is not so plain: for the heathen theology made even the gods themselves subject to human passions and appetites, to anger, sorrow, lust, hunger, wounds, lameness, &c. § and exempted them from nothing but death and old age: and we preach unto you, that ye should turn from these vanities (i. e. idols) unto the living God, which made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and all things that are therein: who in times past suffered all nations to walk in their own ways: πάντες τὰ ἔθνη not all nations, but all the heathen, (the word HEATHEN comes from ἔθνη,) all the Gentiles, distinguished from the Jews, as the same words are translated Rom. xv. 11. and 2 Tim. iv. 17. and ought to have been so, Rom. i. 5. and xvi. 26. but much more in our text, which, according to the present version, seems to carry a very obscure, if not erroneous meaning; but by a true interpretation is very easy and intelligible; that hitherto God had suffered all the Gentiles to walk in their own ways; and excepting the Jews only, whom he chose for his own people, and prescribed them a law, he permitted the rest of mankind to walk by the mere light of nature without the assistance of revelation; but that now, in the fulness of time, he had even to the Gentiles also sent salvation, and opened the door of faith, and granted repentance unto life. So that these words of our Apostle are exactly coincident with that remarkable passage in his discourse to the Athenians: (Acts xvii. 80.) And the (past) times of this ignorance (of the Gentile world) God winked at, (or || overlooked but now commandeth all men every where to repent. And nevertheless, says our text, even in that gloomy state of heathenism, he left not himself without witness, in that he did good, ἀγαθοποιῶν ἐς ὑμᾶς, always doing good from heaven, (which seems to be the genuine punctuation, and is authorized by the Syriac interpreters,) and gave us rain and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and gladness. Even the very Gentiles might feel after him and find him; since the admirable frame of heaven, and earth, and sea, and the munificent provision of food and sustenance for his creatures, did competently set forth his eternal power and Godhead; so that stupid idolaters and profane Atheists were then and always without excuse.

Our adversaries have used the same methods to elude the present argument from the frame of the world, as they have done to evade the former from the origin of mankind. Some have maintained, that this world hath thus existed from all eternity in its present form and condition; but others say, that the forms of particular worlds are generable and corruptible; so that our present system cannot have sustained an infinite duration already gone and expired: but however, say they, body in general, the common basis and matter of all worlds and beings, is self-existent and eternal; which being naturally divided into innumerable little particles or atoms, eternally endued with an ingenite and inseparable power of motion, by their omnifarious concussions, and combinations, and coalitions, produce successively (or at once, if matter be infinite,) an infinite number of worlds; and amongst the rest there arose this visible complex system of heaven and earth. And thus far they do agree; but then they differ about the cause and mode of the production of worlds, some ascribing it to fortune, and others to mechanism or nature. It is true, the astrological Atheists will give us no trouble in the present dispute; because they cannot form a peculiar hypothesis here, as they have done before about the origination of animals. For though some of them are so vain and senseless, as to pretend to a thema mundi, a calculated scheme of the nativity of our world; yet it exceeds even their absurdity, to suppose the zodiac and planets to be efficient of, and antecedent to themselves; or to exert any influences before they were in being. So that, to refute all possible explications that the Atheists have or can propose, I shall proceed in this following method:

I. First, I will prove it impossible that the primary parts of our world, the sun and the planets, with their regular motions and revolutions, should have subsisted eternally in the present or a like frame and condition.

II. Secondly, I will shew, that matter abstractly and absolutely considered, cannot have subsisted eternally; or, if it has, yet motion cannot have co-existed eternally with it, as an inherent property and essential attribute of the Atheist's god, MATTER.

III. Thirdly, though universal matter should have endured from everlasting, divided into infinite particles in the Epicurean way: and though motion should have been co-eval and co-eternal with it; yet those particles or atoms could never of themselves by omnifarious kinds of motion, whether fortuitous or mechanical, have fallen or been disposed into this or a like visible system.

IV. And, fourthly, a posteriori, that the order and beauty of the inanimate parts of the world, the discernible ends and final causes of them, the a posteriori, or a meliority above what was necessary to be, do evince by a reflex argument, that it is the product and workmanship, not of a blind mechanism or blinder chance, but of an intelligent and benign Agent; who by his excellent wisdom made the heavens and earth, and gives rain and fruitful seasons for the service of man.

I shall speak of the two first propositions in my present discourse; reserving the latter for other opportunities.

I. First, therefore: that the present or a like frame of the world hath not subsisted from everlasting. We will readily concede, that a thing may be truly eternal, though its duration be terminated at one end. For so we affirm human souls to be immortal and eternal, though there was a time when they were nothing; and therefore their infinite duration will always be bounded at one extreme by that first beginning of existence. So that, for aught appears as yet, the revolutions of the earth and other planets about the sun, though they be limited at one end by the present revolution, may nevertheless have been infinite and eternal without any beginning. But then we must consider, that this duration of human souls is only potentially infinite. For their eternity consists only in an endless capacity of continuance without ever ceasing to be, in a boundless futurity that can never be exhausted, or all of it be past and present. But their duration can never be positively and actually eternal; because it is most manifest, that no moment can ever be assigned, wherein it shall be true, that such a soul hath then actually sustained an infinite duration. For that supposed infinite duration will by the very supposition be limited at two extremes, though never so remote asunder, and consequently must needs be finite. Wherefore the true nature and notion of a soul's eternity is this: that the future moments of its duration can never be all past and present, but still there will be a futurity and potentiality of more for ever and ever. So that we evidently perceive from this instance, that whatever successive duration shall be bounded at one end, and be all past and present, for that reason must be finite. Which necessarily evinceth, that the present or a like world can never have been eternal; or that there cannot have been infinite past revolutions of a planet about a sun. For this supposed infinity is terminate at one extreme by the present revolution, and all the other revolutions are confessedly past; so that the whole duration is bounded at one end, and all past and present; and therefore cannot have been infinite, by what was proved before. And this will shew us the vast difference between the false successive eternity backwards, and the real one to come. For, consider the present revolution of the earth, as the bound and confine of them both. God Almighty, if he so pleaseth, may continue this motion to perpetuity in infinite revolutions to come; because futurity is inexhaustible, and can never be all spent or run out by past and present moments. But then, if we look backwards from this present revolution, we may apprehend the impossibility of infinite revolutions on that side; because all are already past, and so were once actually present, and consequently are finite, by the argument before. For surely we cannot conceive a preteriteness (if I may say so) still backwards in infinitum, that never was present; as we can an endless futurity, that never will be present. So that though one is potentially infinite; yet nevertheless the other is actually finite. And this reasoning doth necessarily conclude against the past infinite duration of all successive motion and mutable beings: but it doth not at all affect the eternal existence of God, in whose invariable nature there is no past or future; who is omnipresent not only as to space, but as to duration, and, with respect to such omnipresence, it is certain and manifest, that succession and motion are mere impossibilities, and repugnant in the very terms.

And, secondly, though what hath been now said hath given us so clear a view of the nature of successive duration, as to make more arguments needless; yet I shall here briefly shew, how our adversaries' hypothesis without any outward opposition destroys and confutes itself. For let us suppose infinite revolutions of the earth about the sun to be already gone and expired; I take it to be self-evident, that, if none of those past revolutions has been infinite ages ago, all the revolutions put together cannot make the duration of infinite ages: it follows therefore from this supposition, that there may be some one assignable revolution among them, that was at an infinite distance from the present. But it is self-evident likewise, that no one past revolution could be infinitely distant from the present: for then an infinite or unbounded duration may be bounded at two extremes by two annual revolutions; which is absurd and a contradiction. And again, upon the same supposition of an eternal past duration of the world, and of infinite annual revolutions of the earth about the sun I would ask concerning the monthly revolutions of the moon about the earth, or the diurnal ones of the earth upon its own axis, both which by the very hypothesis are coeval with the former; whether these also have been finite or infinite? Not finite to be sure; because then a finite number would be greater than an infinite, as 12 or 365 are more than an unit. Nor infinite neither; for then two or three infinities would exceed one another; as a year exceeds a month, or both exceed a day. So that both ways the supposition is repugnant and impossible.

And, thirdly, the arguments already used, from the gradual increase of mankind, from the known plantations of most countries, from the recent invention of letters and arts, &c. do conclude as forcibly against the eternity of the world, as against infinite generations of human race. For if the present frame of the earth be supposed eternal; by the same notion they make mankind to have been coeternal with it. For otherwise this eternal earth, after she had been eternally barren and desolate, must at last have spontaneously produced mankind, without new cause from without, or any alteration in her own texture: which is so gross an absurdity, that even no Atheist hath yet affirmed it. So that it evidently follows, since mankind had a beginning, that the present form of the earth, and therefore the whole system of the world, had a beginning also.

Which being proved and established; we are now enabled to give answers to some bold queries and objections of Atheists; that since God is described as a being infinitely powerful and perfectly good; and that these attributes were essential to him from all eternity; why did he not by his power, for the more ample communication of his goodness, create the world from eternity, if he created it at all? or at least many millions of ages ago before this short span of duration of five or six thousand years? To the first we reply, that since we have discovered an internal and natural impossibility that a successive duration should be actually eternal; it is to us a flat contradiction, that the world should have been created from everlasting. And therefore it is no affront to the divine omnipotence, if by reason of the formal incapacity and repugnancy of the thing we conceive that the world could not possibly have been made from all eternity, even by God himself. Which gives an answer to the second question, Why created so lately? For, if it could not be created from eternity, there can no instant be assigned for its creation in time, though never so many myriads and millions of years since, but the same query may be put, Why but now, and Why so late? for even before that remotest period God was eternally existent, and might have made the world as many myriads of ages still backwards before that: and consequently this objection is absurd and unreasonable. For else, if it was good and allowable, it would eternally hinder God from exerting his creative power, because he could never make a world so early, at any given moment; but it may truly be said he could have created it sooner. Or if they think there may be a soonest instant of possible creation; yet, since all instants have an equal presence to it in human apprehension, why may not this recent production of the world, according to sacred authority, be supposed to be that soonest? At least it may make that claim to it that cannot be baffled by their arguments, which equally conclude against all claims, against any conceivable beginning of the world.

And so when they profanely ask, Why did not this supposed Deity, if he really made the heavens, make them boundless and immense, a fit and honourable mansion for an infinite and incomprehensible being; or at least vastly more ample and magnificent than this narrow cottage of a world? we may make them this answer: First, it seems impossible and a contradiction, that a created world should be infinite; because it is the nature of quantity and motion, that they can never be actually and positively infinite: they have a power indeed and a capacity of being increased without end; so as no quantity can be assigned so vast, but still a larger may be imagined; no motion so swift or languid, but a greater velocity or slowness may still be conceived; no positive duration of it so long, than which a longer may not be supposed; but even that very power hinders them from being actually infinite. From whence, secondly, it follows, that though the world was a million of times more spacious and ample than even astronomy supposes it, or yet another million bigger than that, and so on in infinite progression; yet still they might make the same exception world without end. For since God Almighty can do all that is possible, and quantity hath always a possibility of being enlarged more and more; he could never create so ample a world, but still it would be true, that he could have made a bigger; the fecundity of his creative power never growing barren, nor ever to be exhausted. Now what may always be an exception against all possible worlds, can never be a just one against any whatsoever.

And when they scoffingly demand, Why would this imaginary Omnipotent make such mean pieces of workmanship? What an indigent and impotent thing is his principal creature man? Would not boundless beneficence have communicated his divine perfections in the most eminent degree? they may receive this reply; that we are far from such arrogance, as to pretend to the highest dignity, and be the chief of the whole creation: we believe an invisible world, and a scale of spiritual beings all nobler than ourselves; nor yet are we so low and base as their atheism would depress us; not walking statues of clay, not the sons of brute earth, whose final inheritance is death and corruption: we carry the image of God in us, a rational and immortal soul; and, though we be now indigent and feeble, yet we aspire after eternal happiness, and firmly expect a great exaltation of all our natural powers. But whatsoever was or can be made, whether angels or archangels, cherubims or seraphims, whether thrones or dominions, or principalities or powers, all the glorious host of heaven, must needs be finite, and imperfect, and dependent creatures: and God out of the exceeding greatness of his power is still able, without end, to create higher classes of beings. For where can we put a stop to the efficacy of the Almighty? or what can we assign for the highest of all possible finite perfections? There can be no such thing as an almost infinite; there can be nothing next or second to an omnipotent God: * Nec viget quicquam simile aut secundum; as the heathen poet said excellently well of the supposed father of gods and men. The infinite distance between the Creator and the noblest of all creatures can never be measured nor exhausted by endless addition of finite degrees. So that no actual creature can ever be the most perfect of all possible creation. Which shews the folly of this query, that might always be demanded, let things be as they will, that would impiously and absurdly attempt to tie the arm of omnipotence from doing any thing at all, because it can never do its utmost.

II. I proceed now to the second proposition, that neither matter universally and abstractly considered, nor motion as its attribute and property, can have existed from all eternity. And to this I shall speak the more briefly, not only because it is an abstruse and metaphysical speculation, but because it is of far less moment and consequence than the rest: since without this we can evince the existence of God from the origin and frame of the universe. For if the present or a like system of the world could possibly have been eternal, † and if without God it could neither naturally nor fortuitously emerge out of a chaos, ‡ we must necessarily have recourse to a Deity, as the contriver and maker of heaven and earth; whether we suppose he created them out of nothing, or had the materials ready eternally to his hand. But nevertheless, because we are very persuaded of the truth of this article, we shall briefly assign some reasons of our belief in these following particulars.

First, It is a thing possible, that matter may have been produced out of nothing. It is urged as an universal maxim, that nothing can proceed from nothing. Now this we readily allow; and yet it will prove nothing against the possibility of creation. For, when they say, nothing from nothing, they must so understand it, as excluding all causes both material and efficient. In which sense it is most evidently and intally true, being equivalent to this proposition, that nothing can make itself; or, nothing cannot bring its no-self out of non-entity into something. Which only expresses thus much, that matter did not produce itself, or, that all substances did not emerge out of an universal nothing. Now, who ever talked at that rate? We do not say, the world was created from nothing and by nothing; we assert an eternal God to have been the efficient cause of it. So that a creation of the world out of nothing by something, and by that something that includes in its nature a necessary existence and perfection of power, is certainly no contradiction, nor opposes that common maxim. Whence it manifestly follows, that since God may do any thing that implies not a contradiction; if there be such an essence as God, he may have created matter out of nothing, that is, have given an existence to matter, which had no being before.

And, secondly, It is very probable, that matter has been actually created out of nothing. In a former discourse we have proved sufficiently, that human souls are not mere modifications of matter, but real and spiritual substances, that have as true an existence as our very bodies themselves. Now, no man, as I conceive, can seriously think that his own soul hath existed from all eternity. He cannot believe the stuff or materials of his soul to have been eternal, and the soul to have been made up of them at the time of his conception. For a human soul is no compound being; it is not made of particles, as our bodies are, but it is one simple homogeneous essence. neither can he think, that the personality of his soul, with its faculties inherent in it, has existed eternally; this is against common sense, and it needs no refutation. Nay, though a man could be so extravagant as to hold this assertion, that his soul, his personal self, has been from everlasting, yet even this in the issue would be destructive to atheism, since it supposes an eternal Being, endued with understanding and wisdom. We will take it then as a thing confessed, that the immaterial souls of men have been produced out of nothing. But if God hath actually created those intelligent substances that have such nobility and excellency of being above brute senseless matter; it is prevariciousness to deny that he created matter also: unless they will say, necessary existence is included in the very essence and idea of matter.

* Horat. Car. 1. 14.

† By the heathen poet.

‡ By the poet.

But matter doth not include in its nature a necessity of existence. For human souls, as is proved before, have been actually created, and consequently have not necessary existence included in their essence. Now can any man believe, that his spiritual soul, that understands, and judges, and invents; *endowed with those divine faculties of sense, memory, and reason; hath a dependent and precarious being created and preserved by another; while the particles of this dead ink and paper have been necessarily eternal and uncreated? It is against natural reason; and no one, while he contemplates an individual body, can discern that necessity of its existence. But men have been taught to believe, that extension or space, and body are both the selfsame thing. So that because they cannot imagine, how space can either begin or cease to exist; they presently conclude, that extended infinite matter must needs be eternal. But body and space or distance are quite different things, and a vacuity is interspersed among the particles of matter, and such a one as hath a vastly larger extension than all the matter of the universe. Which now being supposed, they ought to abstract their imagination from that false infinite extension, and conceive one particle of matter, surrounded on all sides with vacuity, and contiguous to no other body. And whereas formerly they fancied an immense boundless space, as an homogeneous one; which great individual they believed might deserve the attribute of necessary existence: let them now please to imagine one solitary atom, that hath no dependence on the rest of the world; and is no more sustained in being by other matter, than it could be created by it; and then I would ask the question, whether this poor atom, sluggish and unactive as it is, doth involve necessity of existence, the first and highest of all perfections, in its particular nature and notion? I dare presume for the negative in the judgments of all serious men. † And I observe the Epicureans take much pains to convince us, that in natural corruptions and dissolutions, atoms are not reduced to nothing; which surely would be needless, if the very idea of atoms imported self-existence. And yet if one atom do not include so much in its notion and essence; all atoms put together, that is, all the matter of the universe cannot include it. So that upon the whole matter, since creation is no contradiction; since God hath certainly created nobler substances than matter; and since matter is not necessarily eternal; it is most reasonable to believe, that the eternal and self-existent God created the material world, and produced it out of nothing.

And then as to the last proposition, that motion as an attribute or property of matter cannot have been from eternity. That we may waive some metaphysical arguments, which demonstrate that local motion cannot be positively eternal; we shall only observe in two words, that if matter be not essentially eternal, as we have shewed before, much less can motion be, that is but the adjunct and accident of it. Nay, though we should concede an eternity to matter, yet why must motion be coeval with it? which is not only not inherent and essential to matter, but may be produced and destroyed at the pleasure of free agents; both which are flatly repugnant to an eternal and necessary duration. I am aware how some have asserted, that the same quantity of motion is always kept up in the world; which may seem to favour the opinion of its infinite duration: but that assertion doth solely depend upon an absolute plenium; which being refuted in my next discourse, it will then appear how absurd and false that conceit is, about the same quantity of motion; how easily disproved from that power in human souls to excite motion when they please, and from the gradual increase of men and other animals, and many arguments besides. Therefore let this also be concluded, that motion has not been eternal in an infinite past duration: which was the last thing to be proved.

SERMON III.

By RICHARD BENTLEY, D.D.

[Preached Nov. the 7th, 1692.]

Acts xiv. 15—17.

That ye should turn from these vanities unto the living God, who made heaven and earth, and the sea, and all things that are therein: who in times past suffered all nations to walk in their own ways. Nevertheless, he left not himself without witness, in that he did good, and gave us rain from heaven, and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and gladness.

WHEN we first entered upon this topic, the demonstration of God's existence from the origin and frame of the world, we offered to prove four propositions

I. That this present system of heaven and earth cannot possibly have subsisted from all eternity.

II. That matter considered generally, and abstractly from any particular form and concretion, cannot possibly have been eternal; or, if matter could be so; yet motion cannot have co-existed with it eternally, as an inherent property and essential attribute of matter. These two we have already established in the preceding discourse; we shall now shew, in the third place,

III. That, though we should allow the Atheists, that matter and motion may have been from everlasting; yet if (as they now suppose) there were once no sun, nor stars, nor earth, nor planets, but the particles that now constitute them were diffused in the mundane space in manner of a chaos without any concretion or coalition; those dispersed particles could never of themselves by any kind of natural motion, whether called fortuitous, or mechanical, have convened into this present or any other like frame of heaven and earth.

I. And first, as to that ordinary cant of illiterate and puny Atheists, the fortuitous or casual concurrence of atoms, that compendious and easy dispatch of the most important and difficult affair, the formation of a world; (besides that in our next undertaking it will be refuted all along;) I shall now briefly dispatch it, from what hath been formerly said concerning the true notions of fortune, and chance. Whereby it is evident, that in the atheistical hypothesis of the world's production, fortuitous and mechanical must be the selfsame thing. Because fortune is no real entity nor physical essence, but a mere relative signification, denoting only this; that such a thing said to fall out by fortune was really effected by material and necessary causes; but the person, with regard to whom it is called fortuitous, was ignorant of those causes or their tendencies, and did not design or foresee such an effect. This is the only allowable and genuine notion of the word fortune. But thus to affirm, that the world was made fortuitously, is as much as to say, that before the world was made, there was some intelligent agent or spectator, who designing to do something else, or expecting that something else would be done with the materials of the world, there were some occult and unknown motions and tendencies in matter, which mechanically formed the world beside his design or expectation. Now the Atheists, we may presume, will be loth to assert a fortuitous formation in this proper sense and meaning; whereby they will make understanding to be older than heaven and earth. Or if they should so assert it; yet, unless they will affirm that the intelligent agent did dispose and direct the insensate matter, (which is what we would bring them to,) they must still leave their atoms to their mechanical affections; not able to make one step toward the production of a world beyond the necessary laws of motion. It is plain then, that fortune, as to the matter before us, is but a synonymous word with nature and necessity. It remains that we examine the adequate meaning of chance; which properly signifies, that all events called casual, among inanimate bodies, are mechanically and naturally produced according to the determinate figures, and textures, and motions of those bodies; with this negation only, that those inanimate bodies are not conscious of their own operations, nor contrive and cast about how to bring such events to pass. So that thus to say, that the world was made casually by the concurrence of atoms, is no more than to affirm, that the atoms composed the world mechanically and fatally: only they were not sensible of it, nor studied and considered about so noble an undertaking. For if atoms formed the world according to the essential properties of bulk, figure, and motion, they formed it mechanically; and if they formed it mechanically without perception and design, they formed it casually. So that this negation of consciousness being all that the notion of chance can add to that of mechanism; we, that do not dispute this matter with the Atheists, nor believe that atoms ever acted by counsel and thought, may have leave to consider the several names of fortune, and chance, and nature, and mechanism, as one and the same hypothesis. Wherefore once for all to overthrow all possible explications which Atheists have or may assign for the formation of the world, we will undertake to evince this following proposition:

2. That the atoms or particles which now constitute heaven and earth, being once separate and diffused in the mundane space, like the supposed chacs, could never, without a God, by their mechanical affections, have convened into this present frame of things, or any other like it.

Which that we may perform with the greater clearness and conviction, it will be necessary, in a discourse about the formation of the world, to give you a brief account of some of the most principal and systematical phenomena that occur in the world now that it is formed.

(1.) The most considerable phenomenon belonging to terrestrial bodies is the general action of gravitation, whereby all known bodies in the vicinity of the earth do tend and press towards its centre: not only such as are sensibly and evidently heavy, but even those that are comparatively the lightest, and even in their proper place, and natural elements; (as they usually speak;) as air gravitates even in air, and water in water. This hath been demonstrated and experimentally proved beyond contradiction, by several ingenious persons of the present age, but by none so perspicuously, and copiously, and accurately, as by the * honourable Founder of this Lecture, in his incomparable Treatises of the Air and Hydrostatics.

(2.) Now this is the constant property of gravitation, that the weight of all bodies around the earth is ever proportional to the quantity of their matter; as for instance, a pound weight examined hydrostatically, of all kinds of bodies, though of the most different forms and textures, doth always contain an equal quantity of solid mass or corporeal substance. This is the ancient doctrine of the † Epicurean physiology, then and since very probably indeed, but yet precariously asserted: but it is lately demonstrated and put beyond controversy by that very excellent and divine theorist † Mr. Isaac Newton, to whose most admirable sagacity and industry we shall frequently be obliged in this and the following discourse.

I will not entertain this auditory with an account of the demonstration; but referring the curious to the book itself for full satisfaction, I shall now proceed and build upon it as a truth solidly established, that all bodies weigh according to their matter; provided only that the compared bodies be at equal distances from the centre toward which they weigh. Because the further they are removed from the centre, the lighter they are; decreasing gradually and uniformly in weight, in a duplicate proportion to the increase of the distance.

(3.) Now since gravity is found proportional to the quantity of matter, there is a manifest necessity of admitting a vacuum, another principal doctrine of the atomical philosophy. Because if there were every where an absolute plenitude and density without any empty pores and interstices between the particles of bodies, then all bodies of equal dimensions would contain an equal quantity of matter; and consequently, as we have shewed before, would be equally ponderous; so that gold, copper, stone, wood, &c. would have all the same specific weight; which experience assures us they have not: neither would any of them descend in the air, as we all see they do; because, if all space was full, even the air would be as dense and specifically as heavy as they. If it be said, that, though the difference of specific gravity may proceed from variety of texture, the lighter bodies being of a more loose and porous composition, and the heavier more dense and compact; yet an ethereal subtle matter, which is in a perpetual motion, may penetrate and pervade the minutest and inmost cavities of the closest bodies, and adapting itself to the figure of every pore, may adequately fill them; and so prevent all vacuity, without increasing the weight. To this we answer, that that subtle matter itself must be of the same substance and nature with all other matter, and therefore it also must weigh proportionally to its bulk; and as much of it as at any time is comprehended within the pores of a particular body must gravitate jointly with that body; so that if the presence of this ethereal matter made an absolute fulness, all bodies of equal dimensions would be equally heavy: which being refuted by experience, it necessarily follows, that there is a vacuity; and that (notwithstanding some little objections full of cavil and sophistry) mere and simple extension or space hath a quite different nature and notion from real body and impenetrable substance.

(4.) This therefore being established; in the next place, it is of great consequence to our present enquiry, if we can make a computation, how great is the whole sum of the void spaces in our system, and what proportion it bears to the corporeal substance. * By many and accurate trials it manifestly appears, that refined gold, the most ponderous of known bodies, (though even that must be allowed to be porous too, because it is dissoluble in mercury, and aqua regia, and other chymical liquors; and because it is naturally a thing impossible, that the figures and sizes of its constituent particles should be so justly adapted, as to touch one another in every point,) I say, gold is in specific weight to common water as 19 to 1; and water to common air as 850 to 1: so that gold is to air as 16150 to 1. Whence it clearly appears, seeing matter and gravity are always commensurate, that (though we should allow the texture of gold to be entirely close without any vacuity) the ordinary air in which we live and respire is of so thin a composition, that 16149 parts of its dimensions are mere emptiness and nothing; and the remaining one only material and real substance. But if gold itself be admitted, as it must be, for a porous concrete, the proportion of void to body in the texture of common air will be so much the greater. And thus it is in the lowest and densest region of the air near the surface of the earth, where the whole mass of air is in a state of violent compression, the inferior being pressed and constricted by the weight of all the incumbent. But, since the air is now certainly known to consist of † elastic or springy particles, that have a continual tendency and endeavour to expand and display themselves; and the dimensions, to which they expand themselves, to be reciprocally as the compression; it follows, that the higher you ascend in it, where it is less and less compressed by the superior air, the more and more it is rarefied. So that at the height of a few miles from the surface of the earth, it is computed to have some million parts of empty space in its texture for one of solid matter. And at the height of one terrestrial semidiameter (not above four thousand miles) the ether is of that wonderful tenuity, ‡ that, by an exact calculation, if a small sphere of common air of one inch diameter (already 16149 parts nothing) should be further expanded to the thinness of that ether, it would more than take up the vast orb of Saturn, which is many million million times bigger than the whole globe of the earth. And yet, the higher you ascend above that region, the rarefaction still gradually increases without stop or limit: so that, in a word, the whole concave of the firmament, except the sun and planets and their atmospheres, may be considered as a mere void. Let us allow then, that all the matter of the system of our sun may be 30,000 times as much as the whole mass of the earth; and we appeal to astronomy, if we are not liberal enough and even prodigal in this concession. And let us suppose further, that the whole globe of the earth is entirely solid and compact without any void interstices; notwithstanding what hath been shewed before, as to the texture of gold itself. Now, though we have made such ample allowances, we shall find, notwithstanding, that the void space of our system is immensely bigger than all its corporeal mass. For, to proceed upon our supposition, that all the matter within the firmament is 50,000 times bigger than the solid globe of the earth; if we assume the diameter of the orbis magnus (wherein the earth moves about the sun) to be only 7000 times as big as the diameter of the earth, (though the latest and most accurate observations make it thrice 7000,) and the diameter of the firmament to be only 100,000 times as long as the diameter of the orbis magnus, (though it cannot possibly be less than that, but may be vastly and unspeakably bigger,) we must pronounce, after such large concessions on that side, and such great abatements on ours, that the sum of empty spaces within the concave of the firmament is 6860 million million times bigger than all the matter contained in it.

* Mr. Boyle of Air and Porosity of Bodies.

Now from hence we are enabled to form a right conception and imagination of the supposed chaos, and then we may proceed to determine the controversy with more certainty and satisfaction, whether a world like the present could possibly without a divine influence be formed in it, or no?

1. And first, because every fixed star is supposed by astronomers to be of the same nature with our sun; and each may very possibly have planets about them, though by reason of their vast distance they be invisible to us; we will assume this reasonable supposition, that the same proportion of void space to matter, which is found in our sun's region within the sphere of the fixed stars, may competently well hold in the whole mundane space. I am aware, that in this computation we must not assign the whole capacity of that sphere for the region of our sun; but allow half of its diameter for the radii of the several regions of the next fixed stars: so that diminishing our former number, as this last consideration requires, we may safely affirm from certain and demonstrated principles, that the empty space of our solar region (comprehending half of the diameter of the firmament) is 8575 hundred thousand million million times more ample than all the corporeal substance in it. And we may fairly suppose, that the same proportion may hold through the whole extent of the universe.

2. And secondly, as to the state or condition of matter before the world was a making, which is compendiously expressed by the word chaos; they must either suppose, that the matter of our solar system was evenly or well-nigh evenly diffused through the region of the sun, which would represent a particular chaos; or that all matter universally was so spread through the whole mundane space, which would truly exhibit a general chaos; no part of the universe being rarer or denser than another. And this is agreeable to the ancient description of chaos, that  the heavens and earth had* μία ἰδίαν, μία μορφή, one form, one texture and constitution; which could not be, unless all the mundane matter were uniformly and evenly diffused. It is indifferent to our dispute, whether they suppose it to have continued a long time or very little in the state of diffusion. For, if there were but one single moment in all past eternity, when matter was so diffused, we shall plainly and fully prove, that it could never have convened afterwards into the present frame and order of things.

3. It is evident from what we have newly proved, that in the supposition of such a chaos or such an even diffusion either of the whole mundane matter, or that of our system, (for it matters not which they assume,) every single particle would have a sphere of void space around it 8575 hundred thousand million million times bigger than the dimensions of that particle. Nay, further, though the proportion already appear so immense; yet every single particle would really be surrounded with a void sphere eight times as capacious as that newly mentioned; its diameter being compounded of the diameter of the proper sphere, and the semi-diameters of the contiguous spheres of the neighbouring particles. From whence it appears, that every particle (supposing them globular or not very oblong) would be above nine million times their own length from any other particle. And moreover, in the whole surface of this void sphere there can only twelve particles be evenly placed, as the hypothesis requires; that is, at equal distances from the central one and from each other: so that if the matter of our system or of the universe was equally dispersed, like the supposed chaos, the result and issue would be, not only that every atom would be many million times its own length distant from any other; but, if any one should be moved mechanically (without direction or attraction) to the limit of that distance, it is above a hundred million millions odds to an unit, that it would not strike upon any other atom, but glide through an empty interval without any contact.

4. It is true, that while I calculate these measures, I suppose* all the particles of matter to be at absolute rest among themselves, and situated in an exact and mathematical evenness; neither of which is likely to be allowed by our adversaries, who not admitting the former, but asserting the eternity of motion, will consequently deny the latter also: because, in the very moment that motion is admitted in the chaos, such an exact evenness cannot possibly be preserved. But this I do, not to draw any argument against them from the universal rest or accurately equal diffusion of matter; but only that I may better demonstrate the great rarity and tenuity of their imaginary chaos, and reduce it to computation; which computation will hold with exactness enough, though we allow the particles of the chaos to be variously moved, and to differ something in size, and figure, and situation. For if some particles should approach nearer each other than in the former proportion; with respect to some other particles they would be as much remoter. So that, notwithstanding a small diversity of their positions and distances, the whole aggregate of matter, as long as it retained the name and nature of chaos, would retain well-nigh an uniform tenuity of texture, and may be considered as an homogeneous fluid; as several portions of the same sort of water are reckoned to be of the same specific gravity: though it be naturally impossible that every particle and pore of it, considered geometrically, should have equal sizes and dimensions.

We have now represented the true scheme and condition of the chaos; how all the particles would be disunited; and what vast intervals of empty space would lie between each. To form a system therefore, it is necessary that these squandered atoms should convene and unite into great and compact masses, like the bodies of the earth and planets. Without such a coalition the diffused chaos must have continued and reigned to all eternity. But how could particles so widely dispersed combine into that closeness of texture? Our adversaries can have only these two ways of accounting for it.

First, By the common motion of matter, proceeding from external impulse and conflict, (without attraction,) by which every body moves uniformly in a direct line, according to the determination of the impelling force. For, they may say, the atoms of the chaos being variously moved, according to this catholic law, must needs knock and interfere; by which means some that have convenient figures for mutual coherence might chance to stick together, and others might join to those, and so by degrees such huge masses might be formed, as afterwards became suns and planets: or these might arise some vertiginous motion or whirlpools in the matter of the chaos, whereby the atoms might be thrust and crowded to the middle of those whirlpools, and there constipate one another into great solid globes, such as now appear in the world.

Or, secondly, by mutual gravitation, or attraction. For they may assert that matter hath inherently and essentially such an internal energy, whereby it incessantly tends to unite itself to all other matter; so that several particles, placed in a void space, at any distance whatsoever, would without any external impulse spontaneously convene and unite together. And thus the atoms of the chaos, though never so widely diffused, might by this innate property of attraction soon assemble themselves into great spherical masses, and constitute systems like the present heaven and earth.

This is all that can be proposed by Atheists, as an efficient cause of the world. For as to the Epicurean theory, of atoms descending down an infinite space by an inherent principle of gravitation, which tends not toward other matter, but toward a vacuum or nothing; and verging from the perpendicular *nobody knows why, nor when, nor where; it is such miserable absurd stuff, so repugnant to itself, and so contrary to the known phenomena of nature, though it contented supine unthinking atheists for a thousand years together, that we will not now honour it with a special refutation. But what it hath common with the other explications, we will fully confute together with them in these three propositions.

(1) That by common motion (without attraction) the discovered particles of the chaos could never make the world; could never convene into such great compact masses, as the planets now are; nor either acquire or continue such motions as the planets now have.

(2) That such a mutual gravitation or spontaneous attraction can neither be inherent and essential to matter; nor ever suppose to it, unless impressed and infused into it by a divine power.

(3) That though we should allow such attraction to be natural and essential to all matter; yet the atoms of a chaos could never so convene by it, as to form the present system; or, if they could form it, it could neither acquire such motions, nor continue permanent in this state without the power and providence of a divine being.

(1) And first, that by common motion the matter of chaos could never convene into such masses, as the planets now are. Any man, that considers the spacious void intervals of the chaos, how immense they are in proportion to the bulk of the atoms, will hardly induce himself to believe, that particles so widely disseminated could ever throng and crowd one another into a close and compact texture. He will rather conclude that those few which should happen to clash, might rebound after the collision; or, if they cohered, yet by the next conflict with other atoms might be separated again; and so on in an eternal vicissitude of fast and loose, without ever consociating into the huge condense bodies of planets; some of whose particles upon this supposition must have travelled many millions of leagues through the gloomy regions of chaos, to place themselves where they now are. But then how rarely would there be any clashing at all; how very rarely in comparison to the number of atoms! The whole multitude of them, generally speaking, might freely move and rove for ever with very little occurring or interfering. Let us conceive two of the nearest particles according to our former calculation; or rather let us try the same proportions in another example, that will come easier to the imagination. Let us suppose two ships, fitted with durable timber and rigging, but without pilot or mariners, to be placed in the vast Atlantic or the Pacific Ocean, as far asunder as may be: how many thousand years might expire, before those solitary vessels should happen to strike one against the other!

But let us imagine the space yet more ample, even the whole face of the earth to be covered with sea, and the two ships to be placed in the opposite poles, might not they now move long enough without any danger of clashing? And yet I find, that the two nearest atoms in our evenly diffused chaos have ten thousand times less proportion to the two void circular planes around them, than our two ships would have to the whole surface of the deluge. Let us assume then another deluge ten thousand times larger than Noah's; is it not now utterly incredible, that our two vessels, placed there antipodes to each other, should ever happen to concur? And yet let me add, that the ships would move in one and the same surface; and consequently must needs encounter, when they either advance towards one another in direct lines, or meet in the intersection of gross ones; but the atoms may not only fly sideways, but over likewise and under each other; which makes it many million times more improbable that they should interfere than the ships, even in the last and unlikely instance. But they may say, though the odds indeed be unspeakable that the atoms do not convene in any set number of trials, yet in an infinite succession of them may not such a combination possibly happen? But let them consider, that the improbability of casual hits is never diminished by repetition of trials; they are as unlikely to fall out at the thousandth as at the first. So that in a matter of mere chance, when there is so many millions odds against any assignable experiment, it is in vain to expect it should ever succeed, even in endless duration.

But though we should concede it to be simply possible, that the matter of chaos might convene into great masses, like planets; yet it is absolutely impossible that those masses should acquire such revolutions about the sun. Let us suppose any one of those masses to be the present earth. Now the annual revolution of the earth must proceed (in this hypothesis) either from the sum and result of the several motions of all the particles that formed the earth, or from a new impulse from some external matter, after it was formed. The former is apparently absurd, because the particles that formed the round earth must needs convene from all points and quarters towards the middle, and would generally tend toward its centre; which would make the whole compound to rest in a poise: or at least that overplus of motion, which the particles of one hemisphere could have above the other, would be very small and inconsiderable; too feeble and languid to propel so vast and ponderous a body with that prodigious velocity. And secondly, it is impossible that any external matter should impel that compound mass, after it was formed. It is manifest that nothing else could impel it, unless the ethereal matter be supposed to be carried about the sun like a vortex or whirlpool, as a vehicle to convey it and the rest of the planets. But this is refuted from what we have shewn above, that those spaces of the ether may be reckoned a mere void, the whole quantity of their matter scarce amounting to the weight of a grain. It is refuted also from matter of fact in the motion of comets; which, as often as they are visible to us, *are in the region of our planets, and there are observed to move, some in quite contrary courses to theirs, and some in cross and oblique ones, in planes inclined to the plane of the ecliptic in all kinds of angles; which firmly evinces, that the regions of the ether are empty and free, and neither assist nor resist the revolutions of planets. But moreover there could not possibly arise in the chaos any vortices or whirlpools at all; either to form the globes of the planets, or to revolve them when formed. It is acknowledged by all, that inanimate unactive matter moves always in a straight line, nor ever reflects in an angle nor bends in a circle, (which is a continual reflection,) unless either by some external impulse that may divert it from the direct motion, or by an intrinsic principle of gravity or attraction that may make it describe a curve line about the attracting body. But this latter cause is not now supposed; and the former could never beget whirlpools in a chaos of so great a laxity and thinness. For it is matter of certain experience, and universally allowed, that all bodies moved circularly have a perpetual endeavour to recede from the centre, and every moment would fly out in right lines, if they were not violently restrained and kept in by contiguous matter. But there is no such restraint in the supposed chaos, no want of empty room there; no possibility of effecting one single revolution in way of a vortex, which neces-

And for the same reason it is evident, that the planets could not continue their revolutions about the sun, though they could possibly acquire them. For, to drive and carry the planets in such orbs as they now describe, that ethereal matter must be compact and dense, as dense as the very planets themselves; otherwise they would certainly fly out in spiral lines to the very circumference of the vortex. But we have often inculcated, that the wide tracts of the ether may be reputed as a mere extended void. So that there is nothing (in this hypothesis) that can retain and bind the planets in their orbs for one single moment; but they would immediately desert them and the neighbourhood of the sun, and vanish away in tangents to their several circles into the abyss of mundane space.

(2.) Secondly, We affirm, that mutual gravitation, or spontaneous attraction, cannot possibly be innate and essential to matter. By attraction we do not here understand what is properly, though vulgarly, called so in the operations of drawing, sucking, pumping, &c. which is really pulsion and trusion; and belongs to that common motion, which we have already shewn to be insufficient for the formation of a world. But we now mean (as we have explained it before) such a power and quality, whereby all parcels of matter would mutually attract or mutually tend and press to all others; so that, for instance, two distant atoms in vacuo would spontaneously convene together without the impulse of external bodies.

Now, first, we say, if our Atheists suppose this power to be inherent and essential to matter, they overthrow their own hypothesis; there could never be a chaos at all upon these terms; but the present form of our system must have continued from all eternity, against their own supposition, and what we have proved in our last. For, if they affirm that there might be a chaos notwithstanding innate gravity, then let them assign any period though never so remote, when the diffused matter might convene. They must confess, that before that assigned period matter had existed eternally inseparably endued with this principle of attraction; and yet had never attracted nor convened before, in that infinite duration; which is so monstrous an absurdity, as even they will blush to be charged with. But some perhaps may imagine, that a former system might be dissolved and reduced to a chaos, from which the present system might have its origin; as that former had from another, and so on; new systems having grown out of old ones in infinite vicissitudes from all past eternity. But we say, that in the supposition of innate gravity no system at all could be dissolved; for how is it possible, that the matter of solid masses like earth, and planets, and stars, should fly up from their centres against its inherent principle of mutual attraction, and diffuse itself in a chaos? This is absurder than the other; that only supposed innate gravity not to be exerted; this makes it to be defeated, and to act contrary to its own nature. So that upon all accounts this essential power of gravitation or attraction is irreconcilable with the Atheist's own doctrine of a chaos. And, secondly, it is repugnant to common sense and reason.

It is utterly inconceivable, that inanimate brute matter, without the mediation of some immaterial being, should operate upon and affect other matter without mutual contact; that distant bodies should act upon each other through a vacuum, without the intervention of something else, by and through which the action may be conveyed from one to the other. We will not obscure and perplex with multitude of words what is so clear and evident by its own light, and must needs be allowed by all that have competent use of thinking, and are initiated into, I do not say the mysteries, but the plainest principles of philosophy. Now mutual gravitation or attraction, in our present acception of the words, is the same thing with this; it is an operation, or virtue, or influence of distant bodies upon each other through an empty interval, without any effluvia, or exhalations, or other corporeal medium to convey and transmit it. This power therefore cannot be innate and essential to matter. And, if it be not essential, it is consequently most manifest, since it doth not depend upon motion or rest, or figure or position of parts, which are all the ways that matter can diversify itself, that it could never supervene to it unless impressed and infused into it by an immaterial and divine power.

We have proved, that a power of mutual gravitation, without contact or impulse, can in nowise be attributed to mere matter; or, if it could, we shall presently shew, that it would be wholly unable to form the world out of a chaos. What then if it be made appear, that there is really such a power of gravity, which cannot be ascribed to mere matter, perpetually acting in the constitution of the present system? This would be a new and invincible argument for the being of God; being a direct and positive proof, that an immaterial living mind doth inform and actuate the dead matter, and support the frame of the world. I will lay before you some certain phenomena of nature, and leave it to your consideration from what principle they can proceed. It is demonstrated that the sun, moon, and all the planets do reciprocally gravitate one toward another: that the gravitating power of each of them is exactly proportional to their matter, and arises from the several gravitations or attractions of all the individual particles that compose the whole mass: that all matter near the surface of the earth (and so in all the planets) doth not only gravitate downwards, but upwards also, and sideways, and toward all imaginable points; though the tendency downward be predominant and alone discernible, because of the greatness and nearness of the attracting body, the earth: that every particle of the whole system doth attract and is attracted by all the rest, all operating upon all: that this universal attraction or gravitation is an incessant, regular, and uniform action by certain and established laws according to quantity of matter and longitude of distance: that it cannot be destroyed nor impaired, nor augmented by any thing, neither by motion or rest, nor situation nor posture, nor alteration of form, nor diversity of medium: that it is not a magnetical power, nor the effect of a vortical motion; those common attempts towards the explication of gravity: "these things, I say, are fully demonstrated as matters of fact, by that very ingenious author, whom we cited before. Now how is it possible that these things should be effected by any material and mechanical agent? We have evinced, that mere matter cannot operate upon matter without mutual contact. It remains then, that these phenomena are produced either by the intervention of air or ether or other such medium, that communicates the impulse from one body to another; or by effluvia and spirits, that are emitted from the one, and pervene to the other. We can conceive no other way of performing them mechanically. But what impulse or agitation can be propagated through the ether, from one particle entombed and wedged in the very centre of the earth, to another in the centre of Saturn? Yet even those two particles do reciprocally affect each other with the same force and vigour, as they would do at the same distance in any other situation imaginable. And because the impulse from this particle is not directed to that only, but to all the rest in the universe; to all quarters and regions, at once invariably and incessantly; to do this mechanically, the same physical point of matter must move all manner of ways equally and constantly in the same instant and moment; which is flatly impossible. But, if this particle cannot propagate such motion, much less can it send out effluvia to all points without intermission or variation; such multitudes of effluvia as to lay hold on every atom in the universe without missing of one. Nay, every single particle of the very effluvia (since they also attract and gravitate) must in this supposition emit other secondary effluvia all the world over; and those others still emit more, and so in infinitum. Now, if these things be repugnant to human reason, we have great reason to affirm, that universal gravitation, a thing certainly existent in nature, is above all mechanism and material causes, and proceeds from a higher principle, a divine energy and impression.

(3.) Thirdly, we affirm, that, though we should allow that reciprocal attraction is essential to matter, yet the atoms of a chaos could never so convene by it, as to form the present system; or, if they could form it, yet it could neither acquire these revolutions, nor subsist in the present condition, without the conservation and providence of a divine Being.

1. For first, if the matter of the universe, and consequently the space through which it is diffused, be supposed to be finite, (and I think it might be demonstrated to be so, but that we have already exceeded the just measures of a sermon,) then, since every single particle hath an innate gravitation toward all others, proportionated by matter and distance; it evidently appears, that the outward atoms of the chaos would necessarily tend inwards, and descend from all quarters toward the middle of the whole space: for, in respect to every atom, there would lie through the middle the greatest quantity of matter and the most vigorous attraction; and those atoms would there form and constitute one huge spherical mass, which would be the only body in the universe. It is plain therefore, that upon this supposition the matter of the chaos could never compose such divided and different masses, as the stars and planets of the present world.

But, allowing our adversaries that the planets might be composed; yet however they could not possibly acquire such revolutions in circular orbs; or (which is all one to our present purpose) in ellipses very little eccentric. For let them assign any place where the planets were formed. Was it nearer to the sun than the present distances are? But that is notoriously absurd; for then they must have ascended from the place of their formation, against the essential property of mutual attraction. Or, were each formed in the same orbs in which they now move? But then they must have moved from the point of rest, in an horizontal line, without any inclination or descent. Now there is no natural cause, neither innate gravity nor impulse of external matter, that could beget such a motion: for gravity alone must have carried them downwards to the vicinity of the sun. And, that the ambient ether is too liquid and empty to impel them horizontally with that prodigious celerity, we have sufficiently proved before. Or, were they made in some higher regions of the heavens, and from thence descended by their essential gravity, till they all arrived at their respective orbs; each with its present degree of velocity, acquired by the fall? But then why did they not continue their descent till they were contiguous to the sun, whether both mutual attraction and impetus carried them? What natural agent could turn them aside; could impel them so strongly with a transverse side-blow against that tremendous weight and rapidity, when whole planets were a falling? But if we should suppose, that by some cross attraction or other they might acquire an obliquity of descent, so as to miss the body of the sun, and to fall on one side of it? Then indeed the force of their fall would carry them quite beyond it; and so they might fetch a compass about it, and then return and ascend by the same steps and degrees of motion and velocity with which they descended before. Such an eccentric motion as this, much after the manner that comets revolve about the sun, they might possibly acquire by their innate principle of gravity; but circular revolutions, in concentric orbs about the sun or other central body, could in nowise be attained without the power of the divine arm. For the case of the planetary motion is this. Let us conceive all the planets to be formed or constituted with their centres in their several orbs; and at once to be impressed on them this gravitating energy toward all other matter, and a transverse impulse of a just quantity in each, projecting them directly in tangents to those orbs. The compound motion, which arises from this gravitation and projection together, describes the present revolutions of the primary planets about the sun, and of the secondary about those; the gravity prohibiting, that they cannot recede from the centres of their motions; and the transverse impulse withholding, that they cannot approach to them. Now although gravity could be innate, (which we have proved that it cannot be,) yet certainly this projected, this transverse and violent motion can only be ascribed to the right hand of the most high God, creator of heaven and earth.

But, finally, if we should grant them, that these circular revolutions could be naturally attained; or, if they will, that this very individual world in its present posture and motion was actually formed out of chaos by mechanical causes; yet it requires a divine power and providence to have preserved it so long in the present state and condition. For what are the causes that preserve the system of our sun and his planets, so that the planets continue to move in the same orbs, neither receding from the sun, nor approaching nearer to him? We have shewn, that a transverse impulse, impressed upon the planets, retains them in their several orbs, that they are not drawn down toward the sun. And again, their gravitating powers so incline them towards the sun, that they are not carried upwards beyond their due distance from him. These two great agents, a transverse impulse, and gravity, are the secondary causes, under God, that maintain the system of sun and planets. Gravity we understand to be a constant energy or faculty, perpetually acting by certain measures and naturally inviolable laws: we say, a faculty, and power; for we cannot conceive that the act of gravitation of this present moment can propagate itself, or produce that of the next. But the transverse impulse we conceive to have been one single act. For, by reason of the inactivity of matter, and its inability to change its present state either of moving or resting, that transverse motion would from one single impulse continue for ever equal and uniform, unless changed by the resistance of recurring bodies, or by a gravitating power. So that the planets, since they move horizontally, whereby gravity (doth not alter their swiftness) and through the liquid and unresisting spaces of the heavens, (where either no bodies at all or inconsiderable ones do occur,) may preserve the same velocity which the first impulse impressed upon them, not only for five or six thousand years, but many millions of millions. It appears then, that if there was but one vast sun in the universe, and all the rest were planets revolving around him in concentric orbs at convenient distances, such a system as that would very long endure, could it but naturally have a principle of mutual attraction; and be once actually put into circular motions. But the frame of the present world hath a quite different structure: here is an innumerable multitude of fixed stars or suns; all which being made up of the same common matter, must be supposed to be equally endued with a power of gravitation. For, if all have not such a power, what is it that could make that difference between bodies of the same sort? Nothing surely but a Deity could have so arbitrarily endued our sun and planets with a power of gravity not essential to matter; while all the fixed stars, that are so many suns, have nothing of that power. If the fixed stars then are supposed to have no power of gravitation, it is a plain proof of a divine Being. And it is as plain a proof of a divine Being, if they have the power of gravitation. For since they are neither revolved about a common centre, nor have any transverse impulse, what is there else to restrain them from approaching toward each other, as their gravitating power incites them? What natural cause can overcome nature itself? What is it that holds and keeps them in fixed stations and intervals against an incessant and inherent tendency to desert them? Nothing could hinder but that the outward stars, with their systems of planets, must necessarily have descended toward the middlemost system of the universe, whither all would be the most strongly attracted from all parts of a finite space. It is evident therefore, that the present frame of sun and fixed stars could not possibly subsist without the providence of that almighty Deity, [Psal. cxlviii.] who spake the word and they were made; who commanded and they were created; who hath made them fast for ever and ever, and hath given them a law, which shall not be broken.

2. And, secondly, in the supposition of an infinite chaos, it is hard indeed to determine what would follow in this imaginary case from an innate principle of gravity. But, to hasten to a conclusion, we will grant for the present, that the diffused matter might convene into an infinite number of great masses at great distances from one another, like the stars and planets of this visible part of the world. But then it is impossible, that the planets should naturally attain these circular revolutions, either by principle of gravitation, or by impulse of ambient bodies. It is plain, here is no difference as to this; whether the world be infinite, or finite: so that the same arguments that we have used before, may be equally urged in this supposition. And though we should concede, that these revolutions might be acquired, and that all were settled and constituted in the present state and posture of things; yet, we say, the continuance of this frame and order, for so long a duration as the known ages of the world, must necessarily infer the existence of God. For, though the universe was infinite, the now fixed stars could not be fixed, but would naturally converge together, and confound system with system; because, all mutually attracting, every one would move whither it was most powerfully drawn. This, they may say, is indubitable in the case of a finite world, where some systems must needs be outmost, and therefore be drawn toward the middle; but, when, infinite systems succeed one another through an infinite space, and none is either inward or outward; may not all the systems be situated in an accurate poise; and, because equally attracted on all sides, remain fixed and unmoved? But to this we reply; that unless the very mathematical centre of gravity of every system be placed and fixed in the very mathematical centre of the attractive power of all the rest, they cannot be evenly attracted on all sides, but must preponderate some way or other. Now he that considers what a mathematical centre is, and that quantity is infinitely divisible, will never be persuaded that such an universal equilibrium, arising from the coincidence of infinite centres, can naturally be acquired or maintained. If they say, that, upon the supposition of infinite matter, every system would be infinitely, and therefore equally attracted on all sides; and consequently would rest in an exact equilibrium, be the centre of its gravity in what position soever: this will overthrow their very hypothesis. For at this rate in an infinite chaos nothing at all could be formed; no particles could convene by mutual attraction; because every one there must have infinite matter around it, and therefore must rest for ever, being evenly balanced between infinite attractions. Even the planets upon this principle must gravitate no more toward the sun than any other way; so that they would not revolve in curve lines, but fly away in direct tangents, till they struck against other planets or stars in some remote regions of the infinite space. An equal attraction on all sides of all matter is just equal to no attraction at all; and, by this means all the motion in the universe must proceed from external impulse alone; which we have proved before to be an incompetent cause for the formation of a world.

And now, O thou almighty and eternal Creator, (Psal. viii.) having considered the heavens, the work of thy fingers, the moon and the stars which thou hast ordained, with all the company of heaven, we laud and magnify thy glorious name; evermore praising thee and saying, Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of hosts, heaven and earth are full of thy glory. Glory be to thee, O Lord most high.

SERMON IV.

By RICHARD BENTLEY, D.D.

[Preached Dec. the 5th, 1692.]

Acts xiv. 15--17.

That ye should turn from these vanities unto the living God, who made heaven and earth, and the sea, and all things that are therein: who in times past suffered all nations to walk in their own ways. Nevertheless, he left not himself without witness, in that he did good, and gave us rain from heaven, and fruitful seasons, filling our hearts with food and gladness.

HAVING abundantly proved in our last exercise, that the frame of the present world could neither be made nor preserved without the power of God, we shall now consider the structure and motions of our own system, if any characters of divine wisdom and goodness may be discoverable by us. And even at the first and general view it very evidently appears to us (which is our fourth and last proposition) that the order and beauty of the systematical parts of the world, the discernible ends and final causes of them, the vis maior or meliority above what was necessary to be, do evince by a reflex argument, that it could not be produced by mechanism or chance, but by an intelligent and benign agent, that by his excellent wisdom made the heavens.

But, before we engage in this disquisition, we must offer one necessary caution; that we need not nor do not confine and determine the purposes of God in creating all mundane bodies, merely to human ends and uses. Not that we believe it laborious and painful to Omnipotence to create a world out of nothing; or more laborious to create a great world, than a small one; so as we might think it disagreeable to the majesty and tranquillity of the divine nature to take so much pains for our sakes. Nor do we count it any absurdity, that such a vast and immense universe should be made for the sole use of such mean and unworthy creatures as the children of men. For, if we consider the dignity of an intelligent being, and put that in the scales against brute inanimate matter, we may affirm, without overvaluing human nature, that the soul of one virtuous and religious man is of greater worth and excellency than the sun and his planets, and all the stars in the world. If therefore it could appear, that all the mundane bodies are some way conducive to the service of man; if all were as beneficial to us, as the polar stars were formerly for navigation; as the moon is for the flowing and ebbing of tides, by which an inestimable advantage accrues to the world; for her officious courtesy in long winter nights, especially to the more northern nations, who, in a continual night it may be of a whole month, are so pretty well accommodated by the light of the moon reflected from frozen snow, that they do not much envy their antipodes a month's presence of the sun: if all the heavenly bodies were thus serviceable to us, we should not be backward to assign their usefulness to mankind, as the sole end of their creation. But we dare not undertake to shew, what advantage is brought to us by those innumerable stars in the galaxy and other parts of the firmament, not discernible by naked eyes, and yet each many thousand times bigger than the whole body of the earth. If you say they beget in us a great idea and veneration of the mighty author and governor of such stupendous bodies, and excite and elevate our minds to his adoration and praise; you say very truly and well. But would it not raise in us a higher apprehension of the infinite majesty and boundless beneficence of God, to suppose that those remote and vast bodies were formed, not merely upon our account, to be peeped at through an optic glass, but for different ends and nobler purposes? And yet who will deny, but that there are great multitudes of lucid stars even beyond the reach of the best telescopes; and that every visible star may have opaque planets revolve about them, which we cannot discover? Now, if they were not created for our sakes, it is certain and evident, that they were not made for their own. For matter hath no life nor perception, is not conscious of its own existence, nor capable of happiness, nor gives the sacrifice of praise and worship to the author of its being. It remains therefore, that all bodies were formed for the sake of intelligent minds: and as the earth was principally detigned for the being and service and contemplation of men, why may not all other planets be created for the like uses, each for their own inhabitants which have life and understanding? If any man will indulge himself in this speculation, he need not quarrel with revealed religion upon such an account. The holy Scriptures do not forbid him to suppose as great a multitude of systems, and as much inhabited, as he pleases. It is true, there is no mention in Moses's narrative of the creation, of any people in other planets: but it plainly appears, that the sacred historian doth only treat of the origins of terrestrial animals: he hath given us no account of God's creating the angels; and yet the same author, in the ensuing parts of the Pentateuch, makes not unfrequent mention of the angels of God. Neither need we be solicitous about the condition of those planetary people, nor raise frivolous disputes, how far they may participate in the miseries of Adam's fall, or in the benefits of Christ's incarnation. As if, because they are supposed to be rational, they must needs be concluded to be men? For what is man? not a reasonable animal merely, for that is not an adequate and distinguishing definition; but a rational mind of such particular faculties, united to an organical body of such a certain structure and form, in such peculiar laws of connection between the operations and affections of the mind and the motions of the body. Now, God Almighty, by the inexhausted fecundity of his creative power, may have made innumerable orders and classes of rational minds; some in their natural perfections higher than human souls, others inferior. But a mind of superior or meaner capacities than human would constitute a different species, though united to a human body in the same laws of connection; and a mind of human capacities would make another species, if united to a different body in different laws of connection. For this sympathetical union of a rational soul with matter, so as to produce a vital communication between them, is an arbitrary constitution of the divine wisdom: there is no reason nor foundation in the separate natures of either substance, why any motion in the body should produce any sensation at all in the soul; or why this motion should produce that particular sensation, rather than any other. God therefore may have joined immaterial souls, even of the same class and capacities in their separate state, to other kind of bodies, and in other laws of union; and from those different laws of union there will arise quite different affections, and natures, and species of the compound beings. So that we ought not upon any account to conclude, that if there be rational inhabitants in the Moon, or Mars, or any unknown planets of other systems, they must therefore have human nature, or be involved in the circumstances of our world. And thus much was necessary to be here inculcated, (which will obviate and preclude the most considerable objections of our adversaries,) that we do not determine the final causes and usefulness of the systematical parts of the world, merely as they have respect to the exigencies or conveniences of human life.

Let us now turn our thoughts and imaginations to the frame of our system, if there we may trace any visible footsteps of divine wisdom and beneficence. But we are all liable to many mistakes by the prejudices of childhood and youth, which few of us ever correct by a serious scrutiny in our riper years, and a contemplation of the phenomena of nature in their causes and beginnings. What we have always seen to be done in one constant and uniform manner, we are apt to imagine there was but that one way of doing it, and it could not be otherwise. This is a great error and impediment in a disquisition of this nature; to remedy which, we ought to consider every thing as not yet in being, and then diligently examine if it must needs have been at all, or what other ways it might have been as possibly as the present; and if we find a greater good and utility in the present constitution, than would have accrued either from the total privation of it, or from other frames and structures that might as possibly have been as it; we may then reasonably conclude, that the present constitution proceeded, neither from the necessity of material causes, nor the blind shuffles of an imaginary chance, but from an intelligent and good Being, that formed it that particular way out of choice and design. And especially, if this usefulness be conspicuous not in one or a few instances only, but in a long train and series of things, this will give us a firm and infallible assurance, that we have not passed a wrong judgment.

I. Let us proceed therefore by this excellent rule in the contemplation of our system. It is evident that all the planets receive heat and light from the body of the sun. Our own earth in particular would be barren and desolate, a dead dark lump of clay, without the benign influence of the solar rays; which, without question, is true of all the other planets. It is good therefore, that there should be a sun, to warm and cherish the seeds of plants, and excite them to vegetation; to impart an uninterrupted light to all parts of this system for the subsistence of animals. But how came the sun to be luminous? not from the necessity of natural causes, or the constitution of the heavens. All the planets might have moved about him in the same orbs, and the same degrees of velocity, as now; and yet the sun might have been an opake and cold body like them. For, as the six primary planets revolve about him, so the secondary ones are moved about them; the Moon about the Earth, the satellites about Jupiter, and others about Saturn; the one as regularly as the other, in the same sesquilateral proportion of the times of their periodical revolutions to the semi-diameters of their orbs. So that, though we suppose the present existence and conservation of the system, yet the Sun might have been a body without light or heat, of the same kind with the Earth, and Jupiter, and Saturn. But then what horrid darkness and desolation must have reigned in the world! It had been unfit for the divine purposes in creating vegetable, and sensitive, and rational creatures. It was therefore the contrivance and choice of a wise and good Being, that the central Sun should be a lucid body, to communicate warmth, and light, and life to the planets around him.

II. We have shewed in our last, that the concentric revolutions of the planets about the Sun proceed from a compound motion; a gravitation towards the Sun, which is a constant energy infused into matter by the Author of all things, and a projected transverse impulse in tangents to their several orbs, that was impressed at first by the divine arm, and will carry them around till the end of the world. But now, admitting that gravity may be essential to matter, and that a transverse impulse might be acquired too by natural causes; yet, to make all the planets move about the Sun in circular orbs, there must be given to each a determinate impulse; these present particular degrees of velocity which they now have, in proportion to their distances from the Sun and to the quantity of the solar matter. For had the velocities of the several planets been greater or less than they are now, at the same distances from the Sun; or had their * distances from the Sun, or the quantity of the Sun's matter, and consequently his attractive power, been greater or less than they are now, with the same velocities; they would not have revolved in concentric circles as they do, but have moved in hyperbolas, or in ellipses very eccentric. The same may be said of the velocities of the secondary planets with respect to their distances from the centres of their orbs, and to the quantities of the matter of those central bodies. Now that all these distances, and motions, and quantities of matter should be so accurately and harmoniously adjusted in this great variety of our system, is above the fortuitous hits of blind material causes, and must certainly flow from that eternal fountain of wisdom, the Creator of heaven and earth, who † always acts geometrically, by just and adequate numbers, and weights, and measures. And let us examine it further by our critical rule: Are the present revolutions in circular orbs more beneficial than the other would be? If the planets had moved in those lines above named, sometimes they would have approached to the Sun as near as the orb of Mercury, and sometimes have exorbitated beyond the distance of Saturn; and some have quite left the Sun without ever returning. Now the very constitution of a planet would be corrupted and destroyed by such a change of the interval between it and the Sun; no living thing could have endured such unspeakable excesses of heat and cold; all the animals of our earth must inevitably have perished, or rather never have been. So that as sure as it is (Gen. i.) good, very good, that human nature should exist; so certain it is that the circular revolutions of the earth, (and planets,) rather than those other motions, which might as possibly have been, do declare not only the power of God, but his wisdom and goodness.

* Newton. Philosoph. Natural. Principia Math.

† O Sides & quædam. Plat.

MI. It is manifest, by our last discourse, that the ethereal spaces are perfectly fluid; they neither assist nor retard, neither guide nor divert the revolutions of the planets, which roll through those regions as free and unresisted as if they moved in a vacuum: so that any of them might as possibly have moved in opposite courses to the present, and in planes crossing the plane of the ecliptic in any kind of angles. Now, if the system had been fortuitously formed by the convening matter of a chaos, how is it conceivable that all the planets, both primary and secondary, should revolve the same way, from the west to the east, and that in the same plane too, without any considerable variation? No natural and necessary cause could so determine their motions; and it is millions of millions of millions odds to an unit in such a cast of a chance. Such an apt and regular harmony, such an admirable order and beauty must deservedly be ascribed to divine art and conduct: especially if we consider, that the smallest planets are situated nearest the Sun and each other; whereas Jupiter and Saturn, that are vastly greater than the rest, and have many satellites about them, are wisely removed to the extreme regions of the system, and placed at an immense distance one from the other. For even now at this wide interval they are observed in their conjunctions to disturb one another's motions a little by their gravitating powers: but if such vast masses of matter had been situated much nearer to the Sun, or to each other, (as they might as easily have been, for any mechanical or fortuitous agent,) they must necessarily have caused a considerable disturbance and disorder in the whole system.

IV. But let us consider the particular situation of our earth, and its distance from the sun. It is now placed so conveniently, that plants thrive and flourish in it, and animals live; this is matter of fact, and beyond all dispute. But how came it to pass at the beginning, that the earth moved in its present orb? We have shewn before, that if gravity and a projected motion be fitly proportioned, any planet would freely revolve at any assignable distance within the space of the whole system. Was it mere chance then, or divine counsel and choice, that constituted the earth in its present situation? To know this; we will enquire if this particular distance from the Sun be better for our earth and its creatures, than a greater or less would have been. We may be mathematically certain, that the heat of the Sun is according to the density of the sun-beams, and is reciprocally proportional to the square of the distance from the body of the Sun*. Now by this calculation, suppose the earth should be removed and placed nearer to the Sun, and revolve for instance in the orbit of Mercury; there the whole ocean would even boil with extremity of heat, and be all exhaled into vapours; all plants and animals would be scorched and consumed in that fiery furnace. But suppose the earth should be carried to the great distance of Saturn; there the whole globe would be one frigid zone; the deepest seas under the very equator would be frozen to the bottom; there would be no life, no germination, nor any thing that comes now under our knowledge or senses. It was much better therefore, that the earth should move where it does, than in a much greater or less interval from the body of the Sun. And if you place it at any other distance, either less or more than Saturn or Mercury, you will still alter it for the worse proportionally to the change. It was situated therefore where it is by the wisdom of some voluntary agent, and not by the blind motions of fortune or fate. If any one should think with himself, how then can any animal at all live in Mercury and Saturn in such intense degrees of heat and cold? Let him only consider, that the matter of each planet may have a different density, and texture, and form, which will dispose and qualify it to be acted on by greater or less degrees of heat according to their several situations; and that the laws of vegetation, and life, and sustenance and propagation, are the arbitrary pleasure of God, and may vary in all planets according to the divine appointment and the exigencies of things, in manners incomprehensible to our imaginations. It is enough for our purpose to discern the tokens of wisdom in the placing of our earth; if its present constitution would be spoiled and destroyed, if we could not wear flesh and blood, if we could not have human nature at those different distances.

V. We have all learnt from the doctrine of the sphere, that the earth revolves with a double motion. For, while it is carried around the sun in the orbis magnus once a year, it perpetually wheels about its own axis once in a day and a night; so that in twenty-four hours space it hath turned all the parts of the equinoctial to the rays of the sun. Now the uses of this vertiginous motion are very conspicuous; for this is it that gives day and night successively over the face of the whole earth, and makes it habitable all around. Without this diurnal rotation one hemisphere would lie dead and torpid in perpetual darkness and frost, and the best part of the other would be burnt up and depopulated by so permanent a heat. It is better therefore, that the earth should often move about its own centre, and make these useful vicissitudes of night and day, than expose always the same side to the action of the sun. But how came it to be so moved? Not from any necessity of the laws of motion, or the system of the heavens: it might annually have compassed the sun, and yet have always turned the same hemisphere towards it. This is matter of fact and experiment in the motion of the moon; which is carried about the earth in the very same manner as the earth about the sun, and yet always shews the same face to us. She indeed, notwithstanding this, turns all her globe to the sun by moving in her menstrual orb, and enjoys night and day alternately, one day of hers being equal to about fourteen days and nights of ours. But should the earth move in the same manner about the sun as the moon does about the earth, one half of it could never see the day, but must eternally be condemned to solitude and darkness. That the earth therefore frequently revolves about its own centre, is another eminent token of the divine wisdom and goodness.

VI. But let us compare the mutual proportion of these diurnal and annual revolutions; for they are distinct from one another, and have a different degree of velocity. The earth rolls once about its axis in a natural day; in which time all the parts of the equator move something more than three of the earth's diameters; which makes about 1100 in the space of a year. But within the same space of a year the centre of the earth is carried above fifty times as far once round the orbis magnus, whose wideness we now assume to be 20000 terrestrial diameters. So that the annual motion is more than fifty times swifter than the diurnal rotation, though we measure the latter from the equator, where the celerity is the greatest. But it must needs be acknowledged, since the earth revolves not upon a material and rugged, but a geometrical plane, that the proportions of the diurnal and annual motions may be varied in innumerable degrees; any of which might have happened as probably as the present. What was it then that prescribed this particular celerity to each motion; this proportion and temperament between them both? Let us examine it by our former rule, if there be any meliority in the present constitution; if any considerable change would be for the worse. We will suppose then, that the annual motion is accelerated doubly: so that a periodical revolution would be performed in six months. Such a change would be pernicious; not only because the earth could not move in a circular orb, which we have considered before; but because, the seasons being then twice as short as they are now, the cold winter would overtake us before our corn and fruits could possibly be ripe. But shall this motion be as much retarded, and the seasons lengthened in the same proportion? This too would be as fatal as the other; for in most countries the earth would be so parched and effete by the drought of the summer, that it would afford still but one harvest, as it doth at the present; which then would not be a sufficient store for the consumption of a year, that would be twice as long as now. But let us suppose, that the diurnal rotation be either considerably swifter or slower. And first, let it be retarded; so as to make (for example) but twelve circuits in a year: then every day and night would be as long as thirty are now, not so fitly proportioned neither to the common affairs of life, nor to the exigencies of sleep and sustenance in a constitution of flesh and blood. But, let it then be accelerated, and wheel a thousand times about its centre, while the centre describes one circle about the sun: then an equinoctial day would consist but of four hours, which would be an inconvenient change to the inhabitants of the earth: such hasty nights as those would give very unwelcome interruptions to our labours and journeys, and other transactions of the world. It is better therefore, that the diurnal and annual motions should be so proportioned as they are. Let it therefore be ascribed to the transcendent wisdom and benignity of that God, who hath made all things very good, and loveth all things that he hath made.

VII. But let us consider, not the quantity and proportion only, but the mode also of this diurnal motion. You must conceive an imaginary plane, which, passing through the centres of the sun and the earth, extends itself on all sides as far as the firmament: this plane is called the ecliptic; and, in this, the centre of the earth is perpetually carried without any deviation. But then the axis of the earth, about which its diurnal rotation is made, is not erect to this plane of the ecliptic, but inclines toward it from the perpendiculum, in an angle of twenty-three degrees and a half. Now, why is the axis of the earth in this particular posture, rather than any other? Did it happen by chance, or proceed from design? To determine this question, let us see, as we have done before, if this be more beneficial to us than any other constitution. We all know, from the very elements of astronomy, that this inclined position of the axis, which keeps always the same direction and a constant parallelism to itself, is the sole cause of these grateful and needful vicissitudes of the four seasons of the year, and the variation in length of days. If we take away the inclination, it would absolutely undo these northern nations; the sun would never come nearer us than he doth now on the tenth of March or twelfth of September. But would we rather part with the parallelism? Let us suppose then, that the axis of the earth keeps always the same inclination toward the body of the sun: this indeed would cause a variety of days and nights, and seasons on the earth; but then every particular country would have always the same diversity of day and night, and the same constitution of season without any alteration: some would always have long nights and short days, others again perpetually long days and short nights; one climate would be scorched and sweltered with everlasting dog-days, while an eternal December blasted another: this surely is not quite so good as the present order of seasons. But shall the axis rather observe no constant inclination to any thing, but vary and waver at uncertain times and places? This would be a happy constitution indeed. There could be no health, no life, nor subsistence in such an irregular system; by those surprising nods of the pole we might be tossed backward or forward in a moment from January to June; nay, possibly, from the January of Greenland to the June of Abyssinia. It is better therefore, upon all accounts, that the axis should be continued in its present posture and direction: so that this also is a signal character of divine wisdom and goodness.

But, because several have imagined, that this skue posture of the axis is a most unfortunate and pernicious thing; that, if the poles had been erect to the plane of the ecliptic, all mankind would have enjoyed a very paradise upon earth, a perpetual spring, an eternal calm and serenity, and the longevity of Methuselah without pains or diseases; we are obliged to consider it a little further. And first, as to the universal and perpetual spring, it is a mere poetical fancy, and (bating the equality of days and nights, which is a thing of small value) as to the other properties of a spring, it is naturally impossible, being repugnant to the very form of the globe : for, to those people that dwell under or near the equator, this spring would be a most pestilent and insupportable summer ; and as for those countries that are nearer the poles, in which number are our own and the most considerable nations of the world, a perpetual spring will not do their business ; they must have longer days, a nearer approach of the sun ; and a less obliquity of his rays ; they must have a summer and a harvest time too, to ripen their grain, and fruits, and vines, or else they must bid an eternal adieu to the very best of their sustenance. It is plain, that the centre of the earth must move all along in the orbis magnus ; whether we suppose a perpetual equinox, or an oblique position of the axis. So that the whole globe would continue in the same distance from the sun, and receive the same quantity of heat from him in a year or any assignable time, in either hypothesis. Though the axis then had been perpendicular, yet take the whole year about, and the earth would have had the same measure of heat that it has now. so that here lies the question, whether it is more beneficial, that the inhabitants of the earth should have the yearly quantity of heat distributed equally every day, or so disposed as it is ; a greater share of it in summer, and in winter a less ? It must needs be allowed, that the temperate zones have no heat to spare in summer ; It is very well if it be sufficient for the maturation of fruits. Now, this being granted, it is as certain and manifest, that an even distribution of the yearly heat would never have brought those fruits to maturity, as this is a known and familiar experiment, that such a quantity of fuel all kindled at once will cause water to boil, which being lighted gradually and successively will never be able to do it. It is clear therefore, that in the constitution of a perpetual equinox the best part of the globe would be desolate and useless : and, as to that little that could be inhabited, there is no reason to expect, that it would constantly enjoy that admired calm and serenity. If the assertion were true, yet some perhaps may think, that such a felicity, as would make navigation impossible, is not much to be envied. But it is altogether precarious, and has no necessary foundation neither upon reason nor experience. For the winds and rains and other affections of the atmosphere do not solely depend (as that assertion supposeth) upon the course of the sun ; but partly, and perhaps most frequently, upon steam and exhalations from subterraneous heat ; upon the positions of the moon, the situations of seas, or mountains, or lakes, or woods and many other unknown or uncertain causes. So that, though the course of the sun should be invariable, and never swerve from the equator ; yet the temperament of the air would be mutable nevertheless, according to the absence or presence, or various mixture of the other causes. The ancient philosophers, for many ages together, unanimously taught, that the torrid zone was not habitable. The reasons that they went upon were very specious and probable, till the experience of these latter ages evinced them to be erroneous. They argued from celestial causes only, the constant vicinity of the sun, and the directness of his rays ; never suspecting, that the body of the earth had so great an efficiency in the changes of the air ; and that then could be the coldest and rainiest season, the winter of the year, when the sun was the nearest of all, and steered directly over men's heads. Which is warning sufficient to deter any man from expecting such eternal serenity and halcyon days from so incompetent and partial a cause, as the constant course of the sun in the equinoctial circle. What general condition and temperament of air would follow upon that supposition we cannot possibly define ; for it is not caused by certain and regular motions, nor subject to mathematical calculations. But, if we may make a conjecture from the present constitution, we shall hardly wish for a perpetual equinox to save the charges of weather-glasses : for, it is very well known, that the months of March and September, the two equinoxes of our year, are the most windy and tempestuous, the most unsettled and unequal of seasons in most countries of the world. No if this notion of an uniform calm and serenity be false or precarious, then even the last supposed advantage, the constant health and longevity of men, must be given up also, as a groundless conceit: for this (according to the assertors themselves) doth solely, as an effect of nature, depend upon the other. Nay, further, though we should allow them their perpetual calm and equability of heat, they will never be able to prove, that therefore men would be so vivacious as they would have us believe. Nay, perhaps the contrary may be inferred, if we may argue from present experience: for the inhabitants of the torrid zone, who suffer the least and shortest recesses of the sun, and are within one step and degree of a perpetual equinox, are not only shorter lived (generally speaking) than other nations nearer the poles; but inferior to them in strength, and stature, and courage, and in all the capacities of the mind. It appears therefore, that the gradual vicissitudes of heat and cold are so far from shortening the thread of man's life, or impairing his intellectual faculties, that very probably they both prolong the one in some measure, and exalt and advance the other. So that still we do profess to adore the divine wisdom and goodness for this variety of seasons, for seed-time and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, [Gen. viii.]

VIII. Come we now to consider the atmosphere, and the exterior frame and face of the globe, if we may find any tracks and footsteps of wisdom in the constitution of them. I need not now inform you, that the air is a thin fluid body, endued with elasticity or springiness, and capable of condensation and rarefaction; * and, should it be much more expanded or condensed than it naturally is, no animals could live and breathe: it is probable also that the vapours could not be duly raised and supported in it; which at once would deprive the earth of all its ornament and glory, of all its living inhabitants and vegetables too. But it is certainly known and demonstrated, that the condensation and expansion of any portion of the air is always proportional to the weight and pressure incumbent upon it: so that if the atmosphere had been either much greater or less than it is, as it might easily have been, it would have had in its lowest region on the surface of the earth a much greater density or tenuity of texture, and consequently have been unserviceable for vegetation and life. It must needs therefore be an intelligent Being that could so justly adapt it to those excellent purposes. It is concluded by astronomers, that the atmosphere of the moon hath no clouds nor rains; but a perpetual and uniform serenity: because nothing discoverable in the lunar surface is ever covered and absconded from us by the interposition of any clouds or mists, but such as rise from our own globe. Now, if the atmosphere of our earth had been of such a constitution, there could nothing, that now grows or breathes in it, have been formed or preserved; human nature must have been quite obliterated out of the works of creation. If our air had not been a springy elastical body, no animal could have exercised the very function of respiration; and yet the ends and uses of respiration are not served by that springiness, but by some other unknown and singular quality. † For the air, that in exhausted receivers of air-pumps is exhaled from minerals, and flesh, and fruits, and liquors, is as true and genuine as to elasticity and density, or rarefaction, as that we respire in; and yet this factitious air is so far from being fit to be breathed in, that it kills animals in a moment, even sooner than the very absence of all air, than a vacuum itself. All which do infer the most admirable providence of the Author of nature, who foreknew the necessity of rains and dews to the present structure of plants, and the uses of respiration to animals; and therefore created those correspondent properties in the atmosphere of the earth.

IX. In the next place let us consider the ample provision of waters, those in exhausted treasures of the ocean: ‡ and, though some have grudged the great share that it takes of the surface of the earth, yet we shall propose this too as a conspicuous mark and character of the wisdom of God. For that we may not now say, that the vast Atlantic ocean is really greater riches, and of more worth to the world, than if it was changed into a fifth continent; and that the dry land is as yet much too big for its inhabitants; and that, before they shall want room by increasing and multiplying, there may be new heavens and a new earth: we dare venture to affirm, that these copious stores of waters are no more than necessary for the present constitution of our globe. For, is not the whole substance of all vegetables mere modified water? and consequently of all animals too; all which either feed upon vegetables, or prey upon one another. Is not an immense quantity of it continually exhaled by the sun, to fill the atmosphere with vapours and clouds, and feed the plants of the earth with the balm of dews, and the fatness of showers? It seems incredible at first hearing, that all the blood in our bodies should circulate in a trice, in a very few minutes; but, I believe it would be more surprising, if we knew the short and swift periods of the great circulation of water, that vital blood of the earth, which composeth and nourisheth all things. If we could but compute that prodigious mass of it that is daily thrown into the channel of the sea from all the rivers of the world; we should then know and admire how much is perpetually evaporated and cast again upon the continents to supply those innumerable streams. And indeed hence we may discover, not only the use and necessity, but the cause too of the vastness of the ocean. I never yet heard of any nation that complained they had too broad, or too deep, or too many rivers; or wished they were either smaller or fewer; they understand better than so, how to value and esteem those inestimable gifts of nature. Now, supposing that the multitude and largeness of rivers ought to continue as great as now, we can easily prove that the extent of the ocean could be no less than it is. For it is evident and necessary, (if we follow the most fair and probable hypothesis, that the origin of fountains is from vapours and rain,) that the receptacle of waters, into which the mouths of all those rivers must empty themselves, ought to have so spacious a surface, that as much water may be continually brushed off by the winds and exhaled by the sun, as (besides what falls again in showers upon its own surface) is brought into it by all the rivers. Now the surface of the ocean is just so wide, and no wider: for, if more was evaporated than returns into it again, the sea would become less; if less was evaporated, it would grow bigger. So that, because since the memory of all ages it hath continued at a stand without considerable variation: and if it hath gained ground upon one country, hath lost as much in another; it must consequently be exactly proportioned to the present constitution of rivers. How rash therefore and vain are those busy projectors in speculation, that imagine they could recover to the world many new and noble countries, in the most happy and temperate climates, without any damage to the old ones, could this same mass of the ocean be lodged and circumscribed in a much deeper channel; and within narrower shores! For, by how much they would diminish the present extent of the sea, so much they would impair the fertility, and fountains, and rivers of the earth: because the quantity of vapours, that must be exhaled to supply all these, would be lessened proportionally to the bounds of the ocean; for the vapours are not to be measured from the bulk of the water, but from the space of the surface. So that this also doth infer the superlative wisdom and goodness of God, that he hath treasured up the waters in so deep and spacious a storehouse, [Psal. cxxiv.] the place that he hath founded and appointed for them.

* X. * But some men are out of love with the features and mien of our earth; they do not like this rugged and irregular surface, these precipices and valleys, and the gaping channel of the ocean.

This with them is deformity, and rather carries the face of a ruin, or a rude and indigested lump of atoms that casually convened so, than a work of divine artifice. They would have the vast body of a planet to be as elegant and round as a factitious globe represents it; to be every where smooth and equable, and as plain as the Elysian fields. Let us examine what weighty reasons they have to disparage the present constitution of nature in so injurious a manner. Why, if we suppose the ocean to be dry, and that we look down upon the empty channel from some higher region of the air, how horrid, and ghastly, and unnatural would it look! Now, admitting this supposition, let us suppose too that the soil of this dry channel were covered with grass and trees in manner of the continent, and then see what would follow. If a man could be carried asleep and placed in the very middle of this dry ocean, it must be allowed that he could not distinguish it from the inhabited earth. For if the bottom should be unequal, with shelves, and rocks, and precipices, and gulfs: these, being now appeared with a vesture of plants, would only resemble the mountains and valleys that he was accustomed to before. But very probably he would wake in a large and smooth plain: for though the bottom of the sea were gradually inclined and sloping from the shore to the middle, yet the additional acclivity, above what a level would seem to have, would be imperceptible in so short a prospect as he could take of it: so that, to wake this man sensible what a deep cavity he was placed in, he must be carried so high in the air till he could see at one view the whole breadth of the channel, and so compare the depression of the middle with the elevation of the banks. But then a very small skill in mathematics is enough to instruct us, that, before he could arrive to that distance from the earth, all the inequality of surface would be lost to his view: the wide ocean would appear to him like an even and uniform plane, (uniform as to its level, though not as to light and shade,) though every rock of the sea was as high as the Pico of Teneriff. But, though we should grant that the dry gulf of the ocean would appear vastly hollow and horrible from the top of a high cloud, yet what a way of reasoning is this from the freaks of imagination, and impossible suppositions? Is the sea ever likely to be evaporated by the sun, or to be emptied with buckets? Why then must we fancy this impossible dryness; and then upon that fictitious account calumniate nature, as deformed and ruinous, and unworthy of a divine Author? Is there then any physical deformity in the fabric of a human body, because our imagination can strip it of its muscles and skin, and shew us the scragged and knotty backbone, the gaping and ghastly jaws, and all the skeleton underneath? We have shewed before, that the sea could not be much narrower than it is, without a great loss to the world: and must we now have an ocean of mere flats and shallows, to the utter ruin of navigation, for fear our heads should turn giddy at the imagination of gaping abysses and unfathomable gulfs? But however, they may say, the sea-shores at least might have been even and uniform, not crooked and broken as they are into innumerable angles, and creeks, and inlets, and bays, without beauty or order, which carry the marks more of chance and confusion, than of the production of a wise Creator. And would not this be a fine bargain indeed? to part with all our commodious ports and harbours, which the greater the inlet is are so much the better, for the imaginary pleasure of an open and straight shore without any retreat or shelter from the winds: which would make the sea of no use at all as to navigation and commerce. But what apology can we make for the horrid deformity of rocks and crags, of naked and broken cliffs, of long ridges of barren mountains, in the convenientest latitudes for habitation and fertility, could but those rude heaps of rubbish and ruins be removed out of the way? We have one general and sufficient answer for all seeming defects or disorders in the constitution of land or sea; that we do not contend to have the earth pass for a paradise, or to make a very heaven of our globe; we reckon it only as the land of our peregrination, and aspire after. [Heb. xi.] a better, and a celestial country. It is enough, if it be so framed and constituted, that by a careful contemplation of it we have great reason to acknowledge and adore divine wisdom and benignity of its Author. But, to wave this general reply, let the objectors consider, that these supposed irregularities must necessarily come to pass from the established laws of mechanism and the ordinary course of nature. For, supposing the existence of sea and mountains, if the banks of that sea must never be jagged and torn by the impetuous assaults or the silent undermining of waves; if violent rains and tempests must not wash down the earth and gravel from the tops of some of those mountains, and expose their naked ribs to the face of the sun; if the seeds of subterraneous minerals must not ferment, and sometimes cause earthquakes and furious eruptions of volcanos, and tumble down broken rocks, and lay them in confusion; then either all things must have been overruled miraculously by the immediate interposition of God, without any mechanical affections or settled laws of nature, or else the body of the earth must have been as fixed as gold, or as hard as adamant, and wholly unfit for human habitation. [Gen. i]. So that if it was good in the sight of God, that the present plants and animals, and human souls united to flesh and blood, should be upon this earth under a settled constitution of nature; these supposed inconveniences, as they were foreseen and permitted by the Author of that nature, as necessary consequences of such a constitution, so they cannot infer the least imperfection in his wisdom and goodness: and to murmur at them is as unreasonable as to complain that he hath made us men and not angels; that he hath placed us upon this planet, and not upon some other, in this or another system, which may be thought better than ours. Let them also consider, that this objected deformity is in our imaginations only, and not really in things themselves. There is no universal reason (I mean such as is not confined to human fancy, but will reach through the whole intellectual universe) that a figure by us called regular, which hath equal sides and angles, is absolutely more beautiful than any irregular one. All pulchritude is relative; and all bodies are truly and physically beautiful under all possible shapes and proportions, that are good in their kind, that are fit for their proper uses and ends of their natures. We ought not then to believe, that the banks of the ocean are really deformed, because they have not the form of a regular bulwark; nor that the mountains are out of shape, because they are not exact pyramids or cones; nor that the stars are unskilfully placed, because they are not all situated at uniform distance. These are not natural irregularities, but with respect to our fancies only; nor are they incommodious to the true uses of life and the designs of man's being on the earth. And let them further consider, that these ranges of barren mountains, by condensing the vapours, and producing rains, and fountains, and rivors, give the very plains and valleys themselves that fertility they boast of; that those hills and mountains supply us and the stock of nature with a great variety of excellent plants. If there were no inequalities in the surface of the earth, nor in the seasons of the year, we should lose a considerable share of the vegetable kingdom: for all plants will not grow in an uniform level and the same temper of soil, nor with the same degree of heat. Nay, let them lastly consider, that to those hills and mountains we are obliged for all our metals, and with them for all the conveniences and comforts of life. To deprive us of metals is to make us mere savages; to change our corn or rice for the old Arcadian diet, our houses and cities for dens and caves, and our clothing for skins of beasts; it is to bereave us of all arts and sciences, of history and letters; nay, of revealed religion too, that inestimable favour of heaven: for, without the benefit of letters, the whole Gospel would be a mere tradition and old cabala, without certainty, without authority. Who would part with these solid and substantial blessings for the little fantastical pleasantness of a smooth uniform convexity and rotundity of a globe? And yet the misfortune of it is, that the pleasant view of their imaginary globe, as well as the deformed spectacle of our true one, is founded upon impossible suppositions. For that equal convexity could never be seen and enjoyed by any man living. The inhabitants of such an earth could have only the short prospect of a little circular plane about three miles around them; though neither woods, nor hedges, nor artificial banks should intercept it: which little too would appear to have an acclivity on all sides from the spectators; so that every man would have the displeasure of fancying himself the lowest, and that he always dwelt and moved in a bottom. Nay, considering that in such a constitution of the earth they could have no means nor instruments of mathematical knowledge, there is great reason to believe, that the period of the final dissolution might overtake them, ere they would have known or had any suspicion that they walked upon a round ball. Must we therefore, to make this convexity of the earth discernible to the eye, suppose a man to be lifted up a great height in the air, that he may have a very spacious horizon under one view? But then again, because of the distance, the convexity and gibbousness would vanish away; he would only see below him a great circular flat, as level, to his thinking, as the face of the moon. Are there then such ravishing charms in a dull unvaried flat, to make a sufficient compensation [Deut. xxxiii. 15.] for the chief things of the ancient mountains, and for the precious things of the lasting hills? Nay, we appeal to the sentence of mankind, if a land of hills and valleys has not more pleasure too and beauty than an uniform flat? which flat, if ever it may be said to be very delightful, is then only, when it is viewed from the top of a hill. * What were the Tempe of Thessaly, so celebrated in ancient story for their unparalleled pleasantness, but a valle divided with a river, and terminated with hills? Are not all the descriptions of poets embellished with such ideas; when they would represent any places of superlative delight, any blissful seats of the muses or the nymphs, any sacred habitations of gods or goddesses? They will never admit that a wide flat can be pleasant, no not in the very Elysian fields; † but these too must be diversified with depressed valleys and swelling ascents. They cannot imagine ‡ even paradise to be a place of pleasure, nor heaven itself to be § heaven without them. Let this therefore be another argument of the divine wisdom and goodness, that the surface of the earth is not uniformly convex, (as many think it would naturally have been, if mechanically formed by a chaos,) but distinguished with mountains and valleys, and furrowed from pole to pole with the deep channel of the sea; and that, because of the το βελτιον, it is better that it should be so.

Give me leave to make one short inference from what has been said, which shall finish this present discourse, and with it our task for the year. We have clearly discovered many final causes and characters of wisdom and contrivance in the frame of the inanimate world; as well as in the organical fabric of the bodies of animals. Now, from hence ariseth a new and invincible argument, that the present frame of the world hath not existed from all eternity. For such an usefulness of things, or a fitness of means to ends, as neither proceeds from the necessity of their beings, nor can happen to them by chance, doth necessarily infer that there was an intelligent Being, which was the author and contriver of that usefulness. We have formerly demonstrated, that the body of a man, which consists of an incomprehensible variety of parts, all admirably fitted for their peculiar functions and the conservation of the whole, could no more be formed fortuitously than the Æneis of Virgil, or any other long poem with good sense and just measures, could be composed by the casual combinations of letters. Now, to pursue this comparison; as it is utterly impossible to be believed, that such a poem may have been eternal, transcribed from copy to copy without any first author and original; so it is equally incredible and impossible, that the fabric of human bodies, which hath such excellent and divine artifice, and, if I may so say, such good sense and true syntax and harmonious measures in its constitution, should be propagated and transcribed from father to son without a first parent and creator of it. An eternal usefulness of things, an eternal good sense, cannot possibly be conceived without an eternal wisdom and understanding. But that can be no other than that eternal and omnipotent God; [Prov. iii.] that by wisdom hath founded the earth, and by understanding hath established the heavens: to whom be all honour, and glory, and praise, and adoration, from henceforth and for evermore. Amen.

SERMON V.

By RICHARD BENTLEY, D. D.

[Preached at the Public Commencement at Cambridge, July 5th, 1696.]

Of Revelation and the Messias.

1 PET. iii. 15.

Be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you.

By the hope that is in us, we do understand here, as in other places of Scripture, not only the bare hope strictly so called, but the faith too of a Christian. Whence it is, that in the Syriac version of the text, and in some ancient Latin copies, the word faith is added to the other; the hope and the faith that is in you. And indeed, if we consider hope as a natural passion, we shall find it to be always attended and ushered in by faith. For, it is certain there is no hope without some antecedent belief that the thing hoped for may come to pass; and the strength and steadiness of our hope is ever proportional to the measure of our faith. It appears therefore why the word hope in the text may with sufficient propriety of speech comprehend the whole faith of a Christian: and that, when the Apostle exhorts us to be ready always to answer every man that asks the reason of our hope, it is the same, as if he enjoined us to be never unprepared nor unwilling to reply to any doubts or questions about the grounds of the Christian faith.

At the date of this epistle the whole world (with relation to the text) might be considered under one general division, Jews and Gentiles. First, the Jews, [Rom. iii. 2.] to whom the oracles of God were committed, and who from thence had the information and expectation of the Messias. These, when they asked a Christian the reason of his hope, were themselves already persuaded that the Messias would come: and the only controversy between them was, Whether Jesus was he? according to the message of John the Baptist, [Luke vii. 19.] Was Jesus he that should come, or must they look for another? Secondly, the Gentiles, who having no means of knowledge besides mere natural reason, could have no notions nor notices of this expected Messias: these therefore, when they demanded the reason of a Christian's hope, were first to be acquainted with the purpose and promise of God to send the Messias; were to be instructed about the reasons and designs of that great embassy: about his quality and office, and all the circumstances of his person: and then was the proper time to shew, that Jesus was he; that the description of the Messias was truly exhibited and represented in his character; and the ancient prophecies all accomplished in his actions and events.

It is not for nothing that the Apostle so presseth this advice in the text, Be ready always to give a reason of the hope that is in you: as if he had foretold, that there would be no age of the Christian world, wherein this preparation would be superfluous. It hath pleased the divine wisdom never yet to leave Christianity wholly at leisure from opposers; but to give its professors that perpetual exercise of their industry and zeal. And who can tell, if, without such adversaries to rouse and quicken them, they might not in long tract of time have grown remiss in the duties, and ignorant in the doctrines of religion? Perhaps before this time even some of the records of it might have perished by men's negligence; as the Jews had like to have lost their law, if divine Providence had not preserved one copy of it in the temple. It is [Matth. xiii. 25.] while men sleep, while they live in peace and security, and have no enemies to contest with, that the great enemy comes and sows tares among the wheat. But, of all the ages since the coming of Christ, I suppose this present has least reason to complain for want of work and employment in defence of religion. Here are not only the two parties in the text, Jews and Gentiles, still in the world to engage with; but even in the midst of Christianity are the most dangerous designs formed against it; as if our Saviour's prediction of particular families were to be verified too of the whole church, [Matth. x. 36.] that its worst enemies should be they of its own household.

There are a sort of persons baptized indeed into the Christian faith, and educated in the profession of it: but in secret, I wish I might say so, nay even openly they oppose and blaspheme it: repudiating at once the whole authority of revelation, and debasing the sacred volumes to the rank of ordinary books of history and ethics. The being of God and a Providence they profess to believe; to acknowledge a difference between good and evil; to be verily persuaded of another life to come; and to have their expectations of that state, as their behaviour is in this. Nay, even the whole system of Christian morals they can willingly embrace; but not as a collection of divine statutes and ordinances sent us by an express from heaven, but only as useful rules of life, discoverable by plain reason, and agreeable to natural religion. So that they cannot see the mighty occasion that should invite even the eternal Son of God from the bosom of the Father, to act so mean and calamitous a part upon the stage of this sorry world. What need of so great a master to read mankind lectures of morals, which they might easily learn without any teacher? It is true, they are often told of some sublime mysterious doctrines delivered by him, which they own would never have been thought of by natural reason. But then, that is so far from recommending to them the importance of his errand from heaven, that for that very reason they deny the truth of his message. For whatever comes imperiously in the name of divine mystery, and soars above the pitch of human knowledge; whatsoever things they cannot fathom and grasp through all the causes, designs, modes and relations of them, as the notion of the Messiah, his incarnation, mediation, satisfaction; all these they reject and explode, as incomprehensible to pure reason, which they set up as the only principle and measure of belief.

In all this, these persons act the part, and place themselves in the condition of Gentiles, whom we may imagine, in the text, to ask the reason of a Christian's hope; since the whole body of these men's religion is no more than what even heathens attained to: the modern Deism being the very same with old philosophical Paganism, only aggravated and damned with the additional crime of apostasy from the faith. But, besides this, these very persons will on other occasions personate the Jews too, those other enquirers supposed in the text, and dispute with Jewish objections against the Christian religion; though they no more believe the matter of those objections, than the thing they object against; like Celsus and Julian of old, that gathered arguments against the Christians from all the different sects and hypotheses of philosophy, though inconsistent one argument with another; and brought objections too from the Old Testament, which they did not believe, against the New one, which they were engaged by all methods to oppose.

In our present discourse, therefore, we shall endeavour to refute these modern adversaries under their double shape and character: First, as they are mere Deists or Pagans, renouncing all revelation, and the very notion of the Messiah; and, Secondly, as they fight under Jewish colours: so as admitting there be a promised Messiah, the Saviour of the world, yet ~~men~~ ought to reject the person of Jesus, and still to wait for another.

I. And, first, we shall consider them in the quality of Deists and disciples of mere natural reason. We profess ourselves as much concerned, and as truly as themselves are, for the use and authority of reason in controversies of faith. We look upon right reason as the native lamp of the soul, placed and kindled there by our Creator, to conduct us in the whole course of our judgments and actions. True reason, like its divine Author, never is itself deceived, nor ever deceives any man. * Even revelation itself is not shy nor unwilling to ascribe its own first credit and fundamental authority to the test and testimony of reason. Sound-reason is the touchstone to distinguish that pure and genuine gold from baser metals; revelation truly divine, from imposture and enthusiasm: so that the Christian religion is so far from declining or fearing the strictest trials of reason, that it every where appeals to it; is defended and supported by it, and indeed cannot continue, in the Apostle's description, [James i. 27.] pure and undefiled without it. It is the benefit of reason alone, under the Providence and Spirit of God, that we ourselves are at this day a reformed Orthodox Church; that we departed from the errors of Popery, and that we knew too where to stop; neither running into the extravagancies of fanaticism, nor sliding into the indifferency of libertinism. Whatsoever therefore is inconsistent with natural reason, can never be justly imposed as an article of faith. That the same body is in many places at once, that plain bread is not bread; such things, though they be said with never so much pomp, and claim to infallibility, we have still greater authority to reject them, as being contrary to common sense and our natural faculties; as subverting the foundations of all faith, even the grounds of their own credit, and all the principles of civil life.

So far are we from contending with our adversaries about the dignity and authority of reason; but then we differ with them about the exercise of it, and the extent of its province. For the Deists there stop, and set bounds to their faith, where reason, their only guide, does not lead the way further, and walk along before them. We on the contrary, as [Deut. xxxiv.] Moses was shewn by divine power a true sight of the promised land, though himself could not pass over to it; so we think reason may receive from revelation some further discoveries and new prospects of things, and be fully convinced of the reality of them: though itself cannot pass on, nor travel those regions; cannot penetrate the fund of those truths, nor advance to the utmost bounds of them. For there is certainly a wide difference between what is contrary to reason, and what is superior to it, and out of its reach. To give an instance in created nature, how many things are there whose being we cannot doubt of, though unable to comprehend the manner of their being so? That the human soul is vitally united to the body by a reciprocal commerce of action and passion; this we all consciously feel and know, and our adversaries will affirm it; let them tell us then what is the chain, the cement, the magnetism, what they will call it, the invisible tie of that union, whereby matter and an incorporeal mind, things that have no similitude nor alliance to each other, can so sympathize by a mutual league of motion and sensation? No, they will not pretend to that; for they can frame no conceptions of it. They are sure there is such an union, from the operations and effects; but the cause and the manner of it are too subtle and secret to be discovered by the eye of reason: it is mystery, it is divine magic, it is a natural miracle. If then in created beings they are content with us to confess their ignorance of the modes of existence, without doubting of things themselves; have not we much more reason to be humble and modest in speculations about the essence of God; about the reasons of his counsels, and the ways of his actions? Yes certainly, under those circumstances we may believe with reason even things above and beyond reason.

For example: If we have sure ground to believe that such a book is the revelation of God; and we find in it propositions expressed in plain words, of a determinate sense without ambiguity, so as they cannot be otherwise interpreted, by any just metaphor or fair construction allowed in common language; we say we have sufficient reason to assent to those propositions, as divine doctrines and infallible truths, so far as they are declared there, though perhaps we cannot ourselves comprehend, nor demonstrate to others the reasons and the manner of them. Neither is this an easy credulity, or unworthy of the most cautious and morose searcher of truth. For observe, we do not say, any thing incomprehensible to reason is separate and alone a proper object of belief; but as it is supported and established by some other known and comprehensible truth: as if Abraham had been told by some ordinary man, that in his and Sarah's decrepit age he should be blessed with a son; this promise, so alone, without its basis to stand on, could not have challenged his assent, because the thing was impossible in the way of nature; but since it was God Almighty, (Matt. xix. 26.) with whom all things are possible, that was the author of that promise, by the mediation of that certain truth, the veracity and omnipotence of God, without hesitation he believed, and so obtained the glory to be (Rom. iv. 11.) father of the faithful. And upon the same grounds the blessed Virgin gave credit to the salutation of the angel, though the message in itself seemed impossible to reason. So true it is, that reason itself warrants us to proceed and advance by faith, even beyond the sphere and regions of reason. We agree then with our adversaries about the authority of reason; but we dissent about the exercise of it, and the bounds of its jurisdiction. We believe even the abstrusest mysteries of the Christian religion, of which mysteries perhaps we can assign no reasons, but for our belief we assign a good one; because they are plainly taught in the word of God, who can neither err nor deceive. And this we affirm to be a reasonable conclusion, though it carry us even to the confines of heaven, beyond the limits of reason. But, if the Deists think to oblige us to give a natural account of those mysteries, without the authority of Scripture; for that we must beg their excuse. We will argue from strict reason, as much as they can pretend to; but we must not submit that our adversaries shall confine us to improper topics and impossible ways of proof.

It appears therefore, that though we should decline and despair to give any account at all of the reasons and methods of God's counsel in the mission of his Son, and only appeal to the sentence of Scripture, yet the Deists ought to be satisfied with that proof, since the doctrine is so expressly taught in the oracles of God. But, besides this, what if even natural light shall discover to us some faint, but yet certain views of that mysterious instance of divine wisdom and goodness; and exhibit to us a rational account, why the Son of God should condescend to be our Mediator and Redeemer? But, before we engage in this attempt, let it be lawful to implore the candour of our friends: if, while we endeavour to win over our enemies, we may seem to some, to do too little; or perhaps to others, to venture too far, and to advance beyond our lines. To discern then some reasons of this wonderful mystery, we must take our prospect from the highest mountain of nature, from the first creation, and origin of human race.

God, who at the beginning viewed all the works of his hands, (Gen. i. 31.) and behold, all things were very good; made man also upright and complete, without any defect in his whole composition; without any original perverseness of soul, or false bias of will or judgment; without any natural obliquity or enormity of inclinations. He made him an intelligent being, to know God and himself; to understand and feel present happiness, and to secure it by consideration and contrivance for the future. He endowed him with liberty of mind, that he might act, not of necessity, nor blind instinct like the brutes; but with consciousness and voluntary choice. He implanted in him diverse appetites and affections, all useful instruments of his happiness, if fitly employed: and none vicious and culpable radically, and in their whole nature, but then only, when they are applied to wrong objects, or in right ones are raised or sunk beside their due temper and measure. I say it again, for the justification of our Creator, that not one of the simple affections of the soul, no not concupiscence, hatred, anger, revenge, are in themselves criminal and sinful. Some of the affections, it is true, have very bad names; but those are either mere excesses of simple passions, or else mixed and compound ones, which have no proper real essence, but are only notional terms; as envy, for example, a very bad thing indeed; but it is an evil of our own product, and not of God's creating. For the real constituent parts of it are hatred and grief, very useful and lawful affections; but the evil of it is our own; when we entertain that hatred and grief at the good that befalls others; which is what we express by the complex name of envy.

God therefore having so created man, in every capacity pure and perfect, might justly require of him that he should maintain and preserve this original rectitude; that in all his desires, designs and actions, he should constantly adhere to the dictates of reason and nature; so as the least deviation would make him obnoxious to God's displeasure, and nothing less than complete obedience recommend him to his favour: according to the terms proposed to Cain, (Gen. iv. 7) If thou dost well, shalt thou not be accepted? and if thou dost not well, sin lies at the door. God, I say, might expect and require of man such a perfect obedience to the law of nature; because it was both reasonable and possible for man to perform it. Reasonable it was, because every statute of that law promotes the true interest and felicity of mankind, even in the very performance. It is true, in the present posture of human affairs, a man's duty is frequently inconsistent with his temporal interest. But from the beginning it was not so: neither would it be now, if the whole world at once could be just and innocent. For it is not my keeping the law, but another's transgressing it, that involves me in any misery. The scope and tendency of the law itself is always mine and every man's advantage. For it is not a thing foreign and alien to our nature, imposed on us purely to try our obedience, but it all results from our very frame and constitution. The general preservation of man's natural good is the sole root and fountain of the moral; the universal profit and pleasure, the public happiness of human life, gives being and denomination to every virtue and vice; and the true rules and directions to preserve and secure that happiness make up the whole volume, the code and pandect of the law of nature. Without doubt then it was reasonable to obey where nothing was commanded us but to pursue our own interest; nothing forbidden us but, not to do ourselves harm. And secondly, it was possible for man to perform that entire obedience. For since, as we have proved before, all his natural faculties are right and good, and the law itself accommodated and proportioned to those faculties, there appears no necessary intrinsic impediment, why he may not adequately observe it. If every particular precept be possible to be done, it is not absolutely impossible to fulfil the universal. And methinks they, that on other accounts acknowledge that God requires such perfect obedience upon the terms of the law of nature, should be very averse from believing that there is a natural and fundamental insufficiency in man to perform it. For certainly the just God cannot be so importune and unreasonable a master as to enjoin us what is physically impossible: to expect to reap where he has not sown, to require bricks without allowance of straw.

But then, though there was no such original and natural disability in man, yet there arose a moral and circumstantial one; an accidental incapacity supervening to his nature, an impossibility from event, that ever any person from the beginning of the world to the last period of it (always excepting the man Christ Jesus) should be wholly pure and free from the contagion of sin. For, our first parents having fallen from their native state of innocence, the tincture of evil, like an hereditary disease, infected all their posterity: and the leaven of sin having once corrupted the whole mass of mankind, all the species ever after would be soured and tainted with it; the vicious ferment perpetually diffusing and propagating itself through all generations. For, let us but consider the state of human life; first, a perpetual conversation among evil examples, and the strongest principle of our nature, imitation; and then, the ignorance and prejudices of childhood, the fervour and temerity of youth, the force and the frequency of temptations, and the narrow dubious confines between virtue and vice; and we may pronounce it impossible, that any man should so govern his steps through all the lubricous paths of life, as never once to slip and fall from his duty. Agreeably to the testimony of Scripture, which hath concluded all under sin, Gal. iii. 22. and again, (1 John i. 8.) If we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us; and again, (Rom. iii. 9, 23.) Both Jews and Gentiles are all under sin; all have sinned and come short of the glory of God. (Rom. iii. 19.) Every mouth then be stopped; and all the world must plead guilty before the tribunal of God; for by the deeds of the law (the law of nature as well as of Moses) no flesh can be justified in his sight. It is evident then from the principles of pure reason, beside the authority of Scripture, that upon the Deist's hypothesis, upon the terms of natural religion, no salvation can be obtained; no life and immortality can be expected: for, that being the free offer and favour of God, he might justly set what price he pleased upon it, even the greatest that we can possibly pay; nothing less than entire obedience, than unspotted innocence, than consummate virtue.

Thus far then even reason evinceth, and holds the lamp to revelation. Some means of reconciliation between God and man, the judge and the offender, must be contrived; some vicarious satisfaction to justice, and model of a new covenant; or else the whole bulk of mankind are for ever unhappy. And surely to prevent that, to retrieve a perishing world, was a weighty concern; even of greater importance than the very creating it, and more worthy of the care and consult of Heaven; I say, the care of Heaven, for, alas! here on earth what expedient could man find out? How could dust and ashes take upon him to speak unto the Lord? Could any of the sons of Adam presume to be advocate for the rest? himself one of the criminals, himself in want of another advocate? And what friend knew we at the court of heaven, of that high power and favour with God, as to offer his intercession? or so wonderfully kind to us, as to pay our satisfaction? We must freely own to the Deist, that here reason was at a stand; even nature herself languished between hope and despair; and, in the style of the Apostle, (Rom. viii. 22.)

the whole creation travelled in pain together; when behold, (what revelation hath informed and assured us of,) the eternal Son of the Almighty, (Heb. i. 3.) the brightness of the paternal glory, and the express image of his substance, even he vouchsafed to be our patron and mediator; to take our nature upon him, and to dwell among men; to fulfil that law of righteousness wherein we were deficient; to bear our guilt and our burden upon himself, and to offer his most precious blood as an expiation for our offences, as the seal of a new covenant better than the law of nature; a covenant of more gracious terms, terms of repentance and remission of sins; so that if we truly believe in him, and sincerely endeavour to observe his commands, our imperfect righteousness, through the merits of his sufferings, shall be imputed, accepted and rewarded as if it were an entire obedience to the strict law of works and of natural perfection.

And now I dare presume to ask even our adversaries themselves, what flaws or fallacies they can shew in all this. If it be true then, that reason itself discovers such absolute necessity of some way of reconciliation between God and man; and if it was necessary for man, as being the party concerned, to know the particular way that God did approve and accept of; and if mere reason could never find that out, but revelation alone must and ought to inform us; and lastly, if such revelation be actually made, attested, and promulgated to the world, what pretence is there left, why we should not believe and acquiesce in it? if, upon examination, it bear all the marks of true revelation; if it contain nothing unworthy of itself, and of the wisdom and goodness of its author.

And, is not the economy of man's salvation, as it is set forth in holy Scriptures, every way agreeable to that divine character? No, if we ask our adversaries, it is an improper and unequal method; it is inconsistent with the justice and impartiality of God. Rex Jupiter omnibus idem. God, say they, if he had designed such an universal benefit for mankind, would have exhibited it equally and indifferently to every age and nation alike: but the conditions of salvation proposed in the gospel are incompetent and much too narrow; being restrained to those times and countries alone, that can hear of the fame of Jesus, and believe in his person. And what becomes then of all the former ages of men before he was born? what of those remote nations ever since, that could have no intelligence of him, nor hear the least tidings of Judea and Jerusalem? Must all those myriads of souls perish for invincible ignorance, for want of impossible faith? [Rom. x. 14.] For how could they believe on him of whom they had not heard? and how could they hear without a preacher? And why should the God of the whole earth, the God that is no respecter of persons, no, nor of nations, be so unaccountably kind, as unjustly fond and partial, to any single country; much less to a little obscure people, the Jews, scarce heard of in the rest of the world till they were captives and slaves in it; and withdraw his paternal love from so many other nations, much more considerable, and more worthy of his providence? (Rom. iii. 29.) Is he God of the Jews only? is he not also of the Gentiles?

This way of discourse we may expect from the Deists; and I hope, according to the advice of the text, we are both able and ready to give a reply. For, first, as to that imagined partiality of God, in preferring any one country, before the rest of the world, to be the land of Christ's nativity; what a poor and contemptible cavil! for, upon supposition that the Messiah of God was to take human nature upon him, and be born of a woman, must he not of necessity be born in some one particular country, exclusively to all the rest? And is not that then a ridiculous objection against any single country, that may equally be urged against all whatsoever?

Neither was it mere fondness in the Deity, that he chose the obscure land of Palestine for the birthplace of his Son, rather than Greece or Italy, or Asia, the theatres of art and learning, and the seats of empire: for not to mention Abraham and the Patriarchs, whose singular faith and piety justly obtained of God, that their posterity should have (Rom. ix. 4.) adoption and the glory, and the covenants and the promises, and the consanguinity of Christ; it appears also from event, that the circumstances of that nation were of all others the most suitable to the design of the Messias. For, since it was fit and necessary that prophecies should foretell of him long before his coming; that his pedigree and extraction should be accurately deduced through a long series of ancestors, and other such marks be assigned of him, that men might know, this was he: what more proper to those purposes than the state of the Jews, that peculiar people, secluded and distinguished one tribe from another, and the whole from all the rest of mankind, by the very frame of their polity? so that the genealogies were less confused, the histories and prophecies more faithfully recorded, and the accomplishment of all more certain and illustrious than they could have been in any other nation upon earth; all of which, within that long compass of time, were blended together by mutual commerce and mutual conquest, and other omnifarious of mixture and confusion.

And then, as to that other surmise, that God would have proposed fair and equal means of general salvation, and not upon such narrow and insufficient terms as an actual faith in the person of Jesus; a condition impossible to the much greater part of mankind: we acknowledge it to be true, infallibly true; faith in Christ Jesus the only way to salvation since the preaching of the Gospel: so as whosoever rejects that when it is duly declared to him, and refuses his assent and obedience to it, can have no portion in the kingdom of heaven. But for those that never once heard of the Lord of life, that is an undecided case which we do not determine. For who has authority to give sentence, where God and Scripture are silent? Thus far we are assured there, that let the future condition of those be as God pleases, at least he will not condemn them for invincible ignorance: (Rom. ii. 11, 12.) for there is no respect of persons with him; but as many as have sinned without law, shall perish without law. The meaning whereof is, that the Gentile world shall not be judged and condemned for the breach of the law of Moses, which never was given them; but for sins against the law of nature, and the common light of conscience. We may infer then by parity of argument, that as many as shall sin without the Gospel, shall perish without the Gospel; that is, not because they believed not in Jesus, whom they had not the least notice of: but they will be tried and sentenced for sins against natural reason, for things within their power and capacity: [Rom. i. 18, 20, 21.] because when they knew God, they glorified him not as God; because they held the truth in unrighteousness, so that they are without excuse.

But, if the Deist shall still insist that though we have justified God from the calumny, as if he would condemn the Gentiles for want of impossible faith, yet still he maintains it to be unjust and incredible, that while one small part of mankind enjoys the favour of the Gospel, all under the state of nature shall have the hard measure of summum jus; must all be damned by rigid inflexible justice, without equity or mercy, without any act of pardon, or the least room for repentance: if he will rather obstinately believe, or hope, or wish, that the God of tender compassions, who loveth all things that he hath made, who will not require much where little has been given, cannot be so extreme with the Gentile world as to mark all that is done amiss, and yet to slight and overlook those shining examples of virtue not unfrequent among them: if this be all he sticks at, God forbid that on this single account he should exclude himself from the communion of faith. We can allow him this opinion, as at worst a charitable error; as some indication of a large heart, and a generous love of mankind. But then he must always remember, that even those virtuous heathens, whom he would so gladly place in some part of heaven, can be saved on no other account than by the merits and mediation of Jesus their saviour. For without his satisfaction there is no remission of sins nor acceptance of repentance; and without remission of sins (Rom. iii. 20.) by the deeds of the law and natural righteousness no flesh can be justified in the sight of God. They are saved therefore, if they be saved at all, by the sole benefit of Christ, though in this life, they could not know nor thank their benefactor. For though they lived in the earliest ages of time, long before his incarnation, yet even then they might be [1 Pet. i. 20.] purified by the blood of the Lamb, manifested indeed in latter times, but pre-ordained before the foundation of the world: so that from the first origin of it he might extend and impart, to all that were worthy, the efficacy of his merits, and the privileges of faith and grace, and a share in the inheritance of glory and immortality.

II. And now we may expect that our adversaries will put off the garb and character of Deists, and make a new attempt for the fortune of the day, under the arms and conduct of the Jews.

It must be granted on all hands, that the Messiah, whensoever he is manifested to the world, must appear in that very manner as the Jewish prophets describe him. All the characters must hit and correspond one to another; the same features, the same lineaments visible in both; the one the shadow and picture, and the other the substance. Now, say they, it is evident from the prophets, that the Messiah is to be temporal prince, to sit on the throne of David his royal ancestor, and to make Jerusalem the seat of an universal and perpetual empire. But the character of Jesus is as different from this description, as a stable from a palace. It is true, we Christians endeavour to shew a similitude between them by figurative interpretations of Scripture; which we call the spiritual and mystical sense, but they call arbitrary and precarious, as having no foundation in the native and naked letter, which is not so racked and wrested from its obvious meaning, little credit being to be given to such extorted confessions.

Thus far our objectors. But I suppose the prophetic language and character is better understood than that this surmise should pass without a just answer. Indeed, if it were in this case alone that the expressions of the prophets need a figurative interpretation, the exception might appear fair and plausible: but it cannot be denied, that on many other occasions, besides the matter of the Messiah, their discourse (after the genius of the eastern nations) is thick set with metaphor and allegory:

the same bold comparisons and dithyrambic liberty of style every where occur. Which is an easy and natural account (besides the more secret reasons that the Holy Spirit might have) why the kingdom of the Messias, though really spiritual and not of this world, is so often dressed and painted by them with the glories of secular empire. For when the Spirit of God came upon them, and breathed a new warmth and vigour through all the powers of the body and soul, when by the influx of divine light the whole scene of Christ's heavenly kingdom was represented to their view, so that their hearts were ravished with joy, and their imaginations turgid and pregnant with the glorious ideas: then surely, if ever, their style would be strong and lofty, full of allusions to all that is great and magnificent in the kingdoms of this world. But then, in other passages of the same prophets, as it were on purpose to hint to us the true meaning of the former, the Messias is described plainly, without poetical colours, to be a person of low condition; to have no form nor comeliness in him; a man acquainted with sorrows, and numbered among transgressors; and by other characters so clear and express, that some of the Jewish rabbies, to elude so strong a conviction, have maintained and propagated an absurd opinion, as if two Messias were foretold by the prophets; the one a triumphant monarch, the other an unfortunate and afflicted person. What will not perverse and refractory minds take hold of, rather than submit to an unwelcome truth?

It is evident then, that the kingdom of Christ, so magnified in the prophetic style, is a spiritual kingdom. And yet, to be free and ingenuous, we must own that the whole nation of the Jews mistook the meaning of those passages. Even our Saviour's own disciples were not exempt from the common error. And the whole posterity of that people are pertinacious in it to this day; which to many is a mighty prejudice against the credit of the Gospel. What! as if it were such a matter of astonishment, that they obstinately adhere to the literal sense, which promises them a temporal kingdom, with worldly honours and pleasures! an interpretation both pe-

cious in itself, and agreeable to their proud hopes and carnal apprehensions, which are miserably defeated and disappointed in Jesus. There seems to be nothing so very unnatural and unaccountable in this. But then that very disappointment, so far is it from being an objection, that, to a sagacious mind and uncorrupt judgment, itself is a convincing proof that he was truly the Messias. For let us reflect upon the state of those times. It is certain in fact, that the whole nation was possessed with an inveterate persuasion that the Messias was then a coming; and it is as certain, that Jesus the son of Mary professed himself that Messias. Let us argue now upon human reasons, and the common principles of action. If he was not the true Messias, we are then to consider him as an ordinary Jew, of mean quality and education. Now, to give any tolerable account why such a one should pretend himself to be the Messias, there are but two ways possible: either he was acted by ambitious designs, which he hoped to compass by that imposture; or by a complexional and natural enthusiasm, verily imagining himself to be the Messias. I suppose I scarce need to say, that both these suppositions are fully confuted by every word and action of his life. But, what I now observe is this, that upon either of those principles, whether ambition or enthusiasm, he would certainly have acted the part of the Messias in such a character as men then ascribed to him; according to the popular expectation, and the received notion of those times. Now the whole nation expected that the Messias was to be a great general, to rescue them from the Roman power, and to restore the kingdom to Israel. It is certain then, that upon either of these two motives he would have blown the trumpet to rebellion, and attempted their deliverance. Ambition would have animated him to it, as the only way to his hopes and wishes. Or, if enthusiasm had inspired him, what would he not have promised and assumed to himself? To fight the battles of the Lord; to execute vengeance upon the heathen; to bind their kings with chains, and their nobles with fetters of iron. Such were the designs of Barcocab and some other impostors of old:

setting up to be the Messias, they put their followers in arms, and proclaimed liberty to the people. Not so the blessed Jesus: but, when the multitude would have made him their king, he withdrew himself even by miracle to avoid it. He did not summon to arms, but to repentance and newness of life. He had a kingdom indeed; but not of this earthly Jerusalem, but of that which is above. He was truly their deliverer; but not from the Roman yoke, but from the more slavish yoke of the law, from the more wretched bondage to sin and death. Was this the air and language of ambition? Was this the mien and spirit of enthusiasm? Nay rather, does not nature herself cry out and declare, that for one of his low condition and vulgar education, to profess himself the Messias in so surprising a manner, in a character so unthought of, by an interpretation of prophecies so spiritual and divine, so infinitely better than the literal meaning, against the universal prejudice of the nation, and the hopes and solicitations of his very followers, was certainly a thing more than human; an invincible testimony that he was really the Christ, and his doctrine from God and not of man.

But our adversaries have another objection still behind; and our answer thereto will put an end both to it and to the present discourse. And this objection is borrowed from the law of Moses; which, say they, having a promise of eternity annexed to it, to be an everlasting covenant, a perpetual statute, a covenant of an everlasting priesthood, ought of necessity to be continued and confirmed by the true Messias; whereas Jesus endeavoured to abolish it and thereby wholly subverted the credit of his own pretensions. But we answer in our Saviour's declaration, (Matth. v. 17.) that he came not to destroy the law, but to fulfil it. We are to distinguish then between the moral part of the Mosaic law, and the political and ceremonial. As to the rights and ceremonies, it is apparent they had no intrinsic nor moral holiness in them, no natural tendency to promote the happiness of men; nay rather they were inconvenient and grievous, a yoke of bondage and servile discipline, which none were able to bear. Even the rewards and penalties, which enforced their observation, did not naturally flow and result from them, as effects from proper causes; but they were miraculously added to them by the sole virtue of the divine promise. It is true, they were fit and proper for the ends of their institution; to be types and shadows of better things to come; to preserve the people from idolatry, by allowing no intercourse nor commerce with other nations. But, it is evident for that very reason as well as many more, that those ceremonies were neither calculated for eternity, nor modelled for mankind in common: so that when the reasons of their sanction no longer continued; when the things they typically represented were come to pass; when the wall of partition was to be removed, and, according to the prophecies, all nations to be called to Christ, and the ends of the earth to be his possession; they must needs be antiquated and abolished, like scaffolds that are removed when the buildings are finished; since under that new state none of them had any further use, and several of them became impossible to be observed. And so for the political institutions of Moses, it is plain they were accommodated to the circumstances of affairs, and the necessities of time and place; not absolutely the very best, but the best that those ages of the world and the genius of that people would bear. As for instance, the toleration of polygamy and causeless divorces; these were indulged them, not as most pleasing to their lawgiver, but (Matth. ix. 8.) because of the hardness of their hearts, in the words of our Saviour; because they were too stiff-necked and head-strong to admit of a shorter bridle. These civil ordinances therefore, when better precepts were once proposed and accepted in their place, must of necessity drop and die of themselves, and become obsolete without any repeal: just as the temporary edicts in war, and the agreements of the cartel, do expire of their own accord, when the peace is concluded. But then the moral part of the law of Moses, which is the sap and marrow, the soul and substance of the whole, that indeed is of eternal and universal obligation. But then who can say that this is abrogated and cancelled by Jesus? So far from that, that every branch of it is ingrafted and incorporated into his Gospel. In this best of senses therefore the Mosaic law is confirmed and fulfilled by our Saviour. For morality is a thing immutable; and, unless human nature itself should be new moulded by our Maker, vice and virtue must be always what they have been. So foolish was the cavil of the Deists against our Saviour's descent from heaven; because he gave no other lectures of morals, than what nature and reason had taught before. Nay, if he had taught us the reverse of those morals, this had been an objection indeed. But in that even the divinity of his doctrine most eminently appears; that the finger of God upon the tables of our hearts, and the pens of the inspired writers in the volume of the Gospel, have prescribed us one and the same lesson. As for us, whose employment it is to teach that lesson to others, let us but express it also in our own lives and conversations; let us but add that credit to our doctrine, that reputation to our profession: so may we expect to bring over all our adversaries to the truth and power of religion; so may we expect, when we give the account of our talents, to be received with that blessed approbation, Well done, thou good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Master.

SERMON V.

By SAMUEL CLARK, D.D.

Of Faith in God.

HEB. xi. 6.

BUT without Faith, it is impossible to please him: For he that cometh to God, must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him.

THE foregoing chapter is a very earnest and affectionate exhortation to the duty of faith. (Ver. 22.) Let us draw near with a true heart, in full assurance of faith. (Ver. 23.) Let us hold fast the profession of our faith without waver-

ing. (Ver. 37.) For yet a little while, and he that shall come will come, and will not tarry: Now the just shall live by faith. That this exhortation might not be ineffectual, for want of men's clearly understanding what the nature of the duty was, to which they were here so earnestly exhorted; the apostle, in the 1st verse of this chapter, proceeds to define distinctly what faith is, and wherein it consists. Faith, saith he, is the substance of things hoped for, (in the original it is, the firm and assured expectation of things hoped for,) the evidence of things not seen. And what those things are, which being not seen by sense, are yet made manifest by faith, he declares in the words of the text. They are, saith he, the being of God, and the rewards of the life to come. He that cometh to God, must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him. There has prevailed in modern times, a very different and enthusiastic notion of faith; as if faith, under the gospel, was nothing but a confident reliance upon the merits of Christ, to do all that for us, which he on the contrary expressly requires that we should do for ourselves. When we have heartily endeavoured to obey the commandments of God; and have performed our duty really and sincerely, though very imperfectly; to rely them upon the merits and intercession of Christ, for the acceptance of those imperfect though sincere endeavours; this is indeed the duty, and the comfort of a Christian, but it is not what the scripture usually calls faith. Faith is that firm belief of things at present not seen; that conviction upon the mind, of the truth of the promises and threatenings of God made known in the gospel; of the certain reality of the rewards and punishments of the life to come; which enables a man, in opposition to all the temptations of a corrupt world, to obey God, in expectation of an invisible reward hereafter. This is that faith, which in scripture is always represented as a moral virtue, nay as the principal moral virtue, and the root and spring of all other virtues; because it is an act, not of the understanding only, but also and chiefly of the will, so to consider impartially, to approve and embrace the doctrine of the gospel, as to make it the great rule of our life and actions. By this faith it is, that we must be justified; and by this it is, that the antients, whose example is celebrated in this eleventh chapter, obtained, as the apostle expresses it, a good report. The faith of Abraham was, that he looked for a city which hath foundations, even the heavenly Jerusalem spoken of in the prophecies, whose builder and maker is God, (ver. 10.) The faith of the other patriarchs was that confessing themselves strangers and pilgrims on the earth, they declared plainly that they sought a better country, that is, an heavenly (ver. 13. 16.) The faith of Moses was, that he chose rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season; for he had respect unto the recompence of reward; and endured, as seeing him who is invisible (ver. 35, 36, 37.) The faith of the martyrs was, that they chose to be tortured, not accepting deliverance, that they might obtain a better resurrection (ver. 35.) This is a very easy and intelligible notion of faith; and such a notion, as shows plainly, how faith is not a mere speculative act of the understanding, but a substantial practical moral virtue.

It is true, this is not indeed the only sense of the word, faith, in scripture; but it is the principal and most important sense of it. As may appear by considering, that all the variety of significations, in which the word is used in different places of scripture, may properly be reduced, for memory and distinctness sake, to these which follow. 1st, The word, faith, in some places signifies that earnest trust and confidence in the power of God, to which in the apostles' times was annexed the gift of working miracles. Thus (Matt. xvii. 20.) if ye have faith (says our Lord to his apostles) as a grain of mustard seed; (if ye have that trust in God, that particular kind of faith or dependence on him, that assured reliance on his power without doubt or wavering, required of you peculiarly at this time; if you have this faith, though ever so small in comparison, answerable in any measure to your present office and advantages;) ye shall say to this mountain, remove hence to yonder place, and it shall remove. This, was a faith required of the apostles at that particular time, and of them only. 2dly, In other passages, the word, faith, signifies the duty of veracity, faithfulness, or truth. Thus (Matt. xxiii. 23.) ye have omitted the weightier matters of the law; judgment, mercy, and faith; faith, that is, fidelity, truth or faithfulness, in the discharge of any trust reposed in men. Analogous to which, it is also sometimes used for the trust itself, or the thing committed to our charge; thus (Rom. xii. 6.) having then gifts differing according to the grace that is given to us; whether prophecy, let us prophesy according to the proportion of faith; or ministry, let us wait on our ministering; [the phrase in our modern language is very difficult, and cannot well be understood without this observation:] according to the proportion of faith, that is, according to the nature and degree of the gift or the trust reposed in us, (whether it be prophecy or ministration or any other office which requires faithfulness in the performance of it,) so let every one of us discharge his respective duty. 3dly, Another and much more usual signification of the word, faith; is to denote the whole gospel of Christ, or the christian religion, in opposition to the ritual works of the law of Moses. Thus (Acts, vi. 7.) the number of disciples multiplied in Jerusalem greatly, and a great company of the priests were obedient to the faith; that is, embraced the gospel. Again, (Rom. iii. 28.) A man is justified by faith, without the deeds of the law; by faith, that is, by the conditions of the gospel. And, (Rom. x. 8.) the word of faith, which we preach; that is to say, the doctrine of the gospel. And indeed generally throughout all the Epistles, and in the book of the Acts, this is the constant signification of the word, faith. And the reason why the whole gospel is so often expressed by that name is very obvious; [namely] because the great motives and promises of the gospel, are the invisible things of a future state, which can be discerned by faith only.

To come to God, signifies, according to the nature of the Jewish language, making profession of religion; undertaking to live a holy and virtuous life, in obedience to God's commands, and in expectation of his rewards. And it answers to another phrase of the like import, walking with God; which signifies continuing and persevering in that religious practice, whereof coming to God is the beginning or entrance. Thus (Gen. v. 22.) Enoch walked with God; and, (vi. 9.) Noah was a just man, and perfect in his generation, and Noah walked with God. Walking with God, is being perfect or stedfast in that religious course of life, whereof coming to God, is making the first profession. He that cometh to God, is as much as to say, whoever will be a virtuous or religious man: In like manner, as, he that cometh to Christ, signifies more particularly he that will take upon him to be a Christian. No man can come to me, says our Saviour, [Joh. vi. 44.] (that is, he cannot become a good Christian) except the Father which hath sent me, draw him;—every man that hath learned of the Father, cometh unto me. The phrase, except the Father draw him, is, in our present manner of speaking, difficult and unusual; but it is explained by what follows, he that hath learned of the Father. The meaning is, No man can effectually believe in Christ, except he first believes in God. Natural religion is the best preparative for the reception of the Christian. The love of truth and virtue in general, is the dispensation of the Father; and the doctrine of the gospel in particular, is the dispensation of the Son. Now as no man can receive Christ, who has not first heard, and is thus drawn by the Father: as no one can be a good Christian, who is not first resolved to be a good man; so no one can hear the father, can come to God, unless he first have faith, and believes in him. The dispensation of the Father, that of creation or natural religion, is a necessary preparative for the dispensation of the Son, that is, for the gospel: And it must itself have preparation made for it by faith going before, as by the first foundation of all. He that cometh to God, must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him.

The sense therefore of the text is this.

It is in vain to make profession of religion, without being first well instructed and firmly persuaded of this foundation; the being and attributes of God: There is no Christian, who is not well apprized of this; and may be apt to think perhaps, that it is needless to remind him of it. But there are few who consider these first principles of religion, so seriously and so frequently as they ought to do; and in such a manner, as to cause them to produce their proper effect, by influencing their whole lives and conversations. For knowledge is but a dormant habit, if not excited by constant meditation; and powers are of no use, if not produced into act. Right notions of the being and attributes of God, every one knows, are the foundation of all religion: But then this knowledge must not be a bare speculation; but a serious, practical, affecting impression, and deep sense upon the mind, of a supreme being, who created the world by his power, preserves and governs it by his goodness and wisdom, and will judge is with justice, mercy, and truth : Of such a supreme being ; whose glory, no eye can behold ; whose majesty, no thought can comprehend ; whose power, no strength can resist ; from whose presence, no swiftness can flee ; from whose knowledge, no secret can be concealed ; whose justice, no art can evade ; whose goodness, every creature partakes of. This is that faith, without which it is impossible to please God. It is impossible to please him without it ; not that virtue and righteousness, if it were possible to find them without faith, could be in themselves unacceptable to God ; but that, because without such faith there can be no righteousness, therefore neither without it can God possibly be pleased. Righteousness is the only means, by which rational beings can obtain the favour of God ; and therefore since faith is necessary in order to righteousness, it is consequently necessary to the obtaining of the favour of God. He that will please God, must come to him in the ways of virtue and true holiness ; and he that cometh to God, must first believe that he is.

From what has been said upon this head, we may easily dissipate the vain fears of many pious and sincere persons, who are very apt to be suspicious of themselves that they want true faith, and consequently that their religion is vain. Now this fear, in such persons, evidently arises from want of having a distinct notion what faith is. They are possessed of the thing ; but for want of clearly understanding the notion, they are not able to judge rightly whether they have it or not. From the explication which has now been given of that matter, men may easily examine themselves, whether they have that faith which I have been describing, or no. And without entering into the definition at all, there is yet a plainer rule given us by our Saviour ; by its fruits we may know it. Wherever the fruits of righteousness and true virtue are found, there cannot be wanting the root of faith, from which those fruits proceed : For he that cometh to God, does certainly believe that he is ; and gives the best proof in the world that he does so. On the contrary, 'whosoever upon examination finds not in his life the fruits of righteousness ; whatsoever his speculative understanding may be, yet in the Christian sense he may be sure he has no faith. For if the spring, the cause, the active principle were present ; there would not be wanting its proper effect. Such as the root is, such will be the branches. He who seriously believes that God is ; will endeavour to come unto him, in the ways of truth and righteousness.

Having thus briefly explained the former part of the words ; and shewn both what faith is, and how absolutely necessary ; as without which it is impossible to please God, or to come unto him ; it remains that I consider, in the latter part of the words, those two fundamental instances or primary objects of faith, laid before us by the apostle ; namely, the being of God, and his relation to us ; that he is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him. The first foundation of all, and the primary object of faith, is the being of God ; he that cometh to God, must believe that he is. Now the grounds or arguments, upon which our faith in this particular is built ; besides the evidence and authority of revelation ; are, from reason itself, and from the very nature of things, many and various : there being hardly any thing in nature, from whence the certainty of the being of God, may not justly and reasonably be deduced. Some of the arguments are abstruse, and require attention ; but, when thoroughly considered, conclude most strongly to the conviction of obstinate unbelievers. Others are plain, easy, and obvious ; suited to all capacities ; always ready at hand to confirm the faith even of the meanest understandings ; and yet differing from the former, not in strength, but in being more common only. It would be tedious to repeat at length upon this head a great number of arguments among Christians to whom they have been so often urged, and are so well understood. But by a brief recapitulation, to remind ourselves frequently of things already known, for the better assisting of our meditations, cannot but in many cases be very useful. For me, saith St Paul, to repeat unto you the same things, is not grievous, and for you it is safe. To this purpose, the numerous arguments, which prove (in particular) the being of God, may be naturally reduced to the two which follow.

First, That it is evident, both we ourselves, and all the other beings we know in the world, are weak and dependent creatures; which neither gave ourselves being, nor can preserve it by any power of our own: And that therefore we entirely owe our being to some superior and more powerful cause; which superior cause either must be itself the first cause, which is the notion of God; or else, by the same argument as before, must derive from him, and so lead us to the knowledge of him. If it be said, that we received our being from our forefathers by a continued natural succession, (which however would not in any step have been possible, without a perpetual providence,) yet still the argument holds no less strong concerning the first of the whole race; that he could not but be made by a superior intelligent cause. If an atheist, contrary to the truth of all history, shall contend that there may have been, without any beginning at all, an eternal succession of men; yet still it will be no less evident, that such a perpetual succession could not have been without an eternal superior cause; because in the nature of things themselves there is manifestly no necessity, that any such succession of transient beings, either temporary or perpetual, should have existed at all.

Secondly, The other argument, to which the greatest part of the proofs of the being of God may briefly be reduced, is the order and beauty of the world; that exquisite harmony of nature, by which (as St. Paul expresses it, Rom. i. 20.) the invisible things of God from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made. And this argument, as it is infinitely strong to the most accurate philosophers, so it is also sufficiently obvious even to the meanest capacities. Whose power was it (Psal. civ. 2.), that framed this beautiful and stately fabric, this immense and spacious world? that stretched out the North over the empty place, and hanged the earth upon nothing? (Job, xxvi 7.) That formed those vast and numberless orbs of heaven (Psal. xix. 1.), and disposed them into such regular and uniform motions? (Psal. cxlvii. 4.)? that appointed the sun to rule the day, and the Moon and the stars to govern the night? (Psal. civ. 19) that so adjusted their several distances, as that they should neither be scorched by heat, nor destroyed by cold? that encompassed the earth with air so wonderfully contrived, as at one and the same time to support clouds for rain, to afford winds for health and traffick, to be proper for the breath of animals by its spring, for causing sounds by its motion, for transmitting light by its transparency? that fitted the water to afford vapours for rain, speed for traffic, and fish for nourishment and delicacy? that weighed the mountains in scales, and the hills in a balance; and adjusted them in their most proper places for fruitfulness and health? that diversified the climates of the earth into such an agreeable variety, that in that great difference, yet each one has its proper seasons, day and night, winter and summer? that clothed the face of the earth with plants and flowers, so exquisitely adorned with various and inimitable beauties, that even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of them? that replenished the world with animals, so different from each other in particular, and yet all in the whole so much alike? that framed with exquisite workmanship the eye for seeing, and other parts of the body necessarily in proportion, without which no creature could have long subsisted? that, beyond all these things, endued the soul of man with far superior faculties; with understanding, judgment, reason, and will; with faculties whereby in a most exalted manner God teaches us more than the beasts of the field, and maketh us wiser than the fowls of heaven (Job, xxxv 11.)?

It is commonly alledged by unbelievers, that all these things are done by second causes. And suppose they were, (which however is not universally true; But suppose they were effected by second causes,) yet how would that diminish the necessity of acknowledging the first cause? If among men, many things are performed by the use of instruments; are those things therefore ever the less justly ascribed to the hands which used the instruments? Because every wheel watch moves only naturally, according to the frame of its parts, and the strength which the spring impresses upon it; is therefore the skill of the workman the less to be acknowledged, who adjusted those very things? Or because it is natural for the wheels of a watch, or for the rooms of a house, to be of such particular shapes and dimensions, does this make it possible, that therefore they may have been formed so without any artificer? All natural, all second causes, are nothing else, but either the inanimate motions of senseless matter, or the voluntary motions of dependent creatures. And what are these, but one of them the direct operation; and the other, only the free permission, of Him who ruleth over all? Men's neglecting therefore to infer the being of God, from every thing they see or think of every day, is in reality as great a stupidity as if from the constant and regular continuance of the day-light, men should cease to observe, that there is such a thing as the sun in the heavens, from whence that light proceeds. Nor would it be more absurd to imagine, that the light would continue, though the sun which causes it, were extinguished; than that the effects of nature can regularly go on, without the being of God who causes those effects. To evade this argument there is no other possible way, but to affirm either that all things were produced by chance, or that they are all eternal necessarily of themselves. As to chance, it is evident that is nothing but a mere word, or an abstract notion in our manner of conceiving things. It has itself no real being; it is nothing, and can do nothing. Besides, in the works of God, the further men search, and the more discoveries they make, the greater exactness they constantly find; whereas in things done either by the art of man, or by what we call chance, the contrary always is true; the more they are understood, the less accurate they appear. Beyond all credulity therefore is the credulousness of atheists, whose belief is so absurdly strong, as to believe that chance could make the world, when it cannot build a house; that chance should produce all plants, when it cannot paint one landscape; that chance should form all animals, when it cannot so much as make a lifeless watch. On the other hand therefore, if they will affirm that all things are eternal; yet still the argument holds as strong as before, that things which cannot for any time exist without a cause, can much less without a cause exist through all time. Unless they will affirm, that all things exist by an internal absolute necessity in their own nature. Which that they do not, is evident from hence; that there exists in the world an infinite diversity of things, whereas necessity is uniform and without variation.

Having thus briefly shewn that God is; it will easily follow in the next place, that he is and must be a rewarder of them that diligently seek him. For he that governs the motions of every even the smallest particle of lifeless matter, and by whose providence every vegetable and every the meanest animal is perpetually preserved; without whom, not a sparrow falls to the ground; and with whom, even the very hairs of our head are all numbered; shall he not much more take care of us, O we of little faith? Now the proper and principal care or government over rational creatures, is the rewarding or punishing them according to their respective deserts. If therefore God is, (as hath before been proved,) and is governor of the world; it follows that he must be also, (since therein principally all government consists; he must be) a rewarder of them that diligently seek him.

Application, of what has been said, is briefly; 1st, to sceptics; and 2dly, to believers.

1st, To such as are sceptics or unbelievers of the being of God, it is advisable in the first place, that they consider how uncomfortable their opinion is. It is plain, such is the condition of human nature in this life, that we are continually surrounded with evils which we cannot prevent, with wants which we are not able to supply, with infirmities which we cannot remove, with dangers which we can no way escape. Our enjoyments are such, as are not for one moment secure; our expectations, of such things as are not in our own power to accomplish. We are apt to grieve, for things we cannot help; and to be tormented with fears, of what we cannot prevent. And in all these cases, there is no substantial comfort, but in the belief of God; and in the singular satisfaction of having him our friend. Had the thing therefore really in itself any uncertainty, (which is by no means the case,) yet it could not but be what every wise and reasonable man must desire and wish might be true, that the world were governed by a wise and just and merciful God. So that even sceptics themselves cannot but be self-condemned, when they mock and scoff at religion; when they refuse to hear arguments for the truth of the most desirable thing in the world; and will not examine those evidences and proofs of religion, which are really much stronger than these persons can before-hand imagine. And if the proofs were much weaker than they are, yet they would deserve at least to be seriously considered; because the hazard on one side is infinitely great, if religion, which they reject, be true; whereas on the other side there is no hazard at all, if, being received as true, it could possibly prove to be a mistake.

2dly, To sincere believers, the use of what has been said, is; that being once satisfied in the main and great truths of religion, they suffer not themselves to be moved, and their faith in this great point, shaken, by nice and uncertain disputes about particular questions of less moment. For, which way soever many such controversies of an abstruse and difficult nature, be determined; yet the great foundation of religion, upon which a wise man may always act steadily, is laid deep and sure in this plain proposition, that God is, and that he is a rewarder of them that diligently seek him.

SERMON VII.

By FRANCIS ATTERBURY, D.D.

Lord Bishop of Rochester, and Dean of Westminster.

On the Incarnation of our Lord.

MATTH. xi. 6.

Blessed is he whosoever shall not be offended in me.

AND can any man then be offended in thee, blessed Jesu! who hast undertaken, and done, and suffered so much for all men! who willingly emptied thyself of all thy glory, leftest heaven and the bosom of thy Father, for our sakes; and when thou tookest upon thee to deliver man, didst not (as at this time) abhor the virgin's womb! Can a design of so much goodness ever miscarry by the folly of those, on whose very account it was undertaken! Can such a message of love (of a love astonishing and infinite) be rejected!—Canst thou thyself, the great messenger, be received any otherwise, than with the open arms and hearts of all thy creatures, for whose redemption thou wert thus made flesh, and dweltst among us!—Is it possible for any one of them to be any ways offended in thee!

Yet so it is, blessed Lord! that from thy first coming in the flesh to this time, there have been unreasonable men all along, that have taken offence at thee!—And there will not fail to be such within the pale of christianity itself, even till thy second coming to judge the world!—Thy doctrines have been complained of, as laying too great a restraint on human nature, as hard and unpracticable sayings!—Thy mysteries have been doubted of, disputed against, and ridiculed, by men of perverse and proud minds, who are resolved to believe nothing farther than they can thoroughly and clearly comprehend it!—Thy person itself, the circumstances and way of thy coming, have been an offence unto many!—To the Jews a stumbling-block, and to the Greeks foolishness! (1 Cor. i. 23.) A constant occasion of falling to all godless and sinful men, whose high minds are not brought into captivity to the obedience of faith, nor made fit for the reception of the truth, as it is in Jesus!—But blessed are all they (have thy holy lips pronounced) who in none of these ways are offended in thee!

As to the two former ways of being offended in Christ, on the account of the difficulty of practising those duties he has enjoined, and believing those articles of faith he hath proposed, I shall not at present enter into the consideration of them. The festival we are now celebrating determines me rather to point my reflections on the offence which has been taken at the person of Christ, the method and manner of his coming amongst us!—The objections of which kind, I shall briefly propose, and answer; that so having rooted and grounded ourselves in a firm belief of the doctrine, we may, with the more assurance, make those several improvements of it, which will be profitable unto godliness.

It hath formerly, by Porphyry and Celsus, and ever since by their successors, the open or hidden enemies of Christianity, been thus argued:

That the doctrine of the incarnation of the Son of God is unreasonable and incredible; inconsistent with the clear notions we have of the unlimited perfections of God, and the finite properties of man; between which there is so wide and eternal a difference as seems to render them incapable of being joined together in one and the same person or subject. For how can wisdom, perfection, and happiness itself, be mixed with folly, infirmity, and misery? What union can there be between what is finite, and that which is infinite?

But were it conceivable, how the divine and human nature could be united into one person; yet it is not (say they) reasonable to believe that such a method was actually taken. For surely there were other ways beside this of restoring lapsed man to the favour of God, and that happiness which he had forfeited, and of taking away the sins of the world: the unlimited mercy of the divine nature was of itself sufficient to compass this end, and forgive this debt, without requiring any ransom; and unless a God incarnate were absolutely and indispensably requisite to free mankind from the guilt and dominion of their sins, it is no ways reasonable to think that recourse was had to so extraordinary a remedy.

Now, as to the first part of the objection, the impossibility of an union between God and man in the same person or subject, it is a bold and a presumptuous plea. For who is he, among the reasoners of this world, that is able precisely to determine, in such obscure points as these, what is possible or impossible to be accomplished by almighty wisdom and power? Are our notions of these two beings, God and man, so full every way, and distinct and clear, as to satisfy us, that such an union is in itself repugnant, and altogether impossible? Would we impartially consider what passes within our minds, when we employ them in such nice disquisitions as these, we should find, that all that passes there is darkness and confusion; and that we can discern too little of either of these natures, to be able to pronounce, with any assurance, that it is impossible for them to be joined together in one person.

We have no just idea indeed of the manner in which such an union may be effected; but so neither have we of the manner of that union which is between our souls and bodies. An union, which we can as little explain, or comprehend, as even that of the Deity with the humanity. and which yet we can no more doubt of, than we can of our own being and subsistence. Will the most keen and piercing wit among the sons of men say, that he perceives plainly, how a corporeal can be joined to an incorporeal being; and what are those common ties and ligaments that hold them; how they act upon each other, move, and are moved by turns; and what kind of contact that is, by which such motions are mutually communicated? No, these are secrets, which we can no ways, by any strength of thought, fathom; and which perhaps we should have been apt to imagine inconsistent and impossible speculations, had not experience taught us, that things are really so, though we cannot possibly find out how they should be so.

Had the spirits of men been once unbodied, and had God revealed to them in that state of separation, that he designed them for another station in a lower world; and, in order to it, would clothe them with gross and sensible matter, and make them act continually in concert with fleshly organs, and with dependence upon them, no doubt but one of these forward reasoners would have concluded immediately, that the thing proposed was unphilosophical and absurd.—And, therefore, that, either the revelation did not really come from God, or that this could not be the sense of it.—For how could body and spirit, things so totally different, any ways meet together, and compose one entire subject? or how could they, when thus met, have any possible influence on each other?

These therefore are immodest and unjustifiable ways of reasoning, which would persuade us to reject truths, on the account of some supposed impossibilities, of which it is manifestly impossible that we should have any clear and adequate conception. And therefore, in all such cases, it becomes not us to say, what can, or cannot be done, or what the nature of things will, or will not admit of. The short and only sure point upon which controversies of this kind must turn is to see what God in his holy Word has assured us concerning them.

As to the second part of the objection, That there were other ways of bringing about the pardon of sin, and the salvation of man; far be it from us to prescribe to God, or to say,—That infinite Goodness and Wisdom itself could have found out no other expedient. But since this, and no other, was made use of by God, we must needs think it the most proper of any, and the best proportioned to those ends and purposes for which he designed it. And though it becomes us rather implicitly to adore the divine wisdom, than curiously to inquire into the reasons, and boldly to sound the depths of it; yet is there some light afforded us in scripture, whereby we may discover a mighty fitness and congruity between the method that was used, and the end that was brought about by it.

Guiding ourselves therefore by the discoveries made to us on this head in holy writ, we may safely venture to say,—It was fit and requisite, that our Redeemer should be God, that, by the infinite dignity of his person, the value of the sacrifice which he made of himself in the flesh, might be so far enhanced, as to become a sufficient atonement for the sins of the whole world: That the laws which he should publish might carry in them the utmost obligation and force: That his doctrine might have the highest authority: That we, being assured of his absolute security from sin, might look up to his example, as to a perfect pattern of holiness; and in all things, without doubt or fear, implicitly follow his steps.

It was fit he should be God, that he might give an instance of infinite condescension and love towards us, and might from hence engage us to love and obey him also, without bounds: That he might be enabled in our behalf to vanquish Satan, and all the powers of hell, and erect a spiritual kingdom in the hearts of men, by triumphing first over all the strength, and cunning, and malice, of our spiritual enemies.

It was highly expedient also, that he should be man, that our offences might be repaired in that nature which committed them: And as, by one man's disobedience, many were made sinners; so, by the obedience of one man, many might be made righteous. Rom. v. 19.

That he might be qualified from thence to be a merciful and faithful high priest in things pertaining to God (Heb. ii. 17.), and a proper intercessor with him for man, whose infirmities he had tried, whose needs he had been sensible of; and having himself suffered and been tempted, might be able and willing to succour those that are tempted. Ver. 18.

Lastly, That by appearing in human form, he might make a difference between the rigorous and astonishing dispensation of the law, and that milder one of grace: Coming to us in the most familiar and winning way; instructing us in our duty like one of us; and pre-posing to us a lively and full example of what he taught, in what he did and suffered for us.

These are some of the accounts which God has hinted to us in scripture, why his infinite wisdom was pleased to pitch upon this way, rather than any other, of reconciling man to himself. And yet, after all the accounts we can give ourselves of it, we cannot but confess it to be an abyss of mercy, which neither we nor angels are able to pry into; and which God alone, who contrived it, can fully explain and comprehend.

Let us forbear therefore to wade farther into the depth of this great mystery of God manifest in the flesh; and let us satisfy ourselves with believing it, as God has revealed it, without indulging our curiosity in an unprofitable search after the reasons which induced God to order the stupendous work of our redemption in so inconceivable a manner: And let us proceed to draw from thence those plain practical improvements, which may render it profitable unto godliness, and with which it will readily furnish us.

And the first and most natural use we are to make of it is, to raise to ourselves from thence matter of thankfulness and spiritual joy. Behold, I bring you, said the angel to the shepherds, good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people: For unto you is born this day, in the city of David, a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord. Luke, ii. 10, 11. And these indeed are the best tidings that ever God sent, or the world received; tidings of no less than freedom from the guilt and punishment of sin; of a way opened to repentance, and the favour of God; to peace of conscience in this world, and everlasting happiness in the next.

Before the coming of Christ, all the account we could have of these things from the light of nature, went no farther than this,—That the breach of any of God's laws brought guilt along with it; and that guilt made us liable to punishment.—Whether God, upon any considerations, would ever remit this punishment, was more than mere reason could possibly tell us. For the justice of God certainly required, that sin should be followed with punishment: Nor was this inconsistent with the goodness of God, which was otherwise sufficiently manifested to us. Under these kind of dark and uncomfortable reasonings were we left, till Christ the sun of righteousness arose with healing in his wings (Mat. iv. 2,) and published the gospel of repentance, and remission of sins. All thanks and praise therefore be given to him, that our tongues can possibly express, or our hearts conceive! Abraham, at a mighty distance, and upon a very dim and imperfect view of it, rejoiced to see this day (John, viii. 56.): The angels, who themselves had no interest in this deliverance, yet were highly pleased with the prospect of those blessings it derived on their fellow-creature man; and therefore sung that hymn on this occasion, which the Evangelist has recorded—Glory be to God on high, on earth peace, good-will towards men. Luke, ii. 14. And shall not we, for whose sake this peace was sent on earth, and to whom all this good-will was meant, shall not we also give glory to God on high, and rejoice before him with reverence? Surely this is news, at which (as Isaiah prophesies of the miraculous effects that should take place in the kingdom of the Messiah) the lame man shall leap as an hart, and the tongue of the dumb shall sing. Isa. xxxv. 6.

A second improvement that should be made of this doctrine is, to raise our love to God from hence, to all the degrees of which it is capable.

For love surely deserves returns of love; and the highest instances of love, the highest returns of it. Now in this was manifested the love of God toward us, because that God sent his only begotten Son into the world, that he might live through him, Herein is love (as St. John continues his argument), not that we loved God (that is, loved God first, and by that means drew down his love upon us), but that he loved us (antecedently, freely), and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins. (1 John, iv. 9, 10.)

Had God sent the meanest attendant in the court of heaven, to publish abroad the good tidings of his free and voluntary pardon of sin, should we not have entertained it as a message of unspeakable love! How much more, when he sends his Son, his only begotten Son, on this errand! When he sends him to partake of our nature, and of all the infirmities, miseries, shame, and pain that attend it; and at last to be made a sacrifice for our sins, by the very hands of those men for whose sake he left heaven! This raises the motive so high, that our lips are faint when we speak of it; and our heart melts away almost under the sense of that excessive burthen of love which lies upon us. *

But how strangely is the force of this motive weakened by those who make Christ a mere man, not the eternal Son of God, sent out to us from the bosom of his Father! For at this rate the love of God toward us abates very much; and then, I am afraid, ours toward him will proportionably abate with it. For the higher apprehensions we have of God's antecedent love to man, the stronger will our endeavours still be to raise our affections up to a pitch some way suitable to these apprehensions.

So that, whether these men have, by this expedient, lessened the difficulties of their faith, or not (which is matter of dispute), sure we are, that they have evidently lessened the argument for their love by it.

Another plain use we are to make of this doctrine is, to give us an high sense of the dignity of our nature, and an hearty displeasure at those sins which debase and dishonour it.

Behold now, as the Apostle to the Hebrews argues, is that prophecy of the Psalmist concerning man fulfilled in your ears—Thou hast crowned him with glory and honour, and hast set him over the works of thine hands: Thou hast put all things in subjection under his feet (Heb. ii. 7.); that is, The human nature, by its assumption to the divine, is now advanced far above principalities, powers, and every created being: Now it is, in the person of Christ, become an object of adoration, even to spirits of the first rank and order. For, as the same Apostle interprets another passage of the Psalmist, When God brought his first begotten Son into the world, he saith, Let all the angels of God worship him. Heb. i. 6.

Should not such a reflection as this make us resolve to do nothing beneath that nature which God has so highly honoured? Not to pollute it with vile affections and lusts; Not to set it upon mean and unworthy pursuits, and on minding earthly things; but to have our conversation in heaven; from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body. Phil. iii. 19, 20, 21.

A sense of birth and noble blood will often keep men from doing things beneath themselves, when no other motive can restrain them: And shall it not be sufficient to preserve us from every evil and desling work, to consider our near alliance with God himself, by the intervention of the Man Christ Jesus? Surely such a consideration should engage us, after the most powerful manner, to purify our natures, even as his is pure; and to cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit. 2 Cor. vii. 1.

And as God's assuming our nature should make us reflect often on the dignity and worth of it, and resolve not to deile that with base and brutish enjoyments which Christ has thus ennobled and sanctified; so, on the other hand,

The condescension also of the Son of God, in this mysterious work of our redemption, should infuse into us a spirit of universal humility. Since He who has the brightness of his Father's glory, and the express image of his person (Heb. i. 3.), emptied himself willingly of all that glory, to become a vile and miserable creature for the salvation of men, what a deep lowliness of mind ought we (in imitation of him) to carry about us, through the several stages of life, and the different administrations of Providence? How willing should it make us to undertake any work, to be seen in any office, though never so mean and low, that tends any way to the good and welfare of mankind? It is the great Apostle's argument, Let nothing be done (says he) through strife, or vain-glory; but in lowliness of mind, let each esteem other better than themselves. Look not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others. Let this mind be in you, which was also in Christ Jesus; who being in the form of

God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God; but made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant; and being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross. Phil. ii. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8

A fifth thing I would recommend to you, from considering the incarnation of Christ, is, that we would take care to trace all the steps of that example which he set us in the flesh; and which that he might set us, was one great end of his taking our nature upon him. And, oh! let not this end be frustrated, by our neglecting to look up to that admirable pattern of all virtue and holiness in the life of the immaculate Jesus, which the four gospels have afforded us! A life, as useful to be handed down to us in all its circumstances, as his very precepts themselves. For in that he exemplified his precepts, and gave an instance of the practicableness, the beauty, and the power of them. Such an instance, as charms the eyes, and engages the hearts of all that behold it; and will, if well attended to, have the same influence upon us, that the enjoying the immediate view of God, face to face, once had upon Moses; it will make us shine with part of that lustre we are looking upon, and transform us into some kind of resemblance with it. We all, with open face beholding, as in a glass, the glory of the Lord (2 Cor. iii. 18.); that is, viewing carefully the image of our Lord's life, as it is drawn to us in the glass of the Evangelists, and studying to express it in ourselves, we shall be changed (as it follows) into the same image from glory to glory; from one degree of virtue and perfection to another, till at last we arrive at the very measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ. Ephes. iv. 13.

I shall mention but one improvement more of the doctrine of the day, and then conclude.—And that is, that we should take occasion from hence, highly to esteem and reverence the evangelical dispensation: To value and prize that everlasting gospel, which Christ sealed to us with his blood; above all other books, religions, and philosophies; above all other methods of living and dying that have been ever taught or practised in the world.

Were there nothing contained in it, but that one faithful saying, worthy of all acceptation, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners (1 Tim. i. 15); even that should recommend it more to us, and make us take greater delight in perusing it, than turning over all the volumes of wit and reason, all the discourses of moral virtue, all the treatises of arts and sciences, which the learned part of mankind among the Gentiles have afforded us: We should count them all but dross and dung, in comparison of the excellency of the knowledge of Jesus Christ. Phil. iii. 8.

But the best expression of our reverence towards this gospel is, to comply with the terms of it. Let us remember that the last scope of the whole mystery of godliness is, to oblige mankind to be good and virtuous; and to lead lives answerable to such bright discoveries and motives as revelation has proposed to us. And therefore let me exhort and beseech every one of you this day, as ye would not (as far as in you lies) frustrate the design of our Saviour's birth; as ye would not baffle the truth of those prophecies concerning the innocence and purity of the lives of men under the reign of the Messiah; and, as ye would not hereafter wish, that your Saviour had never been born, nor you yourselves neither; to be careful for your parts to answer the great end of his incarnation, and to live as becomes a people, that have been thus redeemed of the Lord.

For how shall ye escape, if ye neglect so great salvation?

SERMON VIII.

The difficult Passages of Scripture are vindicated from such Objections as are usually made to them; and proper Directions given how we are to use them.

2 PET. iii. 16.

In which are some things hard to be understood: Which they that are unlearned and unstable wrest, as they do also the other scriptures, unto their own destruction.

ST. PETER, in this chapter, employs his pen in fortifying the minds of those Christians, to whom he writes, against that scorn and mockery they met with from some prophane men; who disputed the certainty of this world's dissolution, and of Christ's coming to judgment; and derided the eager expectations of the first believers concerning it. Where (said they) is the promise of his coming? for, since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation. Ver. 4. Against the attempts of these scoffers, the Apostle arms them, throughout this whole chapter; assures them of the reality of their hopes, and of the truth of the divine promises; and exhorts them to wait, with patience and humility, for their accomplishment. The Lord (saith he), is not slack concerning his promise (as some men count slackness), but is long-suffering to us-ward, not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance. Ver. 9.

Where he intimates the true reason of Christ's delaying his coming to be, that he may give room and space to all men every where to repent, and embrace his gospel. Wherefore, beloved, says he (a little afterwards), account that the long-suffering of our Lord is salvation. Even as our beloved brother Paul also, according to the wisdom given unto him, hath written unto you: As also in all his epistles, speaking in them of these things, in which are some things hard to be understood, which they that are unlearned and unstable wrest, as they do also the other scriptures, to their own destruction. Ver. 14, &c.

He seems purposely to have made mention of St. Paul in this place, not only because he concurred with him in his testimony concerning the end and design of God's long sufferance, but because his writings also had been objected against, by those very scoffers, as obscure and unintelligible. And therefore he took an occasion of mentioning one more out of them, that he might have an opportunity of vindicating the whole from these men's scornful exceptions. Account, says he, that the long-suffering of the Lord is salvation; even as our beloved brother Paul also, according to the wisdom given unto him, hath written unto you. The place of St. Paul referred to, seems to be that in the epistle to the Romans (chap. ii. 4.), Deepinseth thou the riches of his goodness, and forbearance, and long-suffering; not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance? From which parallel text thus produced from St. Paul, he takes occasion to speak of all his writings, and of the imputation which in general lay upon them. As also in all his epistles (continues he), speaking in them of these things; in which, (i. e.) in which epistles [I explain it so, notwithstanding a criticism taken from the Greek, which would make the words which belong to the things spoken of in the epistles, and not to the epistles themselves, which criticism I shall not now trouble you with]. I say therefore in which epistles, are some things hard to be understood, which they that are unlearned and unstable (that are unlearned, i. e. unskilled and unversed in divine things, and unstable, i. e. of light, desultory, unbalanced minds) wrest, as they do the other scriptures, to their own destruction.

Having thus cleared the connexion of the text, I shall discourse on it after the following manner:

- I. By enlarging a little on the proposition itself, which it contains, that there are in St. Paul's writings, and in the other scriptures also, things hard to be understood.
- II. By giving some account how, and for what reason it has come to pass, that the scriptures are, and must be, in some measure obscure: how necessary and unavoidable it was, that there should be some passages in them dark and difficult even to those who lived at the time when they were written, and yet more so to us, who live at this distance from the age of the apostles.
- III. By shewing you that this carries no reflection at all in it upon the divine goodness or wisdom. And then, in the
- IV. And last place, by raising some observations from what has been said, and preventing the ill uses that may be made of it.

1. This proposition is evidently laid down in the text, that there are in St. Paul's writings things hard to be understood: And it is plainly intimated, that there are such things in the other parts of holy writ also: inasmuch as they who wrest these difficult passages of St. Paul, are said to wrest the other scriptures al

It is indeed an undoubted truth, and what no good Christian is, I think, in the least concerned to deny, that the books, both of the Old and New Testament, are not every where equally clear and intelligible. They have, like other books, a mixture of that which is easy, with that which is hard to be understood; a great deal that is plain and obvious, and somewhat also that is obscure and difficult. Notwithstanding they were designed to contain a revelation of God's will to men, yet was not that revelation designed to partake every where alike of the nature of its great Author and Revealer, who is (in the phrase of St. John) Light, and in whom there is no darkness at all. 1 John, i. 5.

Sometimes the things spoken of are so mysterious and sublime, that our limited and weak apprehensions can hardly reach them. Sometimes the manner of speaking, even concerning common things, is dark and dubious. The Apocalypse is received into the canon, together with the other parts of scripture; the sense of it has been much sought and searched after, by pious and inquisitive men, in all ages of the church: And yet we have reason to believe, that it has never yet been thoroughly understood by any man.

The beginning of St. John's gospel is so far intelligible, as that it plainly enough establishes the divinity of our Lord, and his co-eternity with God the Father: but yet nobody, I think, will say, that the sense of every term in that chapter is so clear and easy, as that no Christian, of whatever rank or degree, can, upon perusing, and attentively considering the whole, miss the meaning of it.

Even the discourses of our blessed Lord are somewhat dark and intricate in some parts of them. That with Nicodemus about regeneration (John, iii.), and that with the men of Capernaum, about eating his body and blood (John, vi.), have in them what will command and exercise our utmost attention. And his account of the destruction of Jerusalem, in St. Matthew (Matth. xxiv), is so interwoven with that of the day of judgment, that it is very difficult to distinguish exactly, what expressions belong to the one, and what to the other.

And then, as to St. Paul in particular, his doctrines of justification by faith, and not by works; of election and reprobation (Gal. ii. 16); his description of the struggle between sin and the law, in the natural man, as yet unassisted by grace; and his account of the spiritual body with which we are to rise at the last day. (Rom. vii. 1 Cor. xv.) are sufficient instances of the truth of St. Peter's assertion, that in him particularly are some things hard to be understood.

This truth therefore being supposed, I proceed now, in the second place, to give some account, how these obscure passages came to have a place in scripture: how it could not otherwise be but that the holy writings should, in some parts of them, be dark and difficult, even to those who lived at the time when they were written, and yet more so to us, who live at this distance from the age of the apostles.

And the plain account of this matter is, that, though the scripture was written by men, under the immediate inspiration and guidance of the Holy Ghost, yet were those men, at the time of this inspiration, left to the free use of their own natural faculties and power; and to express themselves every one after their particular fashion and manner. The Holy Ghost, though it presided over the minds and pens of the apostles, so far as to preserve them from error, yet doth not seem to have dictated to them what they were to say, word by word, but in that to have left them, in good measure, if not altogether, to themselves. Which appears plainly from hence, in that we find the several writers of the New Testament always in their several proper and peculiar characters; and as different in their styles almost, as one human author is from another.

For what is left to men to express, placed only under an over-ruling power, which necessitates them to speak nothing but truth, must needs be expressed, though always truly, yet after the unequal, imperfect manner of men, sometimes more darkly, and sometimes more clearly. I say therefore, that the apostles and evangelists, making use of their natural faculties and ways of speech, in committing to writing the truths delivered to them, it could not be expected that they should speak always with the same degree of perspicuity, because no other writer does so.

Further, the nature of some things they delivered was such, so high and heavenly, so obscure and altogether unknown to men, that the language of men could not but fail under them. When they were to express them, they were of necessity sometimes to fall short, in what they said, of what they imagined and conceived; and, for want of fit and adequate terms, to clothe their thoughts in unequal and improper ones. Particular as to St. Paul, who had been in the third heaven and there heard things unutterable; was it to be expected, that, when he came down from thence, he should have spoke of those mysteries after a clear and satisfactory manner? No, those to whom he spake must have been in the third heaven too, thoroughly to have understood his meaning.

It is no wonder, therefore, that there should be passages in scripture of a doubtful and uncertain meaning, even to those who lived at the time when that scripture was penned. It is yet less a wonder, that there should be many more such, with regard to us, who live at this distance from the age of the apostles.

For consider we with ourselves, what manner of men the apostles were in their birth and education; what country they lived in; what language they wrote in; and we shall find it rather wonderful, that there are so few, than that there are so many things, that we are at a loss to understand. They were men all (except St. Paul) meanly born and bred, and instructed utterly in all the arts of speaking and writing. All the languages they were masters of, was purely what was necessary to express themselves upon the common affairs of life, and in matters of intercourse with men of their own rank and profession. When they came therefore to talk of the great doctrines of the cross, to preach up the astonishing truths of the gospel; they brought to be sure their old idiotisms and plainness of speech along with them. And is it strange then, that the deep things of God should not always be expressed by them in words of the greatest propriety and clearness?

The Eastern manner of thinking and speaking, at that time especially when the scripture was written, was widely different from ours, who live in this age, and this quarter of the world. The language of the East speaks of nothing simply, but in the boldest and most lofty figures, and in the longest and most strained allegories. Its transitions from one thing to another, are irregular and sudden, without the least notice given. Its manner of expressing things is wonderfully short and comprehensive, so as to leave much more to be understood than is plainly and directly spoken. And this also cannot but contribute to make the holy writings seem, in some parts of them obscure to such as are used to throw their thoughts and their words into a quite different mould.

Beyond all this, we, at this distance, cannot be exactly acquainted with the occasions upon which some parts of scripture were written; which nevertheless are the true and proper keys that open the meaning of them. We see not the frequent allusions to customs then known and in use. We are in the dark to many of the objections made to the apostles doctrine, which are tacitly obviated and answered by them in their epistles, without being mentioned. Under these, and many other disadvantages, the holy scriptures must needs lie, with regard to the obviousness of their sense and meaning, to us, at this distance: and it can be no blemish to them therefore, if that meaning be not always obvious.

I might, with truth, add one thing more upon this head, that, where the interpretation of scripture has any difficulty, that difficulty is often, in good measure, owing to the preposterous endeavours used, by some men, to explain and clear it. The multiplicity of comments written upon scripture, and the variety of all the possible senses of any text, started by those writers, have been so far from reaching the end aimed at, the dissipating all doubts and difficulties, that they have cast a mist over many places, which of themselves were plain and clear; and have rendered some, that were really a little obscure, yet more unintelligible.

Numberless volumes have been written on scripture, in every age almost since it was published; and still the later writers have generally striven to distinguish themselves from the elder, by some new guess, by saying somewhat that hath not been said before. And thus the mind of an honest enquirer is perplexed and confounded, and, in the midst of a thousand false meanings, easily loses sight of the true one.

But still it will be said, that these are only rational accounts how scripture comes in some places to be obscure, not at all justifications of its being so. God, who inspired the apostles to write the holy scripture, might, if he had pleased, have suggested to them the very words also in which it was to be written; and, by that means, have made it all clear and easy, and took away all occasion of doubts and disputes concerning it. And since he could have done so, why was it not done, if so be the scripture were designed for a rule of faith and manners? For can a rule be too certain? Can a man know too plainly what he is to do, and what he is to believe?

1st place, That it carries no reflection upon the divine goodness or wisdom, that the scripture is not in every part as plain and clear, as it was possible to have been made.

For (1st) the goodness of God is by no means obliged to do every thing for us that is possible to be done, but only that which is fitting and sufficient, in order to the end it designs. Now the end proposed by God, in causing the scripture to be written, is, to afford us a complete rule and measure of whatever is to be believed or done by us. If therefore, in all points of faith and practice, scripture is sufficiently plain and clear, it is as plain and clear as it need to be; and it can be no reflection on the divine goodness, not to have made it plainer.

be believed or done by us, is sufficiently evident in scripture, will appear from these two considerations:

1. The darkness of scripture in some particular places does not hinder its being generally plain and clear. Its having some things in it hard to be understood, implies, that it has but some, and that most things in it are easy to be understood, and lie open and level to the meanest understandings. The truth is, whatever difficulties there are in scripture, they are few and little in comparison of what is plain and intelligible there. Take it altogether, and it well deserves the character holy David bestows on it; that it is a lantern unto his feet, and a light unto his paths, Psalm cxix. 105.; that the testimony of the Lord is sure, and giveth wisdom unto the simple, ver. 130; that the commandment of the Lord is pure, and giveth light unto the eyes, Psalm xix. 8. And if in general, and for the most part, scripture be perspicuous and clear, we have reason to think there is enough of it clear to instruct us in the whole of our duty; and make us sufficiently wise unto salvation; especially since, in the

2^d place, Nothing there that is hard to be understood, is necessary to be understood by us; and therefore, whatever truth is contained in any obscure place of scripture, we may satisfy ourselves, that the knowledge or practice of it shall never be required at our hands upon the account of its being contained there.

I say, upon the account of its being contained there; for a necessary doctrine that is delivered obscurely in one place may yet be revealed clearly in another and wherever it is clearly revealed we are obliged to take notice of it. But whatever doctrine is contained in one or more obscure texts of scripture, and no where else clearly expressed, is not necessary to be embraced and believed by us: nor shall we be condemned for not receiving it.

The goodness of God is sufficiently justified, in proposing the scripture as a rule of faith to us; for though it be not equally perspicuous and clear throughout, yet it is in the main, and for the most part so; and wherever it is hard to be understood, it is on that very account not necessary to be understood. But,

Secondly, Neither is there any reflection by this means cast on the wisdom of God. For though it may be said, if these hard places are not capable of being understood, why were they written? Why were they made parts of the revelation of God's will to men, if we are still as much in the dark to them as if they had never been revealed? Yet to this it may, in the

1. First place, be answered, that there is no part of scripture so obscure as to be utterly unintelligible. St. Peter says only, there are some things hard, but he says not, that there are any impossible to be understood. It is difficult indeed in some places to reach the sense of the inspired writers: but still it is not so difficult but that it may be done, if with care and attention we study the holy scripture; if we free ourselves from prepossessions and prejudices; if we take in all proper helps, and make use of all proper means; and, above all, if we ardently beg of God the assistance of his good Spirit, to teach and enlighten us, and lead us into all truth: I say, there is no difficulty so great in scripture, but that, by the supernatural illuminations of God's Spirit, concurring with our natural endeavours, it is possible to be mastered; and therefore God did not inspire the holy writers to write any thing altogether in vain and to no purpose; for nothing written by them is perfectly incapable of being understood; only some things lie readier to our sight, upon the surface as it were of the text, and others lie deeper, and we are forced therefore, in the words of Solomon, to dig for them as for hid treasures. Prov. ii. 4. But,

Secondly, The wisdom of God is further justified in leaving these hard passages, inasmuch as there are several wise ends which it serves by it, and several weighty reasons which it has for so doing.

He left them on purpose to humble the presumption and pride of man, to confound the wisdom of the wise of this world, 1 Cor. i. 19. and to give us an instance of the mighty power of God, in making those plain men, the apostles, utter such great and sublime truths, as those of the most improved understandings among the heathens, by the mere light of nature, never did nor could do.

To secure the majesty of religion therefore, he wrapped up some of the great mysteries of it in obscurity; He made (as the Psalmist speaks) darkness his secret place; his pavilion round about him with dark water, and thick clouds to cover him. Psalm xviii. 11.

Further, He left them also to exercise our industry and to engage our attention. He designed the holy book to be such as that we might make it always our companion and our study; that our delight might continually be (as David's was) in the law of the Lord, and in that we might meditate day and night. Psalm i. 2. In order to which it was requisite that the sense of every thing, every where, should not be too plain and obvious: for how then could we have found always fresh matter for our thoughts and inquiries? No, the treasure of divine knowledge was necessarily so to be hid, in these sacred volumes, as not soon to be exhausted, so as continually to provoke our searches, and to feed our mind with ever fresh discoveries; so as that, how long soever we meditate upon it, we may have still room left for further meditations. Were all plain, were all open there, the mind would quickly droop, and the attention languish, upon the repeated views of that which it was so well acquainted with, and knew so thoroughly.

Again, God mixed together obscure with plain things, deep with common truths in scripture, that what was addressed to all might be adapted to every one's capacity. The babes in Christ, as well as grown saints, the weak promiscuously, and the strong, were to read the holy scriptures; and therefore fit it was that there should be food in it proportioned to both, milk for the one, and strong meat for the other.

Yet further; These dark doctrines and puzzling passages were inserted to be the test of ingenuous, of sincere, and well-disposed minds; to see whether, when we were once satisfied that a book came from God, we would acquiesce in everything contained in it, and submit ourselves (without disputes or cavils) as we do those parts of it which shocked, as to those which enlightened our minds; or whether we would not, as many have done, lay hold of every obscure passage to the prejudice of scripture, though we had otherwise never so many arguments for the divine original of it, and reject the authority of all that which is plain and clear there, for the sake of something which we do not comprehend.

Finally, God left these obscurities in holy writ, on purpose to give us a taste and glimpse as it were of those great and glorious truths, which shall hereafter fully be discovered to us in another world, but which now are, in some measure, hidden from our eyes, on purpose to make us earnestly aspire after, and long for, that blessed state and time, when all doubts shall be cleared, and the veil taken off from all mysteries: when the book that is now in some measure shut, shall be opened, and every one of the seven seals thereof loosed. Rev. v. 5. When that which is perfect shall come, and that which is in part shall be done away. 1 Cor. xiii. 10. When we shall exchange faith for sight, hope for enjoyment, reasoning for intuition; and shall not, as we do now, see through a glass darkly, but know, even as we are known. Ver. 12.

To that blessed state, God of his infinite mercy bring us all, &c.

SERMON IX.

2 PET. iii. 16.

In which are some things hard to be understood: Which they that are unlearned and unstable wrest, as they do also the other scriptures, unto their own destruction.

IN my former discourse I shewed you that these words of St. Peter relate directly to the writings of St. Paul, in which he owns there are some things hard to be understood, and that they who are unlearned and unstable wrested them, as they did the other scriptures, to their own destruction. Whereby he intimates, that there are also in the other parts of scripture, as well as in the writings of St. Paul, obscure passages, liable to be misunderstood, wrested and perverted by unlearned and unstable readers.

I have therefore taken an occasion from hence to discourse to you at large concerning the difficult parts of holy writ, so as to take in the general argument; and yet to keep my eye more particularly all along upon the books of the New Testament, to which St. Peter's words chiefly refer.

I proposed to treat of this subject under the four following heads:

I. By enlarging a little on the proposition allowed and laid down in the text, That there are in St. Paul's writings, and in the other scriptures also, things hard to be understood.

II. By giving some account how, and for what reason, it hath come to pass, that the scriptures are and must be in some measure obscure: how necessary and unavoidable it was, that there should be some passages in them dark and difficult, even to those who lived at the time when they were written, and yet more so to us, who live at this distance from the age of the apostles.

III. By shewing you, that this carries in it no reflection, either upon the goodness or wisdom of God: Not on his goodness; because though he has left some things in holy writ hard to be understood, yet he hath left enough there easy and plain, enough to inform us clearly of the whole compass of what we are bound to believe and to practise: Not on his wisdom; because these dark parts of holy writ have their uses as well as the clear ones; there being many wise ends and weighty reasons for inserting them; several of which I reckoned up to you in my last discourse.

IV. And lastly, I was to raise some observations from what hath been said; to prevent the wrong uses that might, and to point out the true and only use that ought to be made of it.

The two first of these heads have been fully spoken to; the third has been entered upon, and in some measure cleared; and what remains behind of it will fall into the fourth and last general head, the enlarging on which shall be the business of this present discourse.

And the first thing I shall observe, from what has been said on this subject, shall be, the folly and unreasonableness of those men who endeavour, from the obscurity of some parts of scripture, entirely to destroy the authority of it.

For thus they argue: The bible, say they, is a book ordered by God to be written for the information of mankind in what they are to believe and to do. And can we think, that such a book, from such an author, should have any defects in it? Can it be imagined, that God would speak to man, and yet not speak so as in every case to be understood by him? Is he either not able or not willing to express himself clearly? If neither of these can be supposed without blasphemy, how comes it to pass that this volume is so full of difficulties and mysteries? that this revelation of his will wants a yet further revelation, to give us a plain account of its meaning?

Thus do the ungodly reason with themselves, but not aright (Wisd. ii. 1), as will appear from these following considerations:

It is a strange sort of argument, surely, that a book, which comes from God, must have nothing in it obscure, and hard to be understood. On the contrary, I think it were much to be suspected, that such a book as this was not of divine authority, if it should be found to lie ready and open to the most ordinary apprehensions in every part and passage of it. It is given to us, on purpose to open to us some discoveries concerning the divine nature, its essence and ineffable perfections; to inform us of mysterious truths, the secrets of heaven hid from natural reason, and from former ages. And can a book, do we think, that speaks of these deep things of God, with which the natural man is utterly unacquainted, speak so as not to give us the least trouble in understanding it? Can that, like which our eyes never saw, nor our ears heard, nor hath it entered into the heart (1 Cor. ii. 9.) to conceive any thing before, be told us in words as easy to be apprehended, as those by which we express the most common things that we every day converse with? It is not so, when we first set ourselves to learn any human art or science: the terms, the principles, the propositions of it, are at first sight strange and unaccountable, and make no bright impression upon the mind. They amaze, they puzzle, but they do not enlighten us; till by repeated views we have made them familiar and easy to us. And why then should we expect, that divine mysteries, and the things of another world, should more easily be taught and learnt, than human arts and sciences? The obscurity of the subject, whatever it be, must needs cause a proportionable obscurity in the expression of it; and no wonder then, if scripture be dark in some places, where it speaks of things so remote from human knowledge and apprehension.

Dark it must needs be, unless God, who miraculously enlightened the minds of the prophets and apostles, when they were to write it, should miraculously also open the understanding of every one that comes to read it. So that the difficulties occurring in some passages of a divine revelation, are so far from being an argument against its coming from God, that, on the contrary, it were not reasonable to think it to be a divine revelation, if there were nothing abstruse and difficult in it.

Should it be further objected, that the design of scripture is, to reveal God's nature and will to mankind, to be a sure guide, and an easy rule of our belief and practice; and it ought therefore, in order to the attainment of this end, to be in every respect plain and clear: for to no purpose would it be given us by God, as a guide and a rule, if it be obscurely and doubtfully expressed.

To this the answer is ready; that the scripture, being intended by God as a rule of faith and manners, must needs be, and certainly is, so far clear, as to reach the end it is intended for; so far, as to enlighten our minds in all necessary saving truths, and to afford us, in plain intelligible terms, all that knowledge that is requisite to carry us to heaven. And thus far we affirm the scripture to be clear and easy. But it follows, that it ought, on this account, to be plain and clear, in every part and passage of it. If there be enough in it easy to be apprehended, it sufficiently answers the end for which it was designed, though there be some things in it which are not so. And therefore the objection fails in this, that it supposes scripture to be written perfectly for this end, and for no other, the affording us an easy familiar rule of faith and manners. This indeed was the chief, but it was not the only, end proposed in writing it.

Besides this it was intended (as you have heard) so to be written, as to humble the pride of men, and confound the wisdom of the wise: so as to try our probity, and to exercise our strictest attention, and to employ our industry, so as to create a reverence and awe in us of the Divine Revealer; and to give us an instance of the mighty power of God, in making those plain men, the apostles, utter such great and sublime truths, as those of the most improved understandings among the Heathen, by the mere light of nature, never did, or could do: in a word, so as to give us a light taste and glimpse only of those truths that were fully to be revealed to us in another world; and, by that means, to make us the more earnestly reach out our thoughts to, aspire after, and long for, the future and full enjoyment of them. And in order to attain these ends, it was fit and requisite that some parts of it should be involved in obscurity; as I discoursed to you the last opportunity. And therefore it must not be argued, that the written word of God, being designed for a rule of faith and action, must be perspicuous throughout: because there were other ends besides this, to which some parts of it were designed; and to the attaining which, the dark and difficult places in holy writ contribute as much, as the plain and most intelligible passages do, towards building us up in those doctrines that are necessary to salvation.

But then it is further objected, that this way of accounting for the obscurity of holy writ in some things, supposeth it to be evident in all things necessary to salvation; a supposition which will not easily be granted by those we have to deal with. For, say they, are not the doctrines of the divinity of Christ, and the Holy Ghost, and those of the same rank with these, necessary to salvation? And yet they are not plainly and clearly contained in scripture: for then reasonable men, upon reading scripture, could not have doubted, whether they were contained there or not; much less in good earnest believed that they were not contained there.

Now the true account of this matter is this:

First. It is not pretended, that these doctrines are plainly contained in every text of scripture, which speaks of them; but only that, in some one text or more, they are proposed to us convincingly and clearly; and if a truth be once delivered so clearly as to leave no doubt, it is the same thing to us, who acknowledge the divine authority of all parts of scripture, as if it were many times there repeated. For example, were there no other text for the proof of the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, in the sense in which the church of God hath always professed to believe it, but that only where our Saviour commands his disciples to baptize in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost (Matth. xxviii. 19.); or that where St. John speaks of the three witnesses in heaven (1 John, v. 7.); either of these texts would be sufficient to make that doctrine an evident part of scripture, though in all the other passages usually produced for it, it should be allowed to be expressed obscurely.

Again, Neither is it pretended that these doctrines are any where, throughout the whole Bible, expressed with the utmost degree of evidence and clearness, which words are anyways possibly capable of; but only that they are so expressed, that an honest impartial mind cannot well miss the sense of them. It might have been said indeed, in so many words, that Christ and the Holy Spirit were, from all eternity, distinct from the Father, and, together with him, one God blessed for ever; and equally the objects of our religious worship and service. But though this be not said there in so many terms, it is said however in such, as an unbiased well-meaning man cannot mistake; and he that is not so, though it should have been said in these very terms, would perhaps have found a way to have mistaken, or rather wilfully to have perverted, the sense of them.

The truth is, God never designed to give us an account of the mysteries of christianity, in expressions every way so bright and clear, as should prevent all possible wrestlings and misconstructions. For this had been to do too great force to our assent, which ought to be free and voluntary. This had been to rob us of the rewards due to believing, and to take away the proper test and trial of sincere and ingenuous minds.

Besides, had all points of doctrine been delivered with such a degree of exactness, been so minutely explained, so strictly and cautiously guarded on all sides, as to shut out the possibility of any mistaken meaning, the Bible had been too voluminous and too subtle a book for common use. And though to some few distinguishing heads, it might have given better satisfaction, yet to the most, that is, to the unlettered part of mankind, it would have been ten times more obscure and unintelligible, than even now it is represented to be. So that upon the whole it was extremely fit and proper that these doctrines should be delivered with that degree of clearness as to be easily understood; not so as to be perfectly incapable of being misunderstood. It was requisite that they should be asserted shortly and plainly, not that they should be fenced about with all those nice distinctions which could anyway guard them from the attempts of the most captious and unreasonable.

And with this degree of clearness we affirm that all necessary truths are delivered in scripture, i. e. with such a degree of clearness as is necessary. Nor does it weaken the strength of this assertion to say, that the sense of those passages in scripture, which we think plain to this purpose, is disputed by some, and absolutely denied by others; and therefore is not so plain as we imagine. For at this rate there would perhaps be never a plain text left in the whole book of God. Since what text almost is there, that has not been the subject of different interpretations and opinions?

There is scarce any thing so absurd, says an ancient, in nature or in man, but some philosopher or other will find it. And there is scarce any thing so extravagant in divinity (may we say), but that some obstinate opinionative man or other has maintained it, and made a wretched shift to countenance his opinion by the authority of scripture, miserably wrested and perverted to his purpose. But what then? This makes no more against the perspicuity of the holy writings in all necessary doctrines, than the wild opinion of that old philosopher who affirmed snow to be black, disproves the clearness and certainty of those informations which proceed from the senses.

Let not a man therefore say, that the scripture is not plain in those things in which we pretend it is, because in those very things the church of God hath understood it one way, and Arius, Socinus, or some such broacher of heresy, another. For this proves nothing, but that there have been men hardly enough to deny somewhat, which all the world before them allowed: But it is by no means an argument of the obscurity of scripture expression, unless we could know certainly, that these men were honest and upright in their searches, acted with no hy-designs, had no vain end which they proposed to themselves, of heading a party, or baffling received opinions; came to search these books without bias, prejudice, or any pre-engagements to some opinions of their own, which they were willing and resolved to find there. Without all this, and a great deal more, be proved (which indeed is not capable of proof), the scriptures may be clear, though men of clear reason in other things do not or will not understand them.

Well then, the obscurity of scripture carries no objection at all in it, either against the goodness or wisdom of God: for in all things necessary to be understood, it is obvious and plain; and in what is unnecessary to be understood there are many good and wise reasons why it should not be plain. In the mean time, let those who reject scripture be pleased to find us out a system of religion delivered by God without any of these difficulties in it. We desire no more of them, but to leave us in possession of our bibles, till they can shew us a clearer revelation, and more worthy of the divine Revealer.

If to this they shall say (as many in our own times do say), What need of any revelation at all? Reason is clear, and by that we may guide ourselves; God has implanted a light in every one sufficient to shew him the way to heaven:—We must ask them, whether natural religion speaks so plainly in any one point of religion; but that some perverse man or other has contradicted it? And then, by their own rule concerning the obscurity of scripture, that point is not plain from reason, because rational thinking men have denied its plainness. So that a man who, on account of the obscurity of holy writ, shall pretend to reject the Christian religion, and turn deist, must, upon the same account, reject deism too, and turn atheist. For there are a great many things in the notion of a God, and of that worship which natural religion directs us to pay him, that he can never satisfy himself about, nor thoroughly understand. Nay, he must not stay at atheism neither, for the very same reason; since no system of that kind can be contrived, which is not in many parts of it obscure and unintelligible. A great instance of which we have in the writings of that modern atheist Spinoza. In a word he must be nothing, believe nothing, be of no opinion, but live under an indifference to all truths and falsehoods, in a pendulous state of mind; necessitated to act continually in order to some end supposed to be true, and yet doubting whether there be any such thing as truth or no; living under all the agonies and torments of a rooted scepticism.

Thus have I considered largely, and in some measure endeavoured to remove the first ill use that is made of the doctrine of the text by those perverse and unreasonable men, who take an advantage from the confessed obscurity of some parts of scripture, to dispute the authority of it.

I now hasten to mention some other ill uses that are made of what is owned here in the text, that there are in the inspired writings things hard to be understood.

And indeed, after what has been already discoursed, I need do little more than mention them; for to represent them, will be to disprove them.

Secondly, therefore, I observe, that it follows not from thence, as the Romanists would infer, that because of these obscure pages in scripture, there is absolute need of a supreme judge in controversies, who should determine the sense of every text, and among many false meanings of it, infallibly guide us into the only true one. I say, it by no means follows from hence that such a judge is necessary, for this plain reason; because, as we have heard, none of those points that are anyways obscure and doubtful, are necessary to be determined. In these every man may abound in his own sense, and have his own opinions to himself; and if he does but maintain those opinions with sobriety and modesty, without rending the unity, or disturbing the peace of the church, though he may be under an error, yet that error shall not be rigorously imputed to him.

Much less does it follow from hence,

Thirdly, That, because of these obscurities in scripture, therefore the book itself should be taken out of the people's hands. For though there are some things in it hard to be understood, yet many, nay most things there are easy to be understood, as that very expression in St. Peter intimates. And how unreasonable therefore is it, to make some dark passages in holy writ a pretence of locking up all at once, without distinction, from the generality of Christians; because there are a few things there which they cannot understand, therefore to let them understand nothing at all. And this is so much the harder, because (as we have heard) all that is necessary to be understood, is evidently contained in scripture. So that to deprive a man of that which he can understand, and which also it is necessary he should understand, for the sake of somewhat contained in the same book, which he cannot understand, and which it is no matter whether he doth understand or no, is an unreasonable piece of cruelty.

I will be bold to say, that, upon the same grounds that the Roman church denies the people the liberty of reading scripture, she might have debaird them also the privilege of our Saviour's conversation while he lived upon earth. For there were several things in the course of his instructions, hard to be understood; and therefore, for fear of misinterpreting those things, it was convenient, might she have said, that all ignorant, unskilful men should utterly abstain from his company. But our Saviour did not deter the common people from approaching him, because now and then he spake a dark parable. And therefore neither ought they to be withheld from reading his gospel, though there be some hard things there, which perhaps they will read without understanding.

But fourthly, and lastly, These ill uses of the doctrine of the text being removed, the truest and most proper use we can make of it is, from a sense of these things hard to be understood in scripture, to form ourselves into a deep humility and lowliness of mind, in the perusing them; to read that sacred volume with a wise jealousy, and a wary distrust of our ourselves; not with a conceited opinion of our own gifts and parts, as if we alone were able to fathom all depths, and to grasp all mysteries. Except ye receive my gospel as a little child, said our Saviour, ye cannot enter into the kingdom of heaven. Mark, x. 15. And except ye read my gospel as a little child, may he be as well supposed to say, with such an humble and teachable temper, with such a freedom from vanity, prepossession, and prejudices, as belongs to that infant state, ye cannot enter into the deep things of it; those things which are expressly said to be revealed to babes, but hidden from the wise. Matt. xi. 25.

Let us therefore weigh and consider what we read as well as we can; but let us not too much indulge our private reasonings upon, and fanciful expositions of scripture. When we stick any where, let us modestly consult those who should know better than we, and whose particular business it is to understand and explain this sacred volume. Let us inquire what has been the interpretation generally received in the church of Christ in the purest ages of it. Or, if that be hard to come at, what is the opinion of our own church, that particular member of the mystical body of Christ, into which it has pleased the divine Providence to engraft us. When we have found it, let us resolve not lightly to vary from it; not without strong reasons and clear convictions to the contrary; and even then to do it with modesty, and be content to enjoy our own private opinions, without endeavouring to make proselytes, or troubling the peace of the church, for the sake of them. Let us pay a due deference, though not a blind obedience, to so great an authority. And let us not reverence her decisions only, but make use of her admirable words also, which she puts into the mouth of every one, who desires to grow in the knowledge of scripture.

Blessed Lord, who hast caused all holy scripture to be written for our learning, grant that we may in such wise hear them, read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest them, that, by patience and comfort of thy holy Word, we may embrace, and ever hold fast, the blessed hope of everlasting life, which thou hast given us through Jesus Christ our Lord.

SERMON X.

2 PET. III. 16.

Which they that are unlearned and unstable es; as they do also the other Scriptures, to their own destruction.

FROM the former part of the verse I have already taken occasion to discourse to you largely concerning the obscurity of holy writ. In the latter part of it, which I have proposed now to handle, St. Peter gives us an account of the ill impressions that these difficult parts of scripture make often on the minds of weak Christians; they are wrested by them (he tells us) to their own destruction.

By unlearned men, the apostle means not such as wanted that which we commonly call learning, but such as were not well skilled in divine things. By unstable, such as not being well grounded in the faith, were, upon that account, easy to be drawn aside into pernicious opinions, and destructive errors. Such, he says, as these, wrest, i. e. misunderstand, misapply, and pervert the writings of St. Paul, and the other scriptures: and this they do to their own destruction; that is, to their eternal ruin in another world. So that the meaning of this whole passage is, that some men, not being firmly rooted and grounded in the true faith of Christ, and being by consequence of an uncertain and wavering judgment in matters of religion, were apt to make an ill use of the difficult places of scripture, and to turn them to such a sense as destroyed Christianity; and such therefore as could not but end in the destruction of those who asserted and maintained it.

This at first sight perhaps may seem an hard saying. What, will some men say, shall a man be ruined eternally for a misunderstood place of scripture? Shall they who own the divine authority of holy writ (as it is plain these persons did), and who are studious to know and embrace the true sense of it every where, if in some obscure passages they should mistake it, be answerable for that mistake at the hazard of their salvation?

Better, at this rate, had it been, that the bible should never have been given men, if it be so very fatal a thing to make a wrong exposition, even of the most doubtful and intricate parts of it.

I shall endeavour to give an answer to this complaint, by stating the just bounds, and shewing the great reasonableness, of St. Peter's assertion; and shall then make use of the truth of the text, thus explained and justified, in some observations and inferences that it will afford us.

In order to state the bounds of the assertion, it will be fit to consider, more particularly,

I. What is strictly to be understood here by wresting of scripture.

II. What kind of passages in scripture they were, that are said to have been thus wrested.

I. As to the first of these, it must be considered, that, to wrest scripture, doth in strictness of speech signify, not only to misinterpret and misunderstand it, out of weakness and ignorance, as any Christian may blamelessly do, but with some degree of perversity and wilfulness to force an unnatural and false construction upon it, in order to make it fall in with our corrupt opinions and prejudices, which we have before-hand entertained, and resolved not to part with. Thus much is intimated by the original word επιβάν, which signifies, either to detort or turn away, or to torment, and put to the question. In the first of these senses, when applied to scripture, it implies, that these wresters of it bent and warped the straight line and measure of their duty, on purpose to make it suit with their own crooked opinions. In the second (which comes to much the same), that they did, as it were, torment and vex it, till it spake according to their minds.

II. We are to observe, what kind of passages in scripture they were, which these men are said to have wrested. They were such as were hard to be understood (so the preceding words speak), and such as, for that very reason, there was no necessity that they should understand; and yet these men would pretend to understand them, and to be very positive also, and peremptory in their opinions concerning them. Further it appears, that these places treated not of slight indifferent points of doctrine, but of such as were of the utmost concern and moment; such as were the foundations of the Christian faith, and the very pillars that supported the whole frame of religion. I say, it appears, that they treated of such points as these, from the foregoing parts of this chapter, where St. Peter discourses of the day of judgment, of its certainty, and of the wise reasons for which God was pleased to delay it: and represents some men as scoffing at these doctrines, and saying, Where is the promise of his coming? For since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were. Ver. 4. To convince these scoffers, he urges the authority of St. Paul to them; who in his epistles had maintained the same assertions, not always however expressed with such a degree of evidence and clearness as might be thought necessary to prevent all mistakes; from whence ill men had taken an occasion to abuse his words to a quite different sense, and to pervert his meaning. So that the points of doctrine to which these wrested texts referred, were great and fundamental ones; and which it was of the last importance to be rightly instructed in. And to this we may add also a Third remark, That this forced interpretation of obscure passages was in opposition to other plain and evident texts. For since (as I have already discoursed to you) there is no point of moment, but what is somewhere or other plainly and perspicuously delivered in scripture, and since these wrested places of scripture, which St. Peter speaks of, related, as you have heard, to points of moment; it follows, that they who wrested them, did it in contradiction to other plain and perspicuous parts of holy writ.

The full import of the text, therefore, under these several applications, will be, that they who, being misled by pride and vanity, or any other lust and passion, perverted the sense of scripture, in order to make it suit with their own wicked practices, or justify their ill opinions, who vexed and tortured texts in order to make them speak such language as was for their purpose, who did this in passages very hard to be understood, and therefore not necessary to be understood, and in points of doctrine which were of the utmost concern and importance, and interpreted these passages, in relation to these points, quite contrary to other plain and express places of scripture: these men, I say, are very justly and reasonably said to have wrested the scriptures to their own destruction. For surely there was such a complication of insincerity, pride, and obstinacy, in this manner of wresting scripture, as deserved such a condemnation.

And therefore to that question, shall a man be eternally ruined for a misunderstood place of scripture? we answer, Yes doubtless, under those circumstances which we have before explained, if it be a fundamental point, about which he is mistaken, and be much his own fault, that he is mistaken. A misunderstood place of scripture may overthrow one of the prime articles of faith, which God has made necessary to be believed in order to salvation: or it may destroy the morality of the gospel, by introducing a loose opinion concerning life and manners. By wresting one single passage of holy writ, a man may either deny the Lord who bought him (2 Pet. ii. 1.), or turn the Grace of God into lasciviousness. Jude, iv. And he that does either of these, cannot be said to be severely dealt with, though he be cut off from the mercies of the gospel. For a life led in opposition to the plain practical rules of Christianity, or without that faith which Christianity requires, are either of them a sufficient cause of our condemnation. And therefore such a wilful wresting of scripture as occasions either of these, must in its consequence be damnable, and excuse God in pronouncing this sentence, from all manner of severity or rigour in his dealings with us. This is the account of the true meaning of St. Peter's assertion in the next, and of the justness also, and reasonableness of it. Which points being thus stated and cleared, I come now, as I proposed, to make use of them, in some observations and inferences that they afford us, And,

First, it may be observed, that the scriptures were perverted, and turned by ill men to ill purposes, in the times of the apostles themselves; that they were no sooner written, but they were wrested. From whence we may learn these two things:

1st, That if this happened in the apostles' days, then well might it happen in after times, especially in this age, which is at so great a distance from the time of the apostles' writing. We may cease to wonder, how it has come to pass, that so many controversies have been started about the sense of scripture, that it has been urged to so many wrong and different purposes, and brought to support and countenance so many heretical opinions, in latter days, when we find that during the lives of St. Paul and St. Peter themselves, it was thus insincerely and unfairly dealt with. The ink was hardly dry, which fell from the apostles' pens, but men began to dispute about the words that were wrote in it; to misconstrue and misapply them, every one to such doctrines as pleased him best; and to draw from the inspired writings things destructive of faith and salvation, in the face of the inspired authors of them, without asking, or at least without taking their opinions in the point; who surely had been the properest men to have given an account of their own meaning. And if these things were so then, what wonder is it if ever since, and especially now, in these dregs of time; there be wilful men found, who will oppose their own vain fancies and novelties to the general sense of the whole body of Christians, and not submit themselves to such a concurrent testimony in the exposition of scripture, as, though of the utmost moment towards determining our assent, yet falls far short of infallibility and inspiration?

From the same observation also we may learn, in the 2d place, That an unerring expounder of scripture is not so useful and necessary as some men would make us believe it is; because if there were such an one, and he were known and acknowledged to be such by all men, yet would not that secure all men from misinterpreting scripture, as is plain from the instance of the text. The apostles were certainly unexceptionable interpreters of their own writings, and infallible judges of all controversies that could arise from them; and yet notwithstanding this, their writings were in their own time perverted, to countenance erroneous and heretical doctrines; and so doubtless would they be now, though there were an infallible judge upon earth still. And vain therefore is the pretence of our adversaries of the church of Rome, that such an infallible judge is necessary, to assure us of the true sense of scripture, and put an end to all controversies concerning it; since plain it is, that, when there was such an infallible judge, he did not put an end to all controversies of this kind: there were still a great many proud, pertinacious, and opinionative men left, that would not be concluded by him.

Now, if the inferring the necessity of God's acting in such or such a manner, from the convenience that would result to mankind from his so acting, be no very good argument in divinity, even when that convenience is allowed;

what a kind of argument must that be, which would prove the necessity of an infallible judge, from the great expedience of it towards determining all controversies, when even that expedience itself (as we have seen) wants to be proved?

But to go on. We may observe from St. Peter's assertion in the text.

Secondly, What temper of mind, what precautions, what degree of knowledge are requisite, in order to make our inquiries into the obscure parts of scripture, innocent and useful to us. It is plain that this is an attempt of some hazard, and that it may happen to cost us dear, as it did those in the text, if we do not fitly prepare and guard our minds against the danger of it: which may be done, if we manage our searches of this kind by these following rules and directions:

1st, We must take care that the end we propose to ourselves in these inquiries be good and laudable. They must not be entered upon out of mere curiosity and wantonness, nor out of a vain and fruitless desire of knowledge, nor out of a design of being more skillful and learned than other men, and of appearing to understand every thing; but the end of all our searches in this case ought to be, that we may improve in the skill of those divine truths which were on purpose committed to writing, that there might be matter in holy writ, fit always to employ our repeated meditations, and to exercise our strictest attention: that we may by such searches gain to ourselves higher and more enlarged apprehensions of God, a truer and clearer sense of the deep wisdom of all his mysterious dispensations, and may thus raise up our minds in higher degrees of holy admiration, reverence, and awe.

We must intend to qualify ourselves by these searches for the removing the objections raised by those who are no friends to scripture, for the justifying the darkest as well as the brightest parts of it, and making out to fair unprejudiced men the beautiful harmony of all the different but agreeing branches of the divine revelation.

2dly, We must come to this work, as with a right intention, so with a mind rightly disposed and qualified to pursue that intention: not presuming on our own strength: not with an high opinion and conceit of our particular gifts, abilities, or advantages, as if we alone were able to clear up all difficulties, and to go to the bottom of all mysteries, and that nothing were too hard for us. This is not a temper of mind, either naturally fitted for such a work, or which God delights to bless with supernatural assistances and discoveries. No, if ever we hope to make our inquiries of this kind successful and profitable to us, we must be sure to conduct them with great modesty, and a becoming diffidence and distrust of ourselves; humbly and chiefly relying upon God for his gracious help and assistance; and in order to it, putting up frequent and fervent petitions to that good Spirit which indited the holy scriptures, that he would please to enlighten us with the knowledge of all the deep mysteries contained there. It is humility and devotion that principally qualify us for such searches as these; and will do more by themselves, towards giving a man a true understanding of scripture, than all the gifts and parts in the world will do, when separated from them. For it is true in this instance, as well as in many others, that God resists the proud, and giveth grace to the lowly: James iv. 6.

And, as a good way to keep alive and improve this humility of mind in us, let us be sure:

3dly, In our searches of this kind ever to carry this truth along with us (a truth I have largely explained, and proved to you in a former discourse), that there is no place so hard to be understood, that so needful to be understood by us: If we maintain this reflection constantly on our minds, it will teach us not to lay too great stress upon these difficulties, nor to employ too much of our time upon them, so as to be in the least taken off from considering what is more plain and profitable in scripture, what can more easily and usefully be understood, and is indeed more necessary to be understood by us. Some men pore so much and so long upon passages of a disputed meaning, as if they thought it indispensably requisite to determine themselves of one side or other of the question, as if the whole of religion were concerned in such difficult inquiries: they are so busy in opening and explaining hard places, that they forget to meditate upon plain ones, and to govern their lives under a lively and vigorous sense of the doctrines contained in them: which is doing just as the Pharisees did, tithing mint and rue, and all manner of herbs, and passing over judgment and the love of God. Luke xi. 42. Whereas (as our Saviour in that case decides), These ought they to have done, and not to have left the other undone. A due reflection therefore upon this truth, that the understanding the obscure places of scripture is not a thing strictly required of us, or needful for us, will be of use to moderate our too great eagerness in the pursuit of such kind of knowledge; to render us less impatient and uneasy under what we do not understand of it, and less positive and dogmatical in what we do. And thus the two greatest temptations towards perverting scripture will be removed, an excessive curiosity in searches of this kind, and an over-weening fondness for our own private interpretations and opinions.

4thly, If we would not wrest the hard places in scripture, we must be sure to make that an inviolable rule and law to ourselves, never to expound them so as to oppose perspicuous and clear ones: but so to order our interpretation of doubtful points, as to make them fall in with the clear and intelligible parts of the same revelation; so as together with them to make up one complete body of truths, perfectly agreeing with each other.

The best way of knowing whether a line be crooked or not, is to apply it to one that is confessedly straight; and the purest way of not erring in obscure passages is to make plain texts the measure and judge of them. The greatest part of the abuses and misrepresentations of scripture have arisen from a contrary management; from men's giving obscure texts a new and particular sense of their own first, and then growing fond of that notion afterwards, and resolving to bring all the plainest passages in scripture, whether they will or no, to countenance and comply with it.

5thly, and lastly, That the safest and securest way of looking into these divinita of St. Paul, and the other holy writers is, to postpone the consideration of them till we have mastered what is sure and easy in scripture, till we have rooted and grounded ourselves in those points of doctrine that lie obvious and open; and when we have done that, there will be no danger of looking into any thing else, let it be never so hard and never so obscure. For either we shall hit upon the right interpretation of it, or, if we do not, the wrong one shall not hurt us. A man that holds all that is plainly contained in scripture, and all that is necessary to be held by him, may in that which is not plain, and not necessary, innocently abound in his own sense. For though he should in these matters mistake in his opinions, and mistake the sense of scripture, upon which he grounds those opinions, yet those mistakes cannot be fatal, because not fundamental. He can never maintain any thing directly repugnant to the Catholic faith, and evidently destructive of it; and while he does not, he may maintain what else he pleases; and so he does it with sobriety and modesty, and a due deference to the opinion of those who have a right to be listened to in these things, his error (if it be one) shall never prove dangerous, or be imputed to him. And this remark is what is plainly suggested to us by the words of the text, where St. Peter tells us, that those which rested the hard places in St. Paul's writings, and the other scriptures, were the unlearned and unstable, that is, (as I told you), those, who being not well grounded in the faith, were easy to be drawn aside into pernicious opinions and destructive errors: from whence it follows, that the best way to secure ourselves from thus perverting what is obscure in scripture is, first, to render ourselves learned and stable in what is plain; and fixing that as our centre, from whence we are not to be removed, we may extend our thoughts and opinions to what circumference we please. That faith which we keep pure and undefiled in fundamentals, shall either enable us to find out those truths of lesser moment, that perfectly agree with it, or shall excuse us before God, if we should miss of them. There will be a probability from hence of our understanding obscure texts rightly; or if we do not, yet there will be a certainty of our not incurring the guilt of wresting scripture to our own destruction.

Thus have I dispatched the second general observation, which I raised from the text, viz, to consider from thence what temper and qualifications of mind what precaution and degrees of knowledge are requisite, in order to make our inquiries into the obscure parts of holy writ innocent and useful to us.

I might observe also from hence, in the 3d place, that if perverting obscure passages of scripture be a thing in itself damnable, as St. Peter assures us it is, how much more certainly damnable is it to pervert plain ones? And then infer, 4thly, and lastly also, That if such a sentence be pronounced upon those who wrest scripture, then surely a much higher degree of punishment is reserved for those who affront and ridicule it. But because the first of these points has been already in some measure intimated in the preceding discourse, and there occasionally explained; and because the second is of too extensive and concerning a nature to be now considered, I shall therefore at present insist upon neither of them. They may perhaps employ our reflections on some other opportunity.

By BISHOP SHELTON

On the Prejudices formed, or Offence taken, against the Gospel of JESUS CHRIST.

MATTHEW, xi. 6.

Blessed is he whosoever shall not be offended in me.

In the beginning of this chapter we read, that the Baptist sent two of his disciples to Christ, to inquire of him whether he was indeed the great Prophet so long expected by the people, and foretold by the Prophets, or whether they were still to expect and wait the coming of another. Our Saviour detained the disciples of John, till he had made them eye-witnesses of the mighty power that was in him. They saw, at the command of his word, the blind receive sight, the lame walk, the lepers cleansed, the deaf restored to hearing, and the dead raised up to life again: they saw likewise that these mighty powers were exercised without giving the least suspicion of any worldly design; that no court was made to the great or wealthy, by singling them out either for patients or for disciples. The benefit of the miracles was chiefly the lot of the poor; and as they were better disposed to receive the gospel, so were they preferred before the rich and mighty to be the disciples of Christ. When the Baptist's disciples had seen and heard these things, our Saviour thought them sufficiently enabled to satisfy John in the inquiry upon which he had sent them: Go, says he, and shew John those things which ye do hear and see: the blind receive their sight, and the lame walk; the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear; the dead are raised up, and the poor have the gospel preached to them. Then follow immediately the words of the text: and blessed is he whosoever shall not be offended in me.

The close connection of the text with the last words of the fifth verse, shews us what sort of persons our Saviour had in his eye, when he spoke of the offence taken at him in the world: the poor, says he, have the gospel preached to them: and blessed is he whosoever shall not be offended in me. If he had said, the poor are ready to embrace the gospel, and happy are in this; yea happier far notwithstanding in their present uncomfortable condition, than the honourable and the learned, who are too great; and in their own opinion too wise to hearken to the instructions of the gospel.

The words thus explained lead us to inquire,

First, What are the offences which are generally taken at the gospel of Christ:

Secondly, From what source these offences come.

The poverty and meanness in which our Saviour appeared, was the earliest and may probably be the latest, objection to the gospel. He came from God to convert and to save the world, to declare the purposes and the commands of the Almighty, and to exact obedience from every creature; but he came with less attendance and shew than if he had been an ordinary messenger from the governor of a province. Hence it is, that we so often find him upbraided either with the meanness of his parentage, the obscurity of his country, or the present necessity of his circumstances: Is not this the Carpenter's son? says one; Can any good come out of Nazareth? says another; or any prophet of out Galilee? says a third. And when they saw him oppressed with sufferings, and weighed down with afflictions, they openly insulted his sorrow, and triumphed over his fond pretences to save the world: Thou, say they, that destroyest the temple, and buildest it in three days, save thyself: if thou be the Son of God, come down from the cross. And so blinded are men with the notions of worldly greatness, and so apt to conceive of the majesty of God according to their own ideas of power and dignity, that this prejudice has prevailed in every age. The Apostle to the Corinthians preached Christ crucified; but he was to the Jews a stumbling block, and to the Greeks foolishness: for the Jews required a sign, a visible temporal deliverance, and had no notion, much less any way, as they could apprehend of such a Saviour as Jesus. The Greeks sought after wisdom, and thought that, if God were indeed to redeem the world, he would act more suitably to his power and wisdom: whenever they made their Jupiter speak, his voice was thunder, and lightning was his appearance, and he delivered oracles not to be communicated to vulgar ears. So in the Old Testament, when God speaks, clouds and darkness are round about him, and his presence and his voice are terrible. But here every thing had a different turn: the appearance was in the likeness of a man; and in the form of a servant; and, as he came in like a servant, he went out like a slave; he was esteemed stricken, and his departure was taken for misery. His doctrine was framed rather to purify the heart, and to give wisdom to the simple, than to exercise the head, and furnish matter for the curious and learned; to be a general instruction and a common rule of life to all men, and not to satisfy the vanity of worldly wisdom in inquiries above its reach. With Him the precepts of virtue are the principles of wisdom and holiness, the greatest ornament of the mind of man.

But these things the wise and the great men of the world find hard to reconcile with the wisdom and majesty of God, according to their notions of wisdom and power. Why did not Christ, say they, appear in the power and majesty of his Father? Would not the embassy have been more worthy both of God and of Him? Would any prince, who had a mind to reclaim his rebellious subjects to obedience, not rather chuse to send a person of honour with a suitable retinue, whose appearance might command respect and credit, than an ambassador clothed in rags and poverty, fit only to create in the rebels a greater contempt both of himself and his prince? If it was the purpose of God, that the world through faith should be saved, would not the world more securely and readily have confided in one whose very appearance would have spoke his dignity, than in one who seemed to be even more miserable than themselves, and not able to rescue himself from the vilest and most contemptible death?

But let us now, in the second place, consider what foundation there is in reason for this great prejudice.

It is no wonder to hear men reason upon the notions and ideas which are familiar to them. Great power and great authority are connected with the ideas of great pomp and splendor; and, when we talk of the works of God, our minds naturally turn themselves to view the great and miraculous works of Providence: and this is the reason why men are slow to discern the hand of God in the ordinary course of nature, where things, being familiar to us, do not strike with wonder and admiration.

When Naaman the Syrian came to the prophet of Israel to be cured of his leprosy, Elisha sent a messenger unto him saying, Go and wash in Jordan seven times, and thy flesh shall come again unto thee, and thou shalt be clean. The haughty Syrian disdained the easy cure, and scorned the prophet: Is this your man of God, and this his mighty power to send me to a pitiful river of Israel? Behold, says he, I thought he will surely come out to me, and stand and call on the name of the Lord his God, and strike his hand over the place, and recover the leper. Are not Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus, better than all the waters of Israel? may I not wash in them and be clean? So he turned, and went away in a rage. But his servants, not a little wiser than their master, thus reason the case with him: My father, if the prophet had bid thee do some great thing, wouldst thou not have done it? how much rather then, when he saith unto thee, Wash and be clean? Upon this gentle rebuke his stomach came down; and he condescended to follow the prophet's direction; and his flesh came again, like the flesh of a young child, and he was clean. Not unlike to Naaman's folly is theirs, who take offence at the poverty and meanness of the Author of our redemption. His sentiments and theirs agree: he expected to have seen some surprising wonder wrought for his cure; and, when he was bid only to wash, he thought there could be nothing of God in so trifling a remedy. And is not this their sense, who think that so obscure, so mean a person as Jesus, could never be the messenger of God upon so great an errand as the salvation of the world? who thus expostulate, Why came he not in a majesty suitable to his employment; and then we would have believed him; but how can we expect to be raised to the glory of God by him who was himself so scorned and contempt of men?

If we search this prejudice to the bottom, we shall find that it arises from a false conception of the power and majesty of God, as if the success of his purposes depended upon the visible fitness of the instruments he made choice of. When men we know the case is so; they must use means which they can judge to be adapted to the end they aim at; if they intend to prosper in what they undertake: but with God, it is otherwise. To stop the current even of the smallest river, banks must be raised, and sluices cut; when the work is done by man: but in the hand of God the rod of Moses was more than sufficient to curb the rage of the sea, and force it to yield a passage to his people. The foolishness of God, says the Apostle, is wiser than men, and the weakness of God is stronger than men; teaching us that we should not presume to sit in judgment upon the methods of providence; since, how foolish or how weak soever they may seem to us, they will be found in his hand to be the wisest and the strongest. And this reasoning the Apostle applies to the case now before us: The cross of Christ was a stumbling-block to the Jews, and to the Greeks foolishness; but unto all them that are called, the power of God, and the wisdom of God; because the foolishness of God is wiser than men, and the weakness of God stronger than men. However the Jews, or however the Greeks conceived of the crucified Jesus, yet to every believer he is the mighty power of God to salvation, because God ordained him so to be; and this ordination gives full efficacy to the cross of Christ, however in itself contemptible, and to all human appearance unfit for the purpose. The waters of Jordan had no natural efficacy to cleanse a leper; in the rod of Moses there was no power to divide the sea; but, when ordained by God to these purposes, the sea fled back at the touch of Moses's rod, and the leprosy of Naaman was purged by the so much despised waters of Israel. If we would judge truly, the more simple and plain the methods of providence are, the more do they speak the power of the Almighty. When God said, Let there be light, and there was light, his uncontrollable power more evidently appeared, than if all the angels of heaven had been employed to produce it. When our Lord said, I will, be thou clean, and the person was cleansed, his divinity shone forth more brightly, than if he had commanded all the powers above visibly to assist him, or likewise, when God committed the redemption of the world to Jesus, a man of sorrow and affliction, and of no form or comeliness, and gave him the power of doing such works as never man did, in confirmation of his commission, he appeared as plainly in him, as if he had clothed him with visible majesty and power. If we consider him afflicted and tormented, and given up to a cruel death, it proves indeed that he was weak and mortal; but still God is strong, and not the less able to establish the word which he spoke by this weak, this mortal man.

As to this part of the offence then, so far as the majesty and power of God are concerned, it proceeds from very wrong notions in both cases, and supposes that the majesty of God wants the same little supports of outward pomp and grandeur as that of men does, and that his power depends upon the fitness of instrumental or material causes, as human power plainly does; whereas the majesty and power of God are never more clearly seen, than when he makes choice of the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty.

Let us then in the next place consider, with respect to men, whether the advantages on their side would have been greater, had Christ appeared in greater splendor, and with more visible power and authority.

How far the imaginations of some men may rove upon such inquiries as these, or what degrees of splendor and glory they would judge sufficient for their purpose, I cannot tell. This we are sure of, that the majesty of the Almighty is not to be approached by human eyes; that therefore, whenever it descends to treat with men, it must be veiled and obscured under such representations as men can bear. This is true, you'll say; but is there no medium between the immediate presence of God, and his appearing in the form of a servant, and dying, not as the children of men commonly die, but as the vilest and most profligate criminal? Many degrees there are, no doubt, of visible glory, in any of which Christ might have appeared, but in none with greater advantage to religion than that in which he came. Suppose he had come, as the Jews expected, in the form of a mighty prince, and in that situation had propagated his faith and doctrine; what would the unbelievers then have said? How often should we have been told before now, that our religion was the work of human policy, and that our Prince's doctrine and dominions were extended by the same sword? Was ever any religion the better thought of for having been preached at the head of an army? This is certain, that, to make religion a rational act of the mind, it cannot be conveyed to us in too easy and familiar a manner: the less awe we have of our teacher, the more freedom we shall exercise in weighing and examining his doctrines. And upon this account our Saviour's appearance was in the most proper form, as it gave to men the greatest scope and liberty of trying and searching into his doctrines and pretences: and therefore his meanness and poverty should least of all be objected by those who seem to contend for nothing more than to clear religion from fears and prejudices.

But perhaps they will say, we wanted him not to appear in worldly state and glory, or to exercise temporal dominion on earth; we would have been contented with a visible, though an inferior kind of manifestation of his divine authority. O fools and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have written! What think ye of giving sight to the blind; of opening the ears of the deaf; of loosening the tongue that was dumb; of restoring health to the sick; of raising the dead to life again; of raising even himself from the grave, and abolishing the scandal of the cross by a visible victory and triumph over death? What do you call these things? What do they manifest to you? Are these the works of that mean man, that wretched, that crucified mortal, of whom we have been speaking? Do slaves and servants, nay, do princes and the greatest of the children of men, use to perform such works? If not, these are the very manifestations of divine power and authority which you require. Nor can it, I believe, enter into the heart of man to contrive any greater signs to ask of any person pretending to a divine commission, than these which our Saviour daily and publicly gave the world of his authority. Had he appeared with all the visible power and glory which you can conceive, yet still you cannot imagine what greater works than these he could possibly perform: and therefore the evidence now, under all the meanness of his appearance, is the same for his divine authority and commission, as it would have been, had he come in the greatest pomp of glory and power.

As to us, I think, who are removed at a distance from the scene of this action, the evidence is much greater. Had he come in surprising glory, we might have suspected the relations of men, who, we might well think, saw and heard every thing under the greatest astonishment, and, like St. Paul when he was caught up to the third heaven, could hardly tell whether they were in the body, or out of the body. But now we have the evidence of men who lived and conversed with him familiarly, who saw all his mighty works, and saw them without surprise or astonishment, being reconciled to them by daily use, and the long-experienced gentleness and love of their Master; and therefore they very justly introduce their accounts with this assurance. That they relate that only which they had heard, which they had seen with their eyes, which they had looked upon, and which their hands had handled, of the word of life. So far are we then from having any just cause of offence in the poverty and meanness of our blessed Lord, that from those circumstances arises the great stability of our faith, and this comfortable assurance, that our faith standeth not in the words or in the works of man's wisdom and power, but in the power and in the wisdom of the Almighty, who knows how to produce strength out of weakness.

SERMON XII.

MATTHEW, xi. 6.

Blessed is he whosoever shall not be offended in me.

I HAVE already examined the first and great prejudice against the gospel, arising from the poverty and meanness of our blessed Lord, and the low condition of life in which he appeared in the world, and the wretched circumstances which put an end to it; and shewed it to be so far from being a just offence against the gospel, that, when fairly considered, it serves to recommend religion to us with all possible advantage, and the more eminently to set forth the love of Christ, and the wisdom and goodness of God, in the gospel.

It was from the offence taken at the mean condition of our Lord, that the cross became a stumbling-block to the Jews. It became also, as the Apostle says, foolishness to the Greeks: for they sought after wisdom, and not finding the wisdom they sought after in the gospel, it was esteemed by them as foolishness.

The great articles upon which all religion depends, are the nature of God, the immortality of the soul, and the certainty of future rewards and punishments in another life after this. These things have ever exercised the wit and learning of the considering part of mankind, and philosophy has furnished difficulties on every side; and, were they well cleared up, it is thought religion would want no other support. But in vain do you search the gospel of Christ for a solution of these difficulties: he has not so much as entered into them, or once attempted to give an account of the nature or essence of God, or of an human soul, or to consider the difficulties that are urged by the schools against its separate existence from the body. Future rewards and punishments he has indeed fully asserted; but, as to the nature and manner of them, and the soul's existence in each state, he has left them involved in the same intricacies in which he found them. And yet, say the disputers of this world, who would not expect from a person sent from God to have all his difficulties solved which affect the belief and practice of religion? We are bid to be good and holy, and are promised immortality: so far 'tis well. But did he not know what doubts exercise the most learned men concerning the nature of God, and of the soul, and its passage to another world, and concerning the place and condition of that other world? Why were not these doubts cleared? Had he opened to us this dark scene of nature, and made us to understand the contexture of the soul, and its manner of subsisting out of the body; had he taught us to comprehend the state and nature of the other world, such doctrines, such discoveries would have been sufficient evidence of the divine wisdom: but now we are only taught the plain doctrines of morality, and are bid to take his word for our immortality.

To clear up this great and unreasonable offence against the gospel, I desire you would consider with me the following particulars.

First, That the objection does not lie properly against the gospel of Christ; but if there be any sense in it, it must rise higher, and strike at the wisdom and goodness of God in the creation; for, if any fault is to be found in this matter, it is not with Christ for not teaching us more wisdom than we are capable of, but with God for not making us wiser than we are. And hence it will appear, that the objection is both impious and senseless.

Secondly, That this objection, allowing it its full force, does no way affect the belief or practice of religion; because religion depends entirely upon the certainty of the soul's immortality, and of a future state of rewards and punishments; which certainly no way depends upon the knowledge of the nature of the things themselves, since we are and may be certain of many things, the nature of which we neither do nor can know. And hence it will appear, that the difficulties arising from the consideration of the nature of these things cannot affect our belief of the certainty of them, if it be supported by proper evidence; and, consequently, that religion is no way concerned to remove these difficulties. And,

Thirdly, That the gospel has given us the greatest evidence for the certainty and reality of these things, that can be thought on or desired. And hence it will appear, that the doctrines of the gospel are such as are adapted to the service of religion, and as might be expected from a teacher divinely inspired.

And first, Let it be considered, that this objection does not lie against the gospel of Christ; but, if there be any force in it, it strikes immediately at the wisdom and goodness of God in the creation.

As long as men keep to the plain simple points in which religion is concerned, there is no danger of their splitting upon these insuperable difficulties. If they seek after God, the whole creation will lead them to him; for the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things which are made, even his eternal power and godhead. If they search after the immortality of the soul, and the certainty of a future state of rewards and punishments, these truths will be suggested to them from their own natural sense of good and evil, and the notions of God's wisdom, and justice, and goodness, compared with the present unequal distributions of rewards and punishments; which can be accounted for upon no other foot, nor reconciled to the natural sense God has implanted in us of the difference of good and evil, and the notions we have of his excellency and perfection. But, if they launch out into philosophical inquiries, and, not content to know that God is, without knowing what he is, endeavour to pry into the nature and manner of the existence of the Almighty; or if, not satisfied with the moral certainty of a future state, they want to look into the contexture of the soul, and to see there the natural seeds of immortality; 'tis no wonder if they make shipwreck both of their reason and their faith at once: for this knowledge is too high for men. God has not given us faculties to enable us to comprehend these mysteries of nature; and therefore we must always of necessity wander out of the way, and be bewildered, when we search after them. For let any man consider whence it is that the difficulty of these inquiries ariseth: 'tis not for want of teaching, for all the teaching in the world will not enable men to comprehend the things of which they can form no notions or ideas. And this is the case: the seeds of this knowledge are not implanted in our nature, and therefore no cultivation can ever produce it. There is nothing which ever fell under the notice of our senses, to which the existence and being of God can be likened, nothing that bears any proportion of similitude to the natural frame and make of our souls: and therefore 'tis impossible to represent these things to the mind of man; for 'tis not in the power of any sound of words to create new notions or ideas in our mind, or to convey new knowledge without them. God has set bounds to our knowledge by limiting our faculties, beyond which our utmost endeavours, however directed, cannot advance. A teacher, no more or excellency of knowledge than our teacher, is impossible to afford us more into us than we are capable of receiving; as a vessel can receive more than its measure; the sea is called out of the sea.

This being the state and condition of men, it had been to little purpose if our blessed Lord had attempted to pry them into the knowledge of those great secrets of nature, which the curious and learned are so desirous of prying into. His business was to instruct them in the way of virtue and holiness, to awaken their sleepy souls and rouse their stupid consciences to a sense of goodness, to shew them the way to peace and happiness, by setting before them the precepts of God and nature in their true uncorrupted purity: and this he has done, even by the confession of his greatest enemies, who in this part have nothing to object, but that his laws are too good and too holy for their observance. 'Tis the great excellency of a teacher to speak to the sense and understanding of the people; and, whenever he rises above them, he is lost in the clouds, and his words are mere air and sound: and therefore, whatever wisdom and knowledge were in our blessed Saviour. 'tis folly to expect from him any greater degrees of either, than we are capable of comprehending. As he was our prophet and teacher, it was his business to be understood; and he forbore teaching us the deep mysteries of nature, for the same reason that we do not teach children Algebra, not that we envy them the knowledge, but that we know they are incapable of it. Instead of improving the nature of man, he must have destroyed it, and new-created him, to have made him capable of a clear insight into all the mysteries which the curious seem desirous of knowing. And, could he have given us all the knowledge we thirst after, yet still the way to happiness would be the same, and we could do nothing to set forward our salvation, which he has not already both instructed and enabled us to do: and therefore, as the case stands, he has fully performed the voice of a man, and the voice of a man can be united to it again? It would be altogether as reasonable for a merchant not to trade to the Indies, though he is sure there is great wealth and riches there, till he can account to himself for the nature of all the surprising objects in that other world; or for a man not to eat, though he is sure it would nourish and support his life, till he can see the reason of nutrition, and give an account of all the secret ways by which nature performs the work.

God has given us knowledge sufficient to be the foundation of our duty; and, if we will use the light we have, we shall be happy. The great mistake which men commit in reflecting upon these matters, is, That they suppose they should have better evidence for the things of another world, could they overcome these difficulties, which cross them perpetually in the search after nature: And this would indeed be a real advantage to religion, if it were so; but that it is not, will appear in the following considerations: For,

Secondly, The difficulties which arise in considering the natural properties of things, do no way affect the certainty and reality of their existence: If they did, we could be certain of the real existence of no one thing; since there is nothing but what affords us very great difficulties, when we come to account for the nature and properties of it. Let what will be the subject, I think, there cannot be two more different inquiries, than when we examine whether the thing really is, and when we examine what it is: They are inquiries which do not at all depend one upon the other. We can examine the properties of some things, without so much as reflecting whether there ever were such things, or no. When the mathematician considers the properties of an exact circle or square, it matters him not whether there be such perfect figures in the world, or no; nor does he trouble himself to inquire. So, on the other hand, we can examine and come to the certainty of the existence of things, without knowing, or attempting to know, their natures and properties. The peasant knows there act distinctly from the body, or how it can be united to it again? It would be altogether as reasonable for a merchant not to trade to the Indies, though he is sure there is great wealth and riches there, till he can account to himself for the nature of all the surprising objects in that other world; or for a man not to eat, though he is sure it would nourish and support his life, till he can see the reason of nutrition, and give an account of all the secret ways by which nature performs the work.

God has given us knowledge sufficient to be the foundation of our duty; and, if we will use the light we have, we shall be happy. The great mistake which men commit in reflecting upon these matters, is, That they suppose they should have better evidence for the things of another world, could they overcome these difficulties, which cross them perpetually in the search after nature: And this would indeed be a real advantage to religion, if it were so; but that it is not, will appear in the following considerations: For,

Had God indeed given us only the faculties of men, and required of us the service of angels, we might then with some justice have lamented the unequal weight: but now that he requires nothing of us but what we are able to perform, and what, according to our present degree of understanding, it is highly reasonable we should perform, it is great perverseness to hang back for want of more light, and a greater capacity to understand what it is no way necessary for us to understand. Our present faculties, if rightly applied, will lead us to a certainty of the being of a God, to the knowledge of his excellency and perfection, and will instruct us wherein our reasonable service to him does consist: and shall we, when we know there is an all-sufficient being, and that it is our duty to serve him, shall we, I say, suspend our duty, because we meet with great difficulties in trying to comprehend his nature and manner of existence? As weak as we are, we may assuredly know, that God will one day judge the world in righteousness, and reward every man according to his works: and shall we not listen to this great motive to obedience, because we are not able to know how the soul can

Secondly, The difficulties which arise in considering the natural properties of things, do no way affect the certainty and reality of their existence: If they did, we could be certain of the real existence of no one thing; since there is nothing but what affords us very great difficulties, when we come to account for the nature and properties of it. Let what will be the subject, I think, there cannot be two more different inquiries, than when we examine whether the thing really is, and when we examine what it is: They are inquiries which do not at all depend one upon the other. We can examine the properties of some things, without so much as reflecting whether there ever were such things, or no. When the mathematician considers the properties of an exact circle or square, it matters him not whether there be such perfect figures in the world, or no; nor does he trouble himself to inquire. So, on the other hand, we can examine and come to the certainty of the existence of things, without knowing, or attempting to know, their natures and properties. The peasant knows there is a Sun and a Moon, as well as the astronomers; and his certainty, as to their existence, is as great and as well-grounded as theirs. Nor is this only true in things which are objects of sense, but will hold likewise with respect to such things, the existence of which we collect from reason. From visible effects to invisible causes the argument is conclusive; though in many cases it extends only to the reality of the cause, and does not in the least lead us to the knowledge of the nature of it. When we see distempers cured by the use of plants or of drugs, some virtue we are sure there is in them, upon which the effect depends, though what we seldom or never can tell. This being the case then, That we can arrive at the knowledge of the existence of things, when we are perfectly ignorant of their natures and properties; and can, on the other side, examine and know the properties of things, without considering whether they exist, or no; 'tis plain that these are distinct acts of knowledge, which do not depend on each other, and that we may be certain as to the reality of things, however we may be puzzled and confounded when we enter into the consideration of their nature.

And now pray consider, as to the case before us, what sort of knowledge it is that is necessary to support religion in the world. If we are sure there is a God who will judge the world, is not that a sufficient foundation for holiness? Does it signify any thing, as to the necessity of our obedience, to inquire into the manner or nature of his being? Does not the whole religion evidently depend on this question, Whether there certainly be a God who will judge the world? And, if it appears there is, is it of any consequence to say, there are great difficulties in conceiving how these things can be? For, if they certainly will be, there will be some way or other, no doubt; and it concerns not us to know which way. Since therefore our Saviour has given the greatest evidence that can be of the certainty of a future state, and the soul's existence after death, 'tis impertinent and unphilosophical to confront this evidence with difficulties which are raised against it. It is in the nature of knowledge to be free from all ground of doubt; and an argument which is not ashamed of, than to be in competition with the clearness of the certainty and reality of themselves. Were this duty, it would set the great controversy upon the right foot, which now stands on this single point. Whether there be sufficient evidence of a future state or no? For, if such a state there be, let our conceptions concerning it be what or not clear, most certainly we shall be brought to account for all we do; which is enough, I think, to make us careful what we do. And this is the main concern of religion, and that which will secure whatever is necessary to it.

Since then religion evidently depends upon the certainty and reality of a future state of rewards and punishments, and other the like articles, and not in the least upon the knowledge of the nature or the philosophical account of these things; it had been absurd in our Saviour, who was a preacher of religion only, a teacher sent from God, to have entered into those difficulties, which did not at all belong to his province. And, since neither the practice of religion would have received any advantage by the discussion of these doubts, for if we had the knowledge of angels, and saw the heavens as plainly as they do, yet the same virtue and holiness, without any change, would be necessary to carry us thither; nor the motives of religion would have gained any new strength, since the evidence for the reality of a future state is not affected by these doubts; it is ridiculous to expect the solution of them in the gospel, when, if solved, they would not serve any one point in which the gospel is concerned, but would end in mere philosophy and speculation.

But perhaps it may be said, that all this is true indeed, where the existence of things is out of doubt: in that case no difficulties can destroy the evidence of their existence. But, where the existence of things is doubtful, there the

...in the third place, the gospel has given us the evidence of our own immortality, which cannot be thought of as a mere promise. There are two things which our resurrection to life demonstrates: we learn from our Saviour's answer to the Sadducees: ye do err, says he, not knowing the scriptures, nor the power of God: which answer is a very clear one; for we can desire no more than to know that God certainly can raise us, and that he certainly will. The first is to be learnt from our natural notions of God; the second from the scripture, which is the declaration of his will to mankind. As to the power of God, it cannot be brought into question, without throwing off all pretence even to natural religion: for if you allow God, that he made the world, and formed man into a living soul in the beginning; you cannot deny but that He, who made man out of nothing at first, can as easily make him again, after death has dissolved the vital union. It remains then to inquire after the will of God, Whether He, who certainly can, certainly will raise us at the last day? The time will not permit me to enter largely into the argument; and therefore I shall rest it upon one, but that a very clear point. It will not be denied but that we have our Saviour's promise and word for our resurrection often repeated in the gospel: and consider, pray, did not he raise many dead to life again? Did he not at last raise himself from the grave, after he had been three days buried? Is it not plain then, upon the gospel account, that he had the power of raising the dead? and is it not as plain that he has promised to raise us? Take both propositions together then, and they will amount to this; that He, who has the power of raising the dead, has promised and declared that he will raise us from the dead. God, we know, cannot lie, and therefore must ratify every word which he spoke by his holy child Jesus: And hence arises a security which no doubts can shake.

...as to difficulties in nature and philosophy, he has not indeed taught us to answer them; but he fully answered them himself, when he came from the grave; as he who got up and walked, baffled all the philosophers' arguments against motion.

'Tis true, you will say, this is very good evidence, but you find it hard to believe: And perhaps you might have been as hard of belief, if our Saviour had reasoned never so philosophically. The question is, Whether any objection lies against the gospel for overlooking the difficulties which learned men raise? I have shewed that none can lie, and that the gospel has given a much better evidence than that which is desired: And this is sufficient to remove the offence taken upon the account of this supposed defect in the gospel. If you believe not the gospel, that alters not the case: The evidence is not the worse for that; for neither would you believe perhaps, though one rose from the dead.

Blessed is he whosoever shall not be offended in me.

THE prejudices which men are apt to conceive against the gospel, are of different kinds, according to the different views under which they consider it. When they set themselves to examine the pretensions it has to be a divine revelation, they stumble at the meanness and poverty of its Author; imagining that, if God were to send a person into the world upon so considerable an errand, he would clothe him with a majesty becoming one immediately commissioned by himself, and which might better support the great undertaking: Or if they consider the gospel as the word of God, given to men for their instruction in all things pertaining to the service of God, they expect to find all their doubts and difficulties removed, which are any way related to the cause of religion; such, for instance, as relate to the nature of the soul, its manner of subsisting out of the body, and to the nature and condition of the future state which we are bid to expect: And, not finding these difficulties considered and removed, they are apt to conclude that this revelation has not all the marks of wisdom which are to be expected in one coming immediately from God.

These offences have been already considered: But, as some are offended at the gospel for not clearing the doubts and difficulties which encumbered the notions of religion before, so others take offence at the new doctrines introduced into religion by the gospel, and complain of the hardship put upon them in requiring them to believe things which are not suggested to them by natural reason, nor are to be maintained by it. Even of our Saviour's disciples we find many offended at his doctrine, and complaining to each other, This is an hard saying; who can hear it? And so far did their prejudice prevail, that they went back, and walked no more with him.

The gospel, it is said, contains many mysterious truths: And what purpose of religion can be served by our receiving articles of faith which we do not understand? Shall we be the better men for it? Will it make us more just, or holy, or beneficent to our brethren? Will it promote the honour of God to represent him as requiring such conditions from us, the end or use of which we cannot discern? Or, will it recommend religion to the world? Will men be the more forward to submit, when they must first renounce their sense and understanding, and cease to be rational, in order to be religious?

This is a very heavy charge, and, were it as true as it is heavy, might possibly shake the foundations of the gospel. But to set this matter in a clear light, I must desire you to observe the different notions which belong to the word Mystery in the use of the gospel, and in vulgar use among men at this time: And, by thus distinguishing the use or sense of the word, it will appear,

First, That the objection does not reach the gospel sense or use of the word, nor can affect the mysteries contained in the gospel: And,

Secondly, That the use and sense of the word, which is liable to this objection, does not any way belong to the gospel; nor are there any mysterious notions in the gospel as many justly and honestly made out them.

First then, If you look into the sacred Writers, you will find, That the design of the gospel, the dispensation of Providence in the salvation of mankind, is styled a mystery; the hidden wisdom of God, which was kept secret since the world began: A mystery 'tis called, because it was kept secret since the world began, God not having opened or declared his gracious purposes before the coming of Christ. With respect to this time of secrecy and silence, the gospel is called a mystery; but, upon the revelation of it by Christ Jesus, it is no longer looked upon as a mystery, but as the manifestation of God's will and goodness to men. Thus you will find St. Paul speaking in the last of the Romans: The mystery which was kept secret since the world began, but now is made manifest, and by the scriptures of the Prophets, according to the commandment of the everlasting God, made known to all nations for the obedience of faith: That is, this great work was a mystery in all ages, being kept secret in the counsels of God; but, since the coming of Christ, 'tis no longer a mystery, but is manifest and made known to all nations and people. Here then, you see plainly, the opposition is between mystery and revelation: What God has reserved to himself, without communicating the knowledge of it to the world, that is a mystery; what he has revealed, is no longer a mystery, but a manifestation of his will and purpose. In this sense, I presume, there lies no objection against the gospel: That it was once hidden in the secret counsels of Providence, but is now, by the revelation of Christ Jesus, made known to all men, can afford us no matter of complaint, but may administer to us great joy, and be a subject of praise and glory to God, inasmuch as our eyes have seen, and our ears heard, those things, which many righteous men and prophets have desired to see, and have not seen them, and to hear, and have not heard them.

As the gospel itself is in this sense styled a mystery, so are the several parts of it likewise: I shew you a mystery, says St. Paul; we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed. He did not mean that he would shew them what they could not comprehend, but that he would declare to them the purpose of God, which they were ignorant of. The same use of the word you may meet with in our blessed Saviour himself: When he had described the future state of the church in parables to the Jews, and came afterwards to explain them to the disciples, he tells them the reason of his proceeding: Because, says he, unto you it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, but unto them it is not given. All futurities, because known only to God, are mysteries; but, when revealed, they are no longer so, being made known and manifest. Thus, 'tis plain, St. Paul uses the word in 1 Cor. xiii. where he joins the gift of prophecy and the knowledge of mysteries together: Though I have, says he, the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries and all knowledge: Where 'tis plain what he means by mysteries, since they are to be understood by the gift of prophecy. In the fourth chapter of the same epistle, he shews what account we are to make of our pastors and teachers: Let a man, says he, so account of us, as of the ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God. His meaning is not, that they were preachers of mysteries in the vulgar notion of it, that is, of things which nobody can understand; but that God had entrusted them with his purposes and intentions in the salvation of mankind, which they, like good stewards, were to dispense to the whole family, by declaring and revealing the whole will of God.

The same Apostle says, Chap. ii. 7. We speak the wisdom of God in a mystery; and in the next words explains what he means by mystery, even the hidden wisdom which God ordained before the world to our glory: and in the tenth verse he tells us, this is no longer hidden, but the mystery is laid open; God having revealed it unto us by his Spirit. In the same sense we read of the mystery of faith; where we are not to understand the Apostle to mean incomprehensible articles of faith, but the revelations of God's purposes and designs, which through faith we receive, and are therefore styled the mysteries of faith.

In this sense the gospel is full of mysteries, as containing the secret purposes of God's hidden wisdom in the redemption of the world, which were made manifest by Christ Jesus, who brought life and immortality to light. Against this gospel sense of mystery the common objections have no force; since mysteries here are not understood to be such things as reason cannot receive, but such things as proceed from the hidden wisdom of God, and are made manifest in the gospel of Christ.

Let us then, in the second place, proceed to shew, that the notion of mysteries, against which the objection lies, does not belong to the gospel. The objection represents a mystery as a thing inconceivable, and altogether irreconcilable to human reason. But such mysteries there are none in the gospel of Christ. If men, learned or unlearned, have run themselves into contradictions by endeavouring to explain the mysteries of God farther than he has explained them, he that to themselves: let not the gospel be charged with their errors and mistakes. Nothing indeed has proved more fatal to religion, than the vain attempts of men to dive into the unrevealed mysteries of God, and to account for, upon principles of human reason, the things which proceed from the hidden wisdom of God. All the secret purposes of Providence are, in the sense of the scripture, mysteries; as likewise all knowledge which God has not revealed. Of such mysteries are there many: but then they concern not us to inquire after; if they did, God would reveal them to us. God has declared to us, that he has an only-begotten Son, and that he was the person who came down from heaven for our deliverance: that he has an Holy Spirit, who shall sanctify our hearts, and be assisting to us in working out our salvation. This, and agreeable to this, is the scripture doctrine: and a man would be put to it to fix any absurdity, or so much as seeming contradiction, upon this doctrine, or any thing said concerning it in scripture. Concerning these persons there are indeed exceeding great mysteries, which are not revealed: God has not told us, or enabled us to conceive, how his son and his Spirit dwell in him, or how they came from him. These therefore are properly mysteries, which are hidden in the secret wisdom of God, and which we are nowhere called upon to inquire after. It is easy, I think, to take God's word, that he has a Son and a Spirit, who dwell with him and in him from all eternity; a Son who came to our assistance, a Spirit who is ever with us to guide us into truth: these things, I say, are easy to be believed, without entering into the difficulties arising from natural and philosophical inquiries, which the Scripture nowhere encourages us to seek after: and, as long as men keep close to the rule and doctrine of scripture, they will find no cause to enter into the great complaints raised against mysteries. The scripture has revealed indeed wonderful things to us, and for the truth of them has given us as wonderful evidence; so that they are well qualified to be the objects of our faith: for such God designed them, and not for the exercise of our vanity and curiosity, or, as you call it, of our reason. If it is not reasonable to believe God upon the Gospel evidence, there is an end of all mysteries; but, if it is reasonable, there must be an end of all farther inquiries: and I think common sense will teach us not to call God to account, or pretend to enter into the reason of his doings.

SERMON XIV.

By the Rt. R. THOMAS SHERLOCK, D.D.

Lord Bishop of London.

Salvation by Jesus Christ.

HEBREWS, vii. 25.

Wherefore he is able also to save them to the uttermost, that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them.

WHEN we consider the great and wonderful work of our redemption, though we cannot account for every step of it to our own reason and understanding, yet neither can we imagine it to be the effect of mere will and arbitrary appointment, and void of all foundation in the reason and propriety of things. All the works of God are works of wisdom: and, as far as our capacities give us leave to judge, we discern evident marks of wisdom in them all, and discover a fitness and propriety in every thing with respect to the end which it is intended to serve or promote. If this be so in every instance in which we are able to make any judgment, it is a great presumption that it is, and must be so, in all other instances, which are too high and great to be viewed and measured by human understanding: and we have one positive argument that it is so, arising from the natural notion we have of God, and of his attributes of wisdom and justice. It is impossible to suppose such a Being to do any thing by chance, or in compliance to mere will and humour. No: every act of God is the act of infinite wisdom, and is founded in the necessary reason and propriety of things: and it is as true of the works of grace, as it is of the works of nature, that in wisdom he has ordained them all.

It is one thing not to be able to discern the reasons of Providence, and another to suppose there is no reason in them. The reasons, that made it either necessary or proper for Christ to die for the sins of mankind, may be removed out of our sight: but to suppose that Christ really did die for the sins of the world, and yet that there was no reason or propriety in his so doing, is to found revealed religion upon a principle destructive of natural religion; for no religion can subsist, with an opinion that God is a Being capable of acting without reason.

The publication of the Gospel has made an alteration in the scheme of religion, by revealing to us the Son of God, whom God hath appointed heir of all things, by whom also he made the worlds; who is the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person; who upholds all things by the word of his power. Heb. 1, 2, 3.

The knowledge of the Son of God, of his power and dominion in the creating and upholding all things, became necessary, as the foundation of the faith required to be placed in him as our Redeemer. The character of Redeemer would be but ill supported by any person who had not power equal to the great undertaking. The New Testament doctrines, therefore, relating to the dignity and authority of Jesus Christ, are relative to his office of Redeemer; and therefore there was no explicit declaration of them either before or under the law of Moses.

Natural religion leads us by certain conclusions to the acknowledgement of one supreme intelligent Being, the Author and Creator of all things, and can by no reasoning whatever discover any other being concerned in the making, framing, or governing the world; and therefore all the hopes and fears; in a word, all the religious acts of man, in the state of natural religion, are necessarily and immediately relative to this one Supreme Being. But put the case, that natural religion could possibly discover that this one Supreme Being had an eternal Son, to whom he had communicated all power and authority, who was the immediate Creator, Governor, and Judge of mankind; I beseech you to consider, whether, upon this supposition, there would not necessarily arise an alteration in natural religion; whether the hopes and fears, and all other religious acts of mankind, would not relate immediately to this their immediate Creator, Governor, and Judge. Can it be reasonably supposed, that we were created by the Son of God, that we are now under his government, and shall be finally under his judgment; and at the same time maintain, that no service, obedience, or regard is due to him from us his creatures and subjects? If this cannot be maintained consistently with this supposition, the conclusion will be, that the religion of a Christian is a natural and reasonable service, arising from the relation between Christ and mankind, which the Gospel has revealed and made known to the world.

When we consider what expectations we have from our Redeemer, and what great promises he has made to us in his Gospel, we cannot possibly avoid inquiring who this person is: when we hear his promise to be always present with us to the end of the world, to support us under all our difficulties, it is but a reasonable demand to ask by what authority he does these things; and when we are told that he liveth for ever, and is the Lord of life and glory, there is no room to doubt of his being able to save us. St. Paul tells us, that the Lord Jesus Christ shall change our vile bodies, that they may be fashioned like unto his glorious body: a great expectation this! But consider what the reasonable foundation of this expectation is: St. Paul tells us, it is the energy of power with which Christ is endued, whereby he is able even to subdue all things to himself. Our Saviour puts this article upon the same foot. Hear his declaration: Verily, verily, I say unto you, the hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God; and they that hear shall live. In the next verse the reason follows: For, as the Father hath life in himself, so hath he given to the Son to have life in himself. John v. 25, 26. If the Son hath life in himself, even as the Father hath life in himself; if he is really endued with power to which all nature submits and obeys, a power sufficient for the creation of the world at first, and for the preservation ever since; we have reason to conclude, that he is now as able to restore life, as he was at first to give it; to call men from the grave into being, as well as to call them out of nothing at the first creation.

The relation of Christ to mankind as Creator and Governor considered, the work of redemption could not properly have been undertaken by any other hand; for, if Christ was the immediate Creator and Governor of the world, what reason can you imagine why God should resume this authority out of the hands of his Son, or set up another to have dominion and authority over any part of the creation, which by natural right belonged to him, who made all things? Were we to consider one person as our Creator, and another as our Redeemer, it would be extremely to the diminution of the honour and regard due to the Creator, inasmuch as the blessing of redemption would greatly outweigh the benefit of creation; and it would be natural to us to prefer the love that delivered us from the evils and miseries of the world, to that which placed us in them. In the daily service of our church we praise God for creating and preserving us, but above all for his inestimable love in the redemption; which is very consistent with respect to one great benefactor, who both made us and redeemed us: but, had any other hand redeemed us, such expression of gratitude to him would have reflected dishonour upon the Creator.

St. Paul tells us expressly, that Christ is head of the church; a title founded in the right of redemption, that in all things he might have the pre-eminence; that, as he was the head of all creatures in virtue of having created them, so he might be the head of the church, the elect people of God, in virtue of having redeemed them: for it pleased the Father, that in him should all fulness dwell; that is, that Christ should be all in all, the head of the second as well as of the first creation. Coloss. i. 19. According to St. Paul's reasoning here, if any other person had redeemed the world, or if the world had been redeemed without Christ, he would not have had the pre-eminence in all things; which yet he had before sin came into the world: and, consequently, the sin of the world would have been the diminution of the headship and power of Christ. Upon these principles of the Gospel revelation we may discern some propriety in Christ's coming to redeem the world; the work was such, that no person of less power could undertake it; and his relation to the world was such, as made it fit and proper to commit the work to him.

The redemption of mankind is a work which in the event seems to concern men only: but, considered as a vindication of the justice and goodness of God towards his creatures, it is a work exposed to the consideration of every intelligent being in the universe. Whether they may be supposed to inquire into God's dealings with the children of men, we may judge by ourselves. It is little we know of the fall of angels; yet how has that employed human curiosity! for every man considers himself as having an interest in the justice and equity of that Supreme Being, under whose government he lives, and by whose judgment he must finally stand or fall. If we doubt whether the superior order of beings have the like inclination, St. Peter will tell us, that the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should fol- low, are things the angels desire to look into. 1 Pet. i. 11, 12. And indeed the method of God's dealing with any rational creature is a common concern to all; and it is for the honour of God's government to be vindicated in the sight of every intelligent being, that he may be justified in his saying, and overcome when he is judged.

If this be so, it must necessarily follow, that the redemption by Christ, though it relates immediately to men, must be agreeable to all the reason and relation of things, known or discoverable by the highest intellectual beings; and need I add, that there are many such not discoverable by us?

It is certain that we are but a small part of the intellectual world: what relation we bear to the other parts, or to the whole, we know not; and yet undoubtedly the common Governor of the whole must in his dealings with every part have regard to this common relation, whether we understand it or no. The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews tells us, that Christ took not on him the nature of angels, but he took on him the seed of Abraham. Angels sinned, and men sinned; men only are redeemed. If God is just, there must be a reason for this, though not within our reach at present; and, when we come to know it, perhaps we may be no longer at a loss to know that the sacrifice of Christ was necessary to the salvation of men.

That there are many orders of beings superior to man, is a proposition so agreeable to reason, that there is little room to doubt of it. All these orders are in Scripture comprehended under the general name of angel. What relation these beings stand in to us in many respects, I will not now inquire: but that they are not unconcerned spectators in the work of our redemption, is evident. Our Saviour tells us, there is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth (Luke, xv. 10.): again, he that overcometh, the same shall be clothed in white raiment; and I will not blot out his name out of the book of life; but I will confess his name before my father, and before his angels. Rev. iii. 5. Here the angels are mentioned as witnesses of the justice of the judgment, and not merely as attendants to make up the pomp and ceremony of judicature.

Since then the justice and equity of God in redeeming men are things which the angels desire and are concerned to look into: it is evident, that his justice and equity, and the reasons of providence in this great affair, may be discernible to the highest order of intellectual beings, though not discoverable by us, the lowest.

That this is probably the case, may be learnt from hence; that, where the Gospel has revealed to us any of these relations, not discoverable by human reason, so far we can see the reason and propriety of this great work of our redemption.

But let us consider how well these principles and doctrines of the Gospel agree together, and how naturally the one flows from the other. When we view the sad condition of mankind, the sin, folly, and misery, which are in the world; and then turn to contemplate the perfections, the wisdom, and the goodness of him who made us; nature raises some hopes in us that this confusion will some day find a remedy, and ourselves a release, from the goodness and wisdom of him who formed us. I blame not these hopes; they are just, they are natural. But, if nature had the knowledge of the Son of God, and could discover that the world was made and is upheld by his power, that we are his immediate creatures and subjects; would it not be altogether as natural to found some hopes upon this relation? Should we not be willing to believe, that this great person who made us, would have some compassion upon the work of his own hands? Should we not hope to find in him at least an intercessor on our behalf, an advocate with the father? Should we not be inclined to recommend to him all our pleas, to put all our interest into his hands, trusting that he could not want bowels of affection towards the creatures whom he formed after his own image and likeness? I think this would be but natural; and what more does the Gospel require of us? It has discovered to us this relation between Christ and the world, between Christ and the church, and requires from us such hope and faith, and such obedience as naturally flow from this relation: and could it possibly require less? Would it not be absurd to tell us, that Christ is Lord of the world that is, and of that which is to come, and not to require us to have hope and confidence in him? Would it not be absurd to tell us, that he is the Lord of life and glory, and to bid us expect life and glory through any other hands than his? Would it not be absurd to tell us, that all judgment is committed to the Son, and yet no obedience due to him? or that God has appointed him to be head over all, and yet no honour to be paid him?

From these and the like considerations we may discern, how reasonable, how natural the religion of the Gospel is. It has indeed opened to us a new scene of things, discovering to us the ever-blessed Son of God, the Creator and Governor of the world: what else it proposes to us results naturally from this relation between Christ and the world. The mysterious work of our redemption itself seems to have arisen from the original relation between the only Son of God, and man the creature of God; and our Christian faith, in every article and branch of it, has a just foundation and support, in the power, authority, and pre-eminence of the Son of God. We well may believe he has redeemed us, since we know he made us. And, though all nature seems to frown on us, and to threaten death and destruction, from which no human power or cunning can deliver us; yet our hope is steadfast and unmoveable, being placed in him who is able to subdue all things to himself.

This belief, that the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God, and arise to life, is the fundamental article of a Christian's faith: if this be not well established, our hope and confidence are vain, and the preaching the cross of Christ is foolishness.

Let us reflect a little how our case stands with respect to the prospect beyond the grave: let us consider what hopes nature furnishes, and how they are supported, confirmed, and enlarged, by the Gospel of Christ Jesus.

When we view the world in its present circumstances, and see the misery and oppression that are in it; when we consider that the distresses and sorrows arising from the weakness and the wickedness of men are in number and in weight ten times more than all the sufferings to which we are exposed by the mere frailty of our condition ; we can hardly imagine that a wise and just God made the world to be what we find it is. When we look further, and find that the best men oftentimes fare worst ; that even the desire and endeavour to please God frequently exposes them to infinite sorrows in this world ; we stand amazed, and are ready to doubt whether these appearances can be reconciled with the belief that God governs the world. But, since all nature proclaims the being and power of God, and the visible things of the creation declare in every language of the world the wisdom and goodness of him who made them ; under the force and conviction of this evidence that there is a God, we can find no possible way to account for his justice and goodness towards the children of men, but by supposing that he has appointed a day in which he will judge the world in righteousness : and since this world is not evidently the scene of this judgment, we conclude there must be another, in which we shall stand before his tribunal. Thus far nature goes : all beyond this is vain philosophy and imagination, founded in conceits which are in vogue to-day and forgot to-morrow. Scholars may reason of the nature of the soul, and the condition of it when separated from the body ; but the common hopes of nature receive no support from such inquiries. But yet something farther seems necessary to give ease to nature in this painful search after life and happiness. The numberless instances of mortality which we hear and see, the remains of those who left the world ages before we came into it, and are still mouldering in their tombs, is undeniable evidence that death destroys this compound being which we call man. How to revive this union nature knows not ; and as for those who make the spirits of men in the divided state to be perfect men, they seem to have got a conclusion without consulting the premises.

Look now into the Gospel ; there you will find every reasonable hope of nature, nay, every reasonable suspicion of nature cleared up and confirmed, every difficulty answered and removed. Do the present circumstances of the world lead you to suspect that God could never be author of such corrupt and wretched creatures as men now are ; Your suspicions are just and well founded : God made man upright, but through the temptation of the devil sin entered, and death and destruction followed after.

Do you suspect, from the success of virtue and vice in this world, that the providence of God does not interpose to protect the righteous from violence, or to punish the wicked ? The suspicion is not without ground. God leaves his best servants here to be tried oftentimes with affliction and sorrow, and permits the wicked to flourish and abound. The call of the Gospel is not to honour and riches here, but to take up our cross and follow Christ.

Do you judge, from comparing the present state of the world with the natural notion you have of God, and of his justice and goodness, that there must needs be another state in which justice shall take place ? You reason right : and the Gospel confirms the judgment. God has appointed a day to judge the world in righteousness : then those who mourn shall rejoice, those who weep shall laugh, and the persecuted and afflicted servants of God shall be heirs of his kingdom.

Have you sometimes misgivings of mind ? Are you tempted to mistrust this judgment, when you see the difficulties which surround it on every side ; some which affect the soul in its separate state, some which affect the body in its state of corruption and dissolution ? Look to the Gospel, there these difficulties are accounted for : and you need no longer puzzle yourself with dark questions concerning the state, condition, and nature of separate spirits, or concerning the body, however to appearance lost and destroyed ; for the body and soul shall once more meet to part no more, but to be happy for ever. In this case the learned cannot doubt, and the ignorant may be sure, that it is the man, the very man himself, who shall rise again : for an union of the same soul and body is as certainly the restoration of the man, as the dividing them was the destruction.

Would you know who it is that gives this assurance? It is one who is able to make good his word; one who loved you so well as to die for you; yet one too great to be held a prisoner in the grave: no, he rose with triumph and glory, the first-born from the dead, and will in like manner call from the dust of the earth, all those who put their trust and confidence in him.

But who is this, you will say, who was subject to death, and yet had power over death? How could so much weakness and so much strength meet together? That God has the power of life, we know; but then he cannot die: that man is mortal, we know; but then he cannot give life.

Consider; does this difficulty deserve an answer, or does it not? Our Blessed Saviour lived among us in a low and poor condition, exposed to much ill-treatment from his jealous countrymen: when he fell into their power, their rage knew no bounds: they reviled him, insulted him, mocked him, scourged him, and at last nailed him to a cross, where by a shameful and wretched death he finished a life of sorrow and affliction.

Did we know no more of him than this, upon what ground could we pretend to hope that he will be able to save us from the power of death? We might say with the disciples, We trusted this had been he who should have saved Israel; but he is dead, he is gone, and all our hopes are buried in his grave.

If you think this ought to be answered, and that the faith of a Christian cannot be a reasonable faith, unless it be enabled to account for this seeming contradiction, I beseech you then never more complain of the Gospel for furnishing an answer to this great objection, for removing this stumbling-block out of the way of our faith. He was a man, and therefore he died: he was the Son of God, and therefore he rose from the dead, and will give life to all his true disciples. He it was who formed this world and all things in it, and for the sake of man was content to become man, and to taste death for all, that all through him may live. This is a wonderful piece of knowledge which God has revealed to us in his Gospel; but he has not revealed it to raise our wonder, but to confirm and establish our faith in him to whom he hath committed all

Had the Gospel required of us to expect from Christ the redemption of our souls and bodies, and given us no reason to think that Christ was endued with power equal to the work, we might justly have complained; and it would have been a standing reproach, that Christians believe they know not what. But to expect redemption from the Son of God, the resurrection of our bodies from the same hand which at first created and formed them, are rational and well-founded acts of faith; and it is the Christian's glory, that he knows in whom he has believed.

That the world was made by the Son of God, is a proposition with which reason has no fault to find: that he who made the world should have power to renew it to life again, is highly consonant to reason. All the mystery lies in this, that so high and great a person should condescend to become man, and subject to death, for the sake of mankind. But are we the fit persons to complain of this transcendent mysterious love? Or, does it become us to quarrel with the kindness of our blessed Lord towards us, only because it is greater than we can conceive? No; it becomes us to bless and to adore this exceeding love, by which we are saved from condemnation, by which we expect to be rescued from death; knowing that the power of our Blessed Lord is equal to his love, and that he is able to subdue all things to himself.

SERMON XV.

On the Sufferings of Christ.

He is despised and rejected of men, a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief.

WHEN our Lord was led away to be crucified, and the women bewailed and lamented his misery, he turned about to them, and said, daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for me, but weep for yourselves. Words, which we may very properly apply to ourselves for the direction of our devotion on this day * of his crucifixion;

a day it is of sorrow and mourning, but not for his sake, who, crowned with glory and honour, is set down on the right hand of the Majesty on high; but for our own, whose sins brought down this load of woe and misery upon our Blessed Redeemer. If we consider with how unbounded a love he embraced us in our lowest state of weakness, and with how cool an affection we approach to him; how much he gladly endured upon our account, and how unwillingly we suffer any thing upon his; if we reflect how earnestly he laboured to save our souls, and how carelessly and wantonly we throw them away; what pains and sorrows he underwent to perfect our redemption, and to what empty pleasures we sacrifice all his sufferings, and our own eternal happiness; it will shew us where the true cause of our grief lies, and how vainly we compliment our Lord, by venting our indignation against his ancient crucifiers, which ought to be spent upon ourselves, who are daily renewing his shame, and crucifying him afresh.

Whilst therefore I represent unto you this scene of woe, and endeavour to place before you this man of sorrow, and acquainted with grief, let every Christian heart supply this necessary admonition, all this he suffered for my sake; then cast one look upon yourselves, and see how you have deserved all this love; this will teach you how to divide your affections, to admire and adore the unbounded goodness of your Redeemer, and to lament and weep only for yourselves.

Many prophecies there are relating to our Lord, which regard only some particular circumstances of his life; but this in the text points at no single calamity that befel him, but is a general description of his condition during his abode on earth: it begins at his cradle, and ends with his cross, pursuing him in every step, and discovers to us the Son of God through the darkest vale of sorrow and affliction.

Known unto God are all his works, from the beginning of the world: in wisdom he ordained them all, and in mercy he has revealed some of them to the children of men. How gracious was it in him to forewarn the world by the spirit of prophecy of the mean appearance of their Redeemer, that their faith might be armed against the reproach and contempt which attended his poverty, and the great scandal of his cross! In human reckoning a mean condition bespeaks a mean man; but here the case is otherwise: for, when God has foretold the mean appearance of his Son, his poverty became a proof of his authority, and the lowliness of his condition shewed the excellency of his person. He was a man of sorrow, and acquainted with grief; and had he not been so, we could never have believed him to be that glorious Redeemer, who, as the spirit of prophecy foretold, should be despised and rejected of men. The consideration, therefore, of our Saviour's sufferings, is not only an argument to inflame our love, but to strengthen our faith likewise; shewing as well that he is our Redeemer, as how much he underwent for the sake of our redemption.

There are three things, then, which may deserve your attention in this subject:

I. The wisdom and goodness of God in determining to send his Son into the world in a state of poverty and affliction.

II. The evidence of prophecy, that he should so appear in the fullness of time.

III. The historical evidence, that he did so appear, and that in him the prophecies had their completion.

I. The wisdom and goodness of God in determining to send his Son into the world in a state of poverty and affliction.

The sufferings of Christ we find often insisted on by the sacred writers, as an evidence of the mercy of God towards mankind. Thus St. Paul, he that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things? And again, God commendeth his love towards us, in that while we were yet sinners Christ died for us. So likewise St. John, hereby perceive we the love of God, because he laid down his life for us. This indeed was a great demonstration of his love; for, as our blessed Lord himself hath told us, greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends. Were it then ever so hard to render an account of Christ's sufferings to the inquisitive, to the reasoners of this world;

yet, since it is plain his sufferings were upon our account, if we consider them as an argument of God's goodness, and our Redeemer's love to us, it stands clear of all difficulties whatever, and plainly speaks how much our salvation was the care of Heaven. Perhaps we cannot see the reasons that made it necessary for Christ to die, that the world might live: but this we certainly know, that, if Christ died that the world might live, he had an exceeding great tenderness for the world, and we are bound to him in the strictest bonds of gratitude and love. And, since this scene lies so open to our view, it shews great perverseness of mind, and a base ungenerous disposition, to shut our eyes upon it, and to harden our hearts against the impressions of so much kindness, and to amuse ourselves with curious inquiries into the hidden reason of this mysterious love. What is it that your Lord requires of you, but to love and to obey him? What greater inducement can you have to both than this, that he first loved you, and laid down his life for you? Could you give ten thousand reasons for the expediency of his so doing, yet still your love and your obedience would stand upon the same bottom, that Christ died, that you might live. What purpose then of religion would it serve to know these hidden things of God? Knowledge will save no man! And who would not chuse rather to be found in the number of the most ignorant lovers of Christ, and of his word, than among the profoundest inquirers into the secret mysteries of Providence? Would you see the goodness of God? Nothing plainer, Christ died for you. Would you encourage yourself in the practice of virtue by the expectation of God's assistance and favour? Or, would you comfort yourself in your repentance, and be glad to know that God will receive you, if you return from the evil of your ways? Go, learn to reason of St. Paul: if God spare not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how will he not with him also freely give us all things?

Thus far then, that is, as far as we are concerned to go, our knowledge is clear and distinct, and the sufferings of Christ afford us such an argument for love and obedience, as the weakest man must understand, and the wisest must adore.

But farther: though we cannot enter into the hidden wisdom of God, and see the reasons which made it necessary for Christ to suffer; yet if we consider his sufferings with respect to ourselves, we may discern many wise ends of Providence in this dispensation.

1. With regard to his being a teacher, his sufferings set him above the reach of suspicions. What ends could he have to serve by his doctrine, who met with nothing but misery and affliction, as the reward of his labour? Religions, we know, have been instituted to serve the ends of policy, and new kingdoms have sprung out of new doctrines: thus the empire and alcoran of Mahomet have the same date. But what room is there for these jealousies with respect to the Christian religion? What advantage did Christ or his followers make of the Gospel? The master lived in poverty, and the disciples in distress; he ended his life upon the cross, they theirs by sundry kinds of death. Nor was he disappointed in meeting with this usage: he knew before that it was ordained for him; and it was one great part of his business to prepare his disciples to follow his example, by acquainting them long before of the afflictions which both he and they were to endure. Some perhaps will suspect there was no wisdom in this; and all, I think, must own, that there was no worldly wisdom in it. Had our Lord come in the form of a temporal prince, surrounded with power and majesty, often had we heard before now of his cunning and his policy, and been told, that our religion was more nearly allied to this world than the other. But now the gospel stands clear of all these objections, from which perhaps nothing could have purged it but the blood of its Divine Author.

2. With regard to our Lord's being an example of holiness and obedience, set before us for our instruction and imitation. His sufferings render the pattern perfect, and shew his virtues in their truest lustre, and at the same time silence the pleas which laziness or self-love would otherwise have suggested. Had he lived in worldly prosperity, and found all things easy about him, let his virtues have been ever so conspicuous, his example would have been extended but a little way. Perhaps poor men, and unfortunate, would have upbraided the rich and prosperous for not following the copy set before them; but they would have thought their own hard circumstances a sufficient excuse for not attempting it. But what pretence is there now left for any mortal? Are you more wretched than your master? Are you poor, and therefore discontented? Look to him, who had not where to lay his head, and yet was easy, and paid a cheerful obedience to his God. Are you provoked by ill usage to forget the peaceful duties of charity? Are you hurried to revenge by uncommon injuries? And can you at the same time think yourself a disciple of the blessed Jesus, who even upon the cross, and under the bitter agonies of death, prayed for his persecutors; Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do.

3. With regard to his divine mission. His sufferings were an evident token that the hand of God was with him. He only can produce strength out of weakness, and knows how to confound the mighty things of the world by things which are of no account. Power, we know, especially if attended with happy incidents, can produce great things; but a weak poor man is so easily oppressed, that this before us is perhaps the only instance in which a whole nation ever rose to suppress one. And what was it that enabled him to withstand the rage of the people, and the malice of the priests, supported by the power of the government? When his life was sought, he was hid in the midst of the crowd, and was covered with darkness at noon-day: but, when his time was come, he fell an easy victim: but his death, like Sampson's, was more victorious than his life; in this only it differed, Sampson by his death destroyed his enemies, but the enemies of Christ were by his death redeemed.

Add to this, the evidence of prophecy, which is so much the stronger, by how much the weaker Christ was: so admirably has the wisdom of God displayed itself in this mystery of faith. Had the prophets foretold that a great man should do great things; whenever that great man had come, it might have been doubted whether he was the person foretold, and whether his mighty deeds were not the common effects of such might and power as he was armed with: but when the prophets declared that all they foretold should be accomplished by a mean and wretched man, oppressed with sorrow, and worn out with grief; this was a case that could not be mistaken, hardly two such men could come; and whenever he came, he would be easily distinguished by the greatness of his works, and the meanness of his condition. And this leads me to consider,

II. The evidence of prophecy concerning the mean appearance our Lord was to make.

I shall not need to carry you far in search of this evidence; the chapter of the text alone is so full a description of this part of our Saviour's character, that it looks more like an history than a prophecy, and may with more reason be suspected to be a copy drawn from his life, than not to be a description of it. Yet this Scripture was in being long before our Lord was born, was in the keeping of his enemies, of those who hated and despised him, and at last put him to a cruel death, and were at once the preservers and the fulfillers of this prophecy. Here you find him represented as void of form and of comeliness; as having no beauty that we should desire him; one despised and rejected of men; a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief; from whom we hid as it were our faces; he was despised, and we esteemed him not. Yet this is he, of whom before the Prophet had prophesied: Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given, and the government shall be upon his shoulder; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace: of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom, to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice from henceforth even for ever. What enigmas are these? Shall he be a mighty prince, and yet despised and rejected of men? Shall he be encompassed with the glories of David's throne, and yet be void of form and of comeliness? Shall he reign for ever, and establish justice and judgment for evermore, and shall he yet be taken from prison, and cut off from the land of the living? Where can these contradictions meet, and in what manner of person can they be reconciled? But to go on: After this general description of his low estate, the Prophet proceeds to point out some of the most remarkable calamities of his life. He was not only despised and rejected, but he was oppressed and afflicted, yet he opened not his mouth. He was taken from prison and from judgment, and cut off from the land of the living; for the transgression of the people he was stricken. And yet, he had done no violence, neither was any deceit in his mouth. Yet it pleased the Lord to bruise him, and to put him to grief. His soul was an offering for sin. And yet, after this, when the Prophet had killed and buried him, he adds, he shall prolong his days, and the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in his hand. He shall see the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied. By his knowledge shall my righteous servant justify many: for he shall bear their iniquities. Where are we now? Must he die a wretched death, and be numbered with the transgressors; and yet shall he prolong his days, and see the work of the Lord prosper in his hands? How shall we clear these things? Look into the Gospel, and there you will find the scene opening apace: there you will find your Lord despised and rejected of men, persecuted and afflicted, and put to a cruel death and open shame, and yet rising to glory and honour. There you may see this prisoner of the grave ascending to the glory of his Father, giving gifts unto men, and leading captivity captive.

Let us then, in the last place, consider the historical evidence we have for the completion of these prophecies, which describe the calamitous condition of our blessed Redeemer.

The way was prepared before he was born. His conception led to it; since the meanness of his parentage could promise nothing for the child but labour and sorrow: and so it proved. This mighty Prince of Peace made his first appearance in a manger; and we may well suppose the other conveniences he met, upon his first coming into the world, were answerable to this. No sooner was he born, but his life was sought after: the distressed parents fly their country, and the child is carried into banishment, before he knew to distinguish between good and evil. His youth was spent in the difficulties of poverty, and his hands employed in the works of it; and when the time came that he was to be made known unto Israel, and stood forth in the power of the Lord, confirming his doctrine with mighty signs and wonders, the opposition to him increased, and every act of charity he did to others brought new sorrow and misery to himself. During this time, in which he went about doing good, he had not, as he himself has told us, where to lay his head. When he cast out devils, he was immediately charged to be in league with the prince of them. When he healed the sick of their infirmities, and forgave their sins, then he was a blasphemer, an encroacher upon the prerogative of God. When he restored the withered hand, and cured the lame or the blind on the Sabbath day, then he was no longer fit to live: these were such offences, as nothing but his death could expiate. Consider what he suffered, and he was the lowest of the sons of men: consider what he did, and he appears, as he truly was, to be the Son of God.

But still there remains behind the gloomiest scene of sorrow. When the powers of darkness prevailed, and the time of his being offered up drew near, all things conspired to make his death bitter and terrifying. In his life he had chosen twelve to be his constant companions, and they at least adhered to him, and willingly partook in his afflictions: but now one of these bosom friends conspires his ruin, and sells him for thirty pieces of silver. The rest, though they were guilty of no such baseness, yet proved no comfort in his distress.

As the danger drew near, our blessed Lord, who was in all things tempted like unto us, sin only excepted, felt the pangs of nature at the approach of death, and retired to prayer, the only support of an afflicted spirit. In this his grief he chose Peter and the sons of Zebedee to be his companions, that they might watch with him in his sorrow: but even here they forsook him; and, insensible of their master's agony, fell asleep. They were soon awakened; but they awoke only to fly, and Christ was left alone. Peter followed, but it was all over; and he only followed him to deny him. Thus betrayed, and thus forsaken, he is carried to judgment. When he is silent, he is reproached with sullenness: when he speaks, he is charged with blasphemy. Sometimes he is buffeted and spit on; by and by, in cruel sport, they pay him the mock honours of a prince, he is crowned with thorns, has a reed put into his hand, and in derision he is saluted, king of the Jews. And that noise might be wanting to shew how vile and contemptible he was to the people, a question was put between him and Pilate, whether he should be released; or with one voice the people answered, release unto us Barabbas. Thus was he despised and rejected of all men.

Follow him but one step farther, and you will find him hanging upon the cross between two common robbers, groaning under the bitterest agonies of death. Nor yet can all this misery create in the lookers on any pity or compassion. See how they shake their heads, and say, come down from the cross, Son of God, come down, and we will believe thee. But neither the pains of the cross, nor those pangs which drew from him that complaint, my God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me, nor all the malice and scorn of the crucifiers, could make him one moment forget his love and tenderness towards them. You hear no complaint from him, no appeal made against them to a future judgment: instead of this, with his last breath he pleads their cause, excuses their weakness, and begs for their pardon; Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do.

And here let us close this scene, and return to ourselves with this question, What reward shall I give unto the Lord for all the benefits that he hath done unto me? Let us also answer for ourselves in the words of the Psalmist, I will receive the cup of salvation, and call upon the name of the Lord. We have nothing to return but our love, and obedience, and nothing else is required of us. He hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows; let us not call for them again by our iniquities: let them be buried for ever, but let us arise to a new life of righteousness in Christ Jesus, that when Christ, who is our life, shall appear, we may also appear with him in glory.

SERMON XVI.

On the Resurrection and last Judgment.

2 Cor. v. 10, 11.

We must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ, that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done whether it be good or bad.

Knowing therefore the terrors of the Lord, we persuade men.

It is the privilege and distinguishing character of a rational being to be able to look forward into futurity, and to consider his actions, not only with respect to the present advantage or disadvantage arising from them, but to view them in their consequences through all the parts of time in which himself may possibly exist. If therefore we value the privilege of being reasonable creatures, the only way to preserve it, is to make use of it; and by extending our views into all the scenes of futurity, in which we ourselves must bear a part, to lay the foundation of solid and durable happiness.

By the exercise of this power of reason, the wisest among the Heathens discovered, that there was ground for men to have expectations beyond this life. They saw plainly that themselves, and all things that fell under their observation, were dependent beings on the will and power of him who formed them; and when they sought to find him, they were led, by a necessary chain of reasoning, to the acknowledgment of a supreme, independent, intelligent Being. They saw, in every part of the creation, evident marks of his power, wisdom, and goodness: they discerned that all the inanimate parts of the world acted perpetually in submission to the law of their creation: the sun and all the host of heaven were constant to their courses; and, in every other part, the powers of nature were duly and regularly exerted for the preservation of the present system: among men only they found di-order and confusion. That they had reason was plain; that they were intended to live according to reason could not be doubted; and yet they saw virtue often distressed and abandoned to all the evils of life, vice triumphant, and the world every where subject to the violence of pride and ambition. How to account for this they knew not: this only they could observe, that man was endowed with a freedom in acting, which the other beings of the lower world wanted; and to this they rightly ascribed the disorders to be found in this part of the creation. But though this accounted for the growth of evil, yet it rendered no account of the justice or goodness of God in permitting vice oftentimes to reign here in glory, whilst virtue suffered in distress. Upon these considerations they concluded, that there must be another state after this, in which all the present inequalities in the administration of Providence should be set right, and every man receive according to his works.

This was, this is the ground of our natural expectation of a life after this. But upon this ground of truth many fables and stories were raised, by fear and superstition, and by the power of imagination: so that the general belief, though right in its foundation, yet in almost all the particulars of it was rendered ridiculous and absurd. Hence it is, that, among the writers of antiquity, we sometimes find wise men ridiculing the follies and superstitions of the people, and bad men always arguing from these follies against the very notion itself, and calling in question the reality of any future state.

Under these circumstances of the world, our blessed Lord appeared to bring to light life and immortality through the Gospel. Let us then consider how this fundamental article of religion now stands upon the foot of the Gospel revelation.

As to the principal point, there is no difference between the hopes conveyed to us in the Gospel, and the expectation built upon natural reason: for, as the wisest men thought there must be, so the Gospel assures there will be, a day in which God will judge the world in righteousness; and render to every man according to his works. Thus far then the doctrine of the Gospel, and the dictates of natural reason, must stand or fall together. If this doctrine has had a larger and more extensive influence through the authority of the Gospel, than it could have had by the mere force of speculative reasoning, the world has received an advantage by the encouragement given to virtue, and the restraint laid upon vice by these means, which ought ever to be acknowledged with thankfulness.

But the Gospel has added to this doctrine, and communicated to us the knowledge of some circumstances, which were not discoverable but by the means of revelation: and they are principally these: that there shall be a resurrection of the body; that Christ shall be judge of the world; that the rewards and punishments in another life shall be in proportion to our behaviour in this.

I shall speak briefly to these particulars, and shew for what purpose they were revealed.

First, The resurrection of the body was revealed to give all men a plain and a sensible notion of their being subject to a future judgment. Death is the destruction of the man: and sure we are that the lifeless body is no man; and whatever notions some may have of the soul in its state of separate existence, yet a mere spirit is not a man; for man is made of soul and body: and therefore to bring the man into judgment to answer for his deeds, the soul and the body must be brought together again. This doctrine, established upon the authority of the Gospel, does not remove all prejudices of the case, when examined by the short and scanty notions we have of the powers of nature: but it effectually removes all difficulties that affect this belief, considered with respect to religion and morality. For the single point in which religion is concerned, is to know whether men shall be accountable hereafter for their actions here. Reason tells us they ought to be so; but a great difficulty arises from the dissolution of the man by death; a difficulty followed by endless speculations upon the nature of the soul, of its separate existence, of its guilt in this separate state, with respect to crimes committed in another, and in conjunction with the body, and by other difficulties of the like kind. But take in the declaration of Gospel, that soul and body shall be as certainly united at the resurrection as they were divided by death, and every man be himself again; and there is no more difficulty in conceiving that men may be judged for their iniquities hereafter, than there is in conceiving that they may be judged here, when they offend against the laws of the country.

But still there are prejudices remaining: to some it is incredible that the dead should be raised. To these we answer, upon the foot of the Gospel evidence, that the dead have been raised; upon the foot of reason, that it is altogether as credible, that God should be able to raise the dead to life a second time, as that he was able to give them life at first. There is no difference in the cases; they are acts of one and the very same power.

But we are further asked, what body shall be raised, since no man has exactly the same body two days together? new parts are perpetually added by nutrition, old ones carried off by perspiration; so that in the compass of a few years an human body may be almost totally altered, and be no more the same, than a ship which has been so often repaired, that no part of the original materials is left. But this objection, as plausible as it may seem, has nothing to do in the present case; for religion is concerned only to preserve the identity or sameness of the person, as the object of future judgment; and has nothing to do with that kind of identity against which the objection can be supposed to have any force. Were the case otherwise, the difficulty would be really as great in human judgments in this life, as in the divine judgment hereafter. Suppose a man should commit murder when he was twenty, and not be discovered till he was sixty, and then brought to trial; would common sense admit him to plead that he was not the same person who committed the fact; and to allege, in proof of it, the alterations in his body for the last forty years? Suppose then, that instead of being discovered at sixty, he should die at sixty? and should rise either with the body he had at sixty, or twenty, or in any intermediate time, would not the cause be just the same with respect to the future judgment? Evidently it would be the same: which shews that the article of the resurrection, as far as it is a support of religion, and of a future judgment, stands quite clear of this difficulty.

But the prejudices which affect men most, when they consider this article of the resurrection, arise from the weakest of all imaginations, that they can judge from the settled laws and course of nature, what is or is not possible to the power of God. It is very true, that all our powers are bounded by the laws of nature; but does it follow that his power must be so bounded, who appointed these laws of nature, and could have appointed others, if he had thought proper? We cannot raise a dead body; our hands are tied up by the laws of nature, which we cannot surpass. Neither can we make or create a new man; but we certainly know, from reason and experience, that there is one who can: and what can induce us to suppose, that he cannot give life to a body a second time, who we certainly know gave life to it at first? These prejudices therefore we may safely refer to the power of the Almighty, to which all nature is obedient, and upon which we may securely depend for the performance of divine promises, how unpromising soever the circumstances may seem to be which attend them. When the Sadducees denied the resurrection, our Saviour told them, I do err, not knowing the Scriptures, nor the power of God: intimating plainly, that for the security and certainty of our resurrection we must trust to Scripture, and the declaration of God's purpose contained therein; and for the method and means of bringing this great work to pass we must rely on the power of God.

But whatever difficulties of this kind may remain, yet this article has removed all which lie in the way of our considering ourselves as accountable creatures, and subject to the future judgment of God. Whatever you may imagine to be the state of separate souls; whatever difficulties may arise in considering a mere spirit as accountable for the actions of this compound being, man; they are all out of the question. It is not a mere spirit, but the man himself, who is to be brought to judgment; and plain sense must see and acknowledge the reasonableness of judging a man hereafter for the crimes committed in this life, as evidently as it sees the reasonableness of judging him here, when his crimes happen to be detected. So that the revelation in this particular has brought faith and common sense to a perfect agreement.

Secondly, The Gospel revelation has made known to us, that Christ shall be judge of the world.

Our Saviour tells us, that the Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment to the Son. John v. 22. And again: The Father hath given him authority to execute judgment; because he is the Son of Man, ver. 27. And St. Peter declares, that the apostles had it expressly in their commission to publish this doctrine to all the world: He commanded us to preach unto the people, and to testify that it is he which was ordained of God to be the judge of quick and dead, Acts, x. 42. Accordingly St. Paul, in his short discourse to the men of Athens, fully instructed them in this material point: God hath appointed a day in the which he will judge the world in righteousness, by the man whom he hath ordained; whereof he hath given assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead. Acts, xvii. 31. I will not multiply texts to this purpose, though many more there are which speak the same sense, because this doctrine is very well known to Christians, and is part of the creed which we daily rehearse.

But it is material to observe, that this authority is given to Christ, because he is the Son of Man, as he himself has assured us; and that the person ordained to be judge is a man, even the man whom God raised from the dead, as St. Paul asserts. How happy is it for us to have a judge, I had almost said so partial, but I may well say so favourable to us, that he was content to be himself the sacrifice to redeem us from the punishment due to our sins? When we consider ourselves, how wretched and weak we are, how perpetually doing wrong, either wilfully or ignorantly, and contemplate the infinite majesty, holiness, and justice of God, what account can we hope to give of ourselves to him, whose eyes are purser than to behold iniquity? But see, God hath withdrawn his terrors, and has given a man to be the judge of men. So that we may say of our judge what the Apostle to the Hebrews says of our high priest, We have not a judge which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities, but was in all things tempted like as we are; yet without sin.

You may think perhaps that this is drawing consequences upon the foot of vulgar apprehensions, and that in reality there is no difference, whether God be judge himself, or commits the judgment to the Son of Man: for, since Christ shall come not only in the power, but in the wisdom and the justice of God also to judge the world, what difference can there be in the judgment, since in both cases it must be guided and formed by the wisdom and justice of God? True it is, that a mere man is not qualified to be judge of the world; the knowledge of hearts is necessary to the right discharge of that office; a knowledge which no mere man was ever endowed with. But still, if the man is to be judge, the sentiments, notions, and feeling of the man, however guided and influenced by superior wisdom, must preside over and govern the whole action; otherwise the man will not be judge. And hence we may answer some difficulties which speculative men have brought into the subject of a future judgment. Some have imagined that justice, mercy, and goodness in God, are not of the same kind with justice, mercy, and goodness in men; and therefore that we can never, from our notions of these qualities in man, argue consequentially to the attributes of God, or to the acts flowing from these attributes. The result of which is, that when we talk of God's justice or mercy in judging the world, we talk of something which we do not understand. But if men would consult Scripture, these difficulties would not meet them in their way; for surely we know what justice, mercy, and goodness, mean among men; and since the Scripture assures us, that the man whom God raised from the dead is ordained Judge of the world, we may be very certain that the justice, mercy, and goodness, to be displayed in the future judgment, will be such as all men have a common sense and apprehension of; unless you can imagine that a new rule is to be introduced, to which the Judge, and those to be judged, are equally strangers. Upon this foot of Scripture then we may certainly know, what the justice, mercy, and goodness, are by which we must finally stand or fall; and this point being secured, the speculation may be left to shift for itself.

And thus you see how this great and fundamental article of religion, involved in darkness in former ages, is made plain and sensible to mankind by the light of the Gospel. That men were accountable, they always knew; that there would be a future judgment, was generally believed; but how men were to appear in judgment, or how mere unbodied spirits were to be judged, how rewarded, or how punished, they knew not. That the right of judging men was in God, was well known; but how he would exercise it, whether by himself or another, visible or invisibly, they knew not. Infinite were the disputes upon this subject: instead of which the Gospel has given a plain sensible representation, assuring us that at the judgment we shall be, what we now are, men, real men; and that the man Christ Jesus, who appeared in the world to redeem us, will appear again to judge us by that very Gospel, and those very rules, which he has left us to govern and conduct ourselves by.

Thirdly, Let us then go one step farther, and view the consequences of this judgment; this solemn judgment, which every mortal must undergo. If we consult either Scripture or reason, we shall find no evidence of any farther change to be made in our future state, after once judgment has passed on us. That we are accountable, and shall therefore be judged, reason says; but can see nothing relating to us after judgment, except the reward or the punishment consequent upon it: and therefore the only conclusion to be drawn from this information is, that the condition of man will be finally determined as to happiness or misery, and consequently that man must continue under the good or the bad effects of the last judgment.

As reason can shew us nothing beyond

judgment, but that state and condition which are the effect of it; so the Holy Scripture has given us reason to think that nothing else there shall be, by describing the rewards and punishments of another life, as having perpetual duration. Life eternal is prepared for the righteous, and everlasting punishment for the wicked. The fire prepared to receive them is never to go out; the worm prepared to torment them will never die. These images carry great terror with them, and have led some to a milder interpretation of the threats of Scripture, than the language of it seems to import. But even the mildest interpretation, that allows any meaning at all to those threats, supposes the punishment to last as long as the sinner lasts. So that in this, the lowest view, our all depends upon the judgment which shall be finally passed on us at the second coming of our Lord. There is then a justness of thought, as well as great charity to the souls of men, in what the Apostle adds, Knowing the terror of the Lord, we persuade men. If the Christian revelation has cleared our doubts, by bringing life and immortality to light through the Gospel; if it has given us ground for hope and confidence by assuring us that we shall be judged by him, who so loved us that he gave himself for us, and submitted to die that we might live; it has also given us ground to be watchful and careful over ourselves, and to work out our salvation with fear and trembling. For it is a fearful thing to be to answer for ourselves before the Searcher of all hearts: to answer to him who loved us, for despising the love he shewed us; to answer to him who died for us, for having crucified him afresh, and put him to open shame; and for having accounted the blood of the covenant an unholy thing. This will be the sad case of every wilful sinner. The view of this misery and distress, which sinners are calling upon themselves by their iniquity, moved the Apostle, and must ever move those who succeed to his office, to warn men to flee from the wrath that is to come. We know the terror of the Lord, and therefore persuade men. Happy would it be if men, knowing and considering these terrors, would suffer themselves to be persuaded. Which God grant, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

To whom, with the Father and the Holy Ghost, be ascribed all honour and glory, henceforth, and for evermore. Amen.

On Belief in Christ.

By BISHOP HORSLEY.

JOHN, XX. 29.

Thomas, because thou hast seen me, thou hast believed : Blessed are they who have not seen and yet have believed.

THESE were the words of Christ's reply to his apostle Thomas, when he, who had refused to credit the resurrection of Jesus upon the report of the other apostles, received the conviction of his own senses in a personal interview, and recognised our Saviour for Lord and God.

What is most remarkable in these words, on the first general view of them, in the great coolness with which our Lord accepts an act of homage and adoration offered with much warmth and cordiality ; a circumstance which plainly indicates some defect or blemish in the offering, by which its value was much diminished. And this could be nothing but the lateness of it — the apostle's wonderful reluctance to believe much less than what he at last professes : But eight days since, he would not believe that Jesus to be alive whom now he worships as the living God.

But this is not all : The apostle is not only reproved for his past incredulity ; he is told besides, at least it is indirectly suggested to him, that the belief which he at last so fervently professes hath little merit in it, — that it was not of that sort of faith which might claim the promises of the gospel ; being indeed no voluntary act of his own mind, but the necessary result of irresistible evidence. This is clearly implied in that blessing which our Lord so emphatically pronounces on those who not having seen should yet believe. " Thomas, because thou hast seen me, thou hast believed : " You now indeed believe, when the testimony of your own senses leaves it no longer in your power to disbelieve. I promise no blessing to such reluctant faith : " Blessed are they who have not seen and yet have believed."

Here arise two questions, which, either for the difficulty which each carries in the first face of it, or for the instruction which the speculation may afford, may well deserve an accurate discussion. The first is, why Thomas was reproved for not believing till he was convinced ? the second, what should be the peculiar merit of that faith which hath not the immediate evidence of sense for its foundation or support, that our Saviour should on this sort of faith exclusively pronounce a blessing ? A readiness to believe wonders upon slender evidence hath ever been deemed a certain mark of a weak mind ; and it may justly seem impossible that man should earn a blessing by his folly, or incur God's displeasure by his discretion.

For the clearing up of these difficult questions, this shall be my method, — First, to consider what ground there might be for St. Thomas to believe the fact of our Lord's resurrection upon the report of the other ten apostles, before he had himself seen him ; and from what motives it may be supposed that he withheld his assent. In the course of this inquiry, it will appear that an evidence very different from ocular demonstration may in many cases command the assent of a reasonable man ; and that no man can be justified in setting a resolution within himself, as Thomas did, that he will not believe without this or that particular kind of proof. Secondly, I shall show that the belief of any thing upon such evidence as Thomas at last had of Christ's resurrection is a natural act of the human mind, to which nothing of moral or religious merit can reasonably be ascribed. These preliminary disquisitions will furnish the necessary principles for the resolution of that great and interesting question, What is the merit, and at the same time what is the certainty, of that faith which believes what it hath not seen ?

In the first place, I propose to consider what ground there might be for Thomas to believe the fact of our Saviour's resurrection, upon the testimony of the other apostles, before he had himself seen him; and what may be supposed to have been the motives upon which he refused his assent. And here the thing principally to be considered is, what degree of trust the apostle might reasonably have placed in our Lord's promise of rising again after the event of his crucifixion; and what there might be on the other hand to outweigh the expectation of the thing, and the positive testimony of his fellow disciples. Our Saviour had on many occasions foretold his own death; and never without assurances that he would rise again on the third day. This he generally declared enigmatically to the Jews, but in the most explicit terms to the apostles in private: And it is very remarkable, that though he had spoken of nothing more plainly in private or more darkly in public than of his resurrection, describing it under the figure of rebuilding a demolished temple, and under allusions to the prophet Jonah's miraculous deliverance,—yet the Jews, whose understandings had been blind to the meaning of the easiest parables, took the full meaning of these figured predictions; while the apostles either understood them not, or retained not in their memory the plain unequivocal declarations which our Lord had made to them; so that while the rulers of the Jews were using all precaution to prevent the success of a counterfeit resurrection, nothing could be more remote from the expectations of the apostles than a real one. In this we see the hand of Providence wonderfully directing all things for the conviction of after ages. Had the caution of the Jews been less or the faith of the apostles more awake, the evidence of this glorious truth, that "Christ is risen, and become the first-fruits of them that sleep," might not have been to us what it now is. Nevertheless, though none of the apostles seem to have had positive expectations of our Lord's resurrection before it happened, yet St. Thomas seems to have been singular in treating the report of the resurrection as a manifest fiction.

From the conversation of the two disciples on the way to Emmaus, it may be gathered that the first report of the holy women, though it had not yet obtained belief, was by no means rejected with absolute contempt. On the contrary, it seems to have awakened in all but Thomas some recollection of our Lord's predictions, and some dubious solicitude what might be the events of the third day. And yet it cannot be supposed that St. Thomas at this time had no remembrance of our Lord's predictions of his resurrection; of which the other ten could not but remind him: But the consideration, it seems, had no weight with him. And yet the person who had given his followers these assurances was no ordinary man: His miraculous conception had been foretold by an angel; his birth had been announced to the peasants of Judea by a company of the heavenly host—to the learned of a distant country by a new wonder in the air; his high original had been afterwards attested by voices from heaven; he had displayed powers in himself which amounted to nothing less than an uncontrolled and unlimited dominion over every department of the universe,—over the first elements of which natural substances are composed, in his first miracle of changing water into wine, and in the later ones of augmenting the mass of a few loaves and a few small fishes to a quantity sufficient for the meal of hungry multitudes—over the most turbulent of the natural elements, composing the raging winds and troubled waves—over the laws of nature, exempting the matter of his body on a particular occasion from the general force of gravitation, and the power of mechanical impulse, so as to tread secure and firm upon the tossing surface of a stormy sea—over the vegetable kingdom, blasting the fig-tree with his word—over the animal body, removing its diseases, correcting the original defects and disorders of its organs, and restoring its mutilated parts—over the human mind, penetrating the closest secrets of each man's heart—over the revolted spirits, delivering miserable mortals from their persecution, and compelling them to confess him for their Lord and the destined avenger of their crimes; and, what might more than all add weight to the promise of his resurrection, he had shown that life itself was in his power, restoring it in various instances—in one when it had been so long extinguished that the putrefaction of the animal fluids must have taken place.

These wonders had been performed to confirm the purest doctrine, and had been accompanied with the most unblemished life. This extraordinary personage had predicted his own death, the manner of it, and many of its circumstances; all which the apostle had seen exactly verified in the event. Even when he hung upon the cross in agonies—agonies of body, and stronger agonies of mind, which might more have shaken the faith of his disciples, Nature bore witness to her Lord in awful signs of sympathy; the sun, without any natural cause, withdrew his light; and in the moment that he yielded up the ghost, the earth shook and the rocks were rended.

From this series of wonders, to most of which he had been an eye-witness, had not St. Thomas more reason to expect the completion of Christ's prediction at the time appointed, than to shut his ears against the report of the other ten, of whose probity and veracity in the course of their attendance on their common Lord he must have had full experience? Cases may possibly arise, in which the intrinsic improbability of the thing averred may outweigh the most positive and unexceptionable evidence; and in which a wise man may be allowed to say, not, with Thomas, "I will not believe" (for a case can hardly be supposed in which testimony is to be of no weight), but he might say "I will doubt:" But where ten men of fair character bear witness, each upon his own knowledge, to a fact which is in itself more probable than its opposite, I know not upon what ground their testimony can be questioned.

Such was the case before us. Where then can we look for the ground of the apostle's incredulity, but in the prejudices of his own mind? Possibly he might stand upon what he might term his right. Since each of the other ten had received the satisfaction of ocular demonstration, he might think he had a just pretence to expect and insist upon the same. He had been no less than they attached, he might say, to his Master's person—no less an admirer of his doctrine—no less observant of his precepts—nor less a diligent though distant copier of his great example; not less than the rest he revered and loved his memory; he would not less rejoice to see him again alive; nor would he with less firmness and constancy, provided he might be indulged with the same evidence of the fact, bear witness to his resurrection, nor less cheerfully seal the glorious attestation with his blood: But for what reason could it be expected of him to believe, upon the testimony of the other ten, that for which each of them pretended to have received the immediate evidence of his own senses? He never would believe that his kind Master, who knew his attachment—whose affection he had so often experienced, if he were really alive, would deny the honour and satisfaction of a personal interview to himself alone of all his old adherents.

If these were the apostle's sentiments, he did not fairly weigh the evidence that was before him of the fact in question; but made his condition of his believing it at all,—that it should be proved to him by evidence of one particular kind. Did he ask himself upon what evidence he and the Jews his contemporaries believed in the divine authority of the laws of Moses?—upon what evidence they received as oracular the writings of the ancient prophets?

A general revelation could never be, if no proof might be sufficient for a reasonable man but the immediate testimony of his own senses. The benefit of every revelation must in that case be confined to the few individuals to whom it should be first conveyed. The Mosiac institution could have been only for that perverse race which perished in the Wilderness through unbelief; and the preaching of the prophets, for those stubborn generations which refused to hearken, and underwent the judgments of God in their long captivity. These examples might have taught him that the advantage of ocular proof is no mark of God's partial favour for those to whom it may be granted. Were it not unreasonable to suppose that Enoch, and Noah, and Abraham, and Jacob, and Job, and Daniel, who saw the promises of the Messiah only afar off.

were less in the favour of Heaven than they who lived in later times, when the promises began to take effect?

Religious truth itself, and the evidence of religious truth, is imparted, like all other blessings, in various measures and degrees, to different ages and different countries of the world, and to different individuals of the same country and of the same age. And of this no account is to be given, but that in which all good men will rest satisfied,—that “known unto God are all his ways,” and that “the Judge of all the earth will do what is right.” Every man therefore may be allowed to say that he will not believe without sufficient evidence; but none can without great presumption pretend to stipulate for any particular kind of proof, and refuse to attend to any other, if that which he may think he should like best should not be set before him. This is indeed the very spirit of infidelity; and this was the temper of those brethren of the rich man, in our Saviour’s parable, who hearkened not to Moses and the prophets, and yet were expected to repent if one should arise from the dead: This is the conduct of modern unbelievers, who examine not the evidence of revelation as it actually stands, but insist that that sort of proof should be generally exhibited which from the nature of the thing must always be confined to very few. The apostle Thomas, in the principles of his unbelief, too much resembled these uncandid reasoners. Yet let them not think to be sheltered under his example, unless they will follow it in the better part, by a recantation of their errors and a confession of the truth full and ingenuous as his, when once their hearts and understandings are convinced.

From this summary view of the evidence that St. Thomas might have found of our Lord’s resurrection, before it was confirmed to him by a personal interview, —and from this state of the principles upon which alone his incredulity could be founded,—it may sufficiently appear that the reproof he received was not unmerited; and we may see reason to admire and adore the affectionate mildness with which it was administered.

The same thing will still more appear, when it shall be shown, that in the belief of any thing upon such evidence as was at last exhibited to Thomas of our Lord’s resurrection there can be no merit; and for this plain reason, that a belief resulting from such evidence is a necessary act of the understanding, in which the heart is totally uninterested. An assent to full and present proof, from whatever that proof may arise—whether from the senses, from historical evidence, or from the deductions of reason,—an assent, I say, to proof that is in itself complete and full, when the mind holds it in immediate contemplation and comprehends and masters it, arises as necessarily from the nature of the understanding as the perception of external objects arises from the structure of the organs to which they are adapted. To perceive truth by its proper evidence, is of the formal nature of the rational mind; as it is of the physical nature of the eye to see an object by the light that it reflects, or of the ear to hear the sounds which the air conveys to it. To discern the connection between a fact and its evidence, a proposition and its proof, is a faculty fixed in the nature of the mind by God; which faculty the mind is pretty much at liberty to employ or not, and hath a strange power of employing it in some instances perversely; but when it is employed aright—when proof is brought into the mind’s view, either by its own fair investigation or by the force of external objects striking the bodily organs, assent and conviction must ensue. The eye may be shut; the ear may be stopped! the understanding may turn itself away from unpleasing subjects: But the eye, when it is open, hath no power not to see; the ear, when open, hath no power not to hear; and the understanding hath no power not to know truth when the attention is turned to it. It matters not of what kind the proposition may be to which the understanding assents in consequence of full proof;—the completeness of the proof necessarily precludes the possibility of merit in the act of assenting. Now this was the case of Thomas, and indeed of all the apostles, —not with respect to the whole of their faith, but with respect to the particular fact of our Lord’s resurrection; —the proof they had of it was full and absolute: Jesus in his well-known person stands alive before them ; and to believe, when they saw him alive, that he who had been dead was then living, could be nothing more meritorious than to believe that he was dead when they saw the body laid in the grave.

I desire not to be misunderstood. There may be much merit in the diligence, the candour, and sincerity with which a man inquires and investigates ;—there may be merit in the conduct he pursues in consequence of particular convictions. In the conduct of the apostles, there was much merit, under the conviction they at last attained of our Lord's resurrection—in their zeal to diffuse his doctrines—in their firmness in attesting his triumph over the grave, in defiance of the utmost rigour of persecution,—such merit as shall be rewarded with unfading crowns of glory : But in the mere act of believing a fact evidenced by the senses, or a proposition legitimately proved, of whatever kind, there can be none.

But here arises that most interesting question, Since there is confessedly no merit in that act of belief which is the result of ocular conviction, what is the merit of that faith which hath no such foundation—which “ believes that which it hath not seen,” that our Saviour should so emphatically pronounce it blessed ?

I trust that I shall evince, by God's assistance, that this blessing to the faithful standeth sure. But this great subject may well demand a separate discourse.

SERMON XVII.

By BISHOP HORSLEY. *

On Belief in Christ.

JOHN, xx. 29.

Thomas, because thou hast seen me, thou hast believed ; Blessed are they who have not seen and yet have believed.

THE propriety of the reproof addressed in these words to the apostle hath been already shown. It was not his fault that he did not believe before he was convinced ; but that he had hastily set a resolution of unbelief, without attending to a proof which, however inferior to the evidence of sense, might have given him conviction.

‘Tt hath been shown besides, that a faith which is the result of the immediate testimony of the senses must be altogether destitute, as our Saviour intimates, of moral merit. Hence arises this interesting question, the last in my original division of the subject, which I now purpose to discuss,—Since there is no merit in believing upon ocular conviction, what is the merit of that faith which hath not that foundation ? Is it that it is taken up upon slighter grounds ? Is this possible in the nature of things, that the imperfection of the proof should enhance the merit of belief ? Will it not follow, if this principle be once admitted, that where there is the least of proof there will be the most of this merit ; and that the faith which is the most valuable in the sight of God is that which hath the least support and countenance from the understanding ?—a proposition which the adversaries of our holy religion would much rejoice that its professors should affirm.

To clear these difficulties, I know no readier way, than to inquire on what grounds their faith for the most part is likely to be built, who believe, as all Christians do who at this day believe the gospel, without the evidence of their senses. From this inquiry, I hope to make appear both the certainty and the merit of our faith,—its certainty, as resting on a foundation no less firm, though far less compulsive, than the evidence of sense itself ; its merit, as a mixed act of the understanding and of the will of the understanding, deducing its conclusions from the surest premises—of the will, submitting itself to the best of motives. Our faith therefore will appear to be an act in which the moral qualities of the mind are no less active than its reasoning faculties ; and upon this account, it may claim a moral merit of which the involuntary assent of understanding present to sense or to necessary proof must ever be divested.

What then is the ground upon which the faith of the generality of Christians in the present ages is built, who all believe what they have not seen ?—I say, of the generality of Christians ; for what ever it may be which gives faith its merit in the sight of God, it is surely to be looked for not in any thing peculiar to the faith of the learned, but in the common faith of the plain illiterate believer. What then is the ground of his conviction? Is it the historical evidence of the facts recorded in the gospels? Perhaps no facts of an equal antiquity may boast a historical evidence equally complete; and without some degree of this evidence there could be no faith: Yet it is but a branch of the proof, and, if I mistake not, far from the most considerable part; for the whole of this evidence lies open but to a small proportion of the Christian world: It is such as many true believers, many whose names are written in the book of life, have neither the leisure nor the light to scrutinize so as to receive from this alone a sufficient conviction: In the degree in which it may be supposed to strike the generality of believers, it seems to be that which may rather finish a proof begun in other principles than make by itself an entire demonstration.

What then is that which, in connexion with that portion of the historical evidence which common men may be supposed to perceive, affords to them a rational ground of conviction? Is it the completion of prophecy? This itself must have its proof from history. To those who live when the things predicted come to pass, the original delivery of the prophecy is a matter to be proved by historical evidence: To those who live after the things predicted are come to pass, both the delivery of the prophecy and the events in which it is supposed to be verified are points of history; and moreover, by the figured language of prophecy, the evidence which it affords is of all the most removed from popular apprehension. What then is the great foundation of proof to those who are little read in history, and are ill qualified to decipher prophecy, and compare it with the records of mankind? Plainly this, which the learned and the ignorant may equally comprehend,—the intrinsic excellence of the doctrine, and the purity of the precept;—a doctrine which conveys to the rudest understanding just and exalted notions of the Divine perfections; exacts a worship purged of all hypocrisy and superstition—the most adapted to the nature of him who offers—the most worthy, if aught may be worthy, of the Being that accepts it; prescribes the most rational duties—things intrinsically the best, and the most conducive to private and to public good; proposes rewards adequate to the vast desires and capacities of the rational soul; promises mercy to infirmity, without indulgence to vice; holds out pardon to the penitent offender, in that particular way which secures to a frail imperfect race the blessings of a mild government, and secures to the majesty of the Universal Governor all the useful ends of punishment; and builds this scheme of redemption on a history of man and Providence—of man's original corruption, and the various interpositions of Providence for his gradual recovery,—which clears up many perplexing questions concerning the origin of evil, the unequal distribution of present happiness and misery, and the disadvantages on the side of virtue in this constitution of things, which seem inexplicable upon any other principles.

This excellence of the Christian doctrine considered in itself, as without it no external evidence of revelation could be sufficient, so it gives to those who are qualified to perceive it that internal probability to the whole scheme, that the external evidence, in that proportion of it in which it may be supposed to be understood by common men, may be well allowed to complete the proof. This, I am persuaded, is the consideration that chiefly weighs with those who are quite unable to collect and unite for themselves the scattered parts of that multifarious proof which history and prophecy afford.

I would not be understood to disparage the proof of revelation from historical evidence or from prophecy: When I speak of that part of it which lies within the reach of unlettered men as small, I speak of it with reference to its whole. I am satisfied, that whoever is qualified to take a view of but one half, or a much less proportion of the proof of that kind which is now extant in the world, will be overpowered with the force of it. Some there will always be who will profit by this proof, and will be curious to seek after it; and mankind in general will be advantaged by their lights. But of those in any one age of the world who may be capable of receiving the full benefit of this proof, I question whether the number be greater than of those in the apostolic age who were in a situation to receive the benefit of ocular demonstration. And I would endeavour to ascertain what common ground of conviction there may be for all men, of which the ignorant and the learned may equally take advantage; and I took this inquiry, in order to discover wherein that merit of faith consists which may entitle to the blessing pronounced in the text and in various other parts of Scripture; for whatever that may be from which true faith derives the merit, we are undoubtedly to look for it not in any thing peculiar to the faith of the learned, but in the common faith of the plain illiterate believer. Now, the ground of his conviction, that which gives force and vigour to whatever else of the evidence may come within his view, is evidently his sense and consciousness of the excellence of the gospel doctrine. This is an evidence which is felt no doubt in its full force by many a man who can hold no argument about the nature of its certainty—with him who holds the plough or tends the loom, who hath never been sufficiently at leisure from the laborious occupations of necessitous life to speculate upon moral truth and beauty in the abstract; for a quick discernment and a truth of taste in religious subjects proceed not from that subtilty or refinement of the understanding by which men are qualified to figure in the arts of rhetoric and disputation, but from the moral qualities of the heart. A devout and honest mind refers the doctrines and precepts of religion to that exemplar of the good and the fair which it carries about within itself in its own feelings: By their agreement with this, it understands their excellence: Understanding their excellence, it is disposed to embrace them and to obey them; and in this disposition listens with candour to the external evidence. It may seem, that by reducing faith to these feelings as its first principles, we resolve the grounds of our conviction into a previous disposition of the mind to believe the thing propounded,—that is, it may be said, into a prejudice. But this is a mistake: I suppose no favour of the mind for the doctrine propounded but what is founded on a sense and perception of its purity and excellence,—none but what is the consequence of that perception, and in no degree the cause of it. We suppose no previous disposition of the mind, but a general sense and approbation of what is good; which is never called a prejudice but by those who have it not, and by a gross abuse of language. The sense and approbation of what is good is no infirmity, but the perfection of our nature. Of our nature, did I say?—the approbation of what is good, joined with the perfect understanding of it, is the perfection of the Divine.

The reason that the authority of these internal perceptions of moral truth and good is often called in question is this,—that from the great diversity that is found in the opinions of men, and the different judgments that they seem to pass upon the same things, it is too hastily inferred that these original perceptions in various men are various, and cannot therefore be to any the test of universal truth. A Christian, for example, imagines a natural impurity in sensual gratifications; a Mahometan is persuaded that they will make a part of the happiness of the righteous in a future state: The Christian reverences his Bible because it prohibits these indulgences; the Mahometan loves the Koran because it permits them. Whence, it is said, is this diversity of opinion, unless the mind of the Christian perceives those things as impure which the mind of the Mahometan equally perceives as innocent? From these equal but various perceptions they severally infer the probability of their various faiths; and who shall say that the one judges more reasonably than the other, if both judge from perceptions of which they are conscious? Yet they judge differently; both therefore cannot judge aright, unless right judgment may be different from itself. Must it not then be granted, either that these perceptions are uncertain and fallacious,—or, which may seem more reasonable, since no man can have a higher certainty than that which arises from a consciousness of his own feelings, that every man hath his own private standard of moral truth and excellence, purity and turpitude; that right and wrong are nothing in themselves, but are to every man what his particular conscience makes them; and that the universal idea of moral beauty, of which some men have affected to be so vehemently enamoured, and which is set up as the ultimate test of truth in the highest speculations, is a mere fiction of the imagination?

It is not to be wondered that many have been carried away by the fair appearance of this argument, in which nothing seems to be alleged that is open to objection. Nevertheless, the conclusion is false, and the whole reasoning is nothing better than a cheat and a lie; the premises on which it is founded being a false fact, with much art tacitly taken for granted. 'The whole proceeds on this assumption,—that men, in forming their judgments of things, do always refer to the original perceptions of their own minds, that is, to conscience. Deny this, and the diversity of opinions will no longer be a proof of a diversity of original perceptions; from which supposed diversity the fallaciousness of that perception was inferred. And is not this to be denied? Is it not rather the truth, that no man is at all times attentive to these perceptions? that many men never attend to them at all?' that in many they are stifled and overcome,—in some, by education, fashion, or example; in others, by the desperate wickedness of their own hearts? Now, the mind in which this ruin hath been effected hath lost indeed its natural criterion of truth; and judges not by its original feelings, but by opinions taken up at random. Nevertheless, the nature of things is not altered by the disorder of perverted minds; nor is the evidence of things the less to those who perceive them as they are, because there are those who have not that perception. No man the less clearly sees the light, whose own eye is sound, because it is not seen by another who is blind; nor are the distinctions of colour less to all mankind, because a disordered eye confounds them. The same reasoning may be applied to our mental perceptions: The Christian's discernment of the purity of the gospel doctrine is not the less clear—his veneration for it arising from that discernment not the less rational, because a Mahometan may with equal ardour embrace a corrupt system, and may be insensible to the greater beauty of that which he rejects. In a word, every man implicitly trusts his bodily senses concerning external objects placed at a convenient distance; and every man may with as good a reason put even a greater trust in the perceptions of which he is conscious in his own mind; which indeed are nothing else than the first notices of truth and of Himself which the Father of Spirits imparts to subordinate minds, and which are to them the first principles and seeds of intellect.

I have been led into an abstruse disquisition; but I trust that I have shown, and in a manner that plain men may understand, that there is an infallible certainty in our natural sense of moral right and wrong, purity and turpitude; and that I have exposed the base sophistry of that ensnaring argument by which some men would persuade the contrary: Consequently, the internal probability of our most holy religion is justly inferred from the natural sense of the excellence of its doctrines; and a faith built on the view of that probability rests on the most solid foundation. The external evidence which is to complete the proof is much the same to every man at this day as the external evidence of the resurrection was to Thomas upon the report of the other ten apostles; with this difference,—that those wonderful facts of our Saviour's life which Thomas knew by ocular proof we receive from the testimony of others.

The credibility of this testimony it is not difficult for any one to estimate, who considers how improbable it is that the preachers of a righteous doctrine, a pure morality, a strict religion, should themselves be impostors,—how improbable that the apostles and first preachers could be deceived in things which passed before their eyes; and how much credit is naturally due to a number of well-informed men, of unimpeached character, attesting a thing to their own loss and at the hazard of their lives. This is the summary of the external evidence of Christianity as it may appear to men in general—to the most illiterate who have had any thing of a Christian education. The general view of it, joined to the intrinsic probability of the doctrine, may reasonably work that determined conviction which may incline the illiterate believer to turn a deaf ear to objections which the learned only can be competent to examine; and to repose his mind in this persuasion,—that there is no objection to be brought, which if understood, would appear to him sufficient to outweigh the mass of evidence that is before him.

It is to be observed, that all the writers who have attacked the external evidence seem to have taken it for granted that the thing to be proved is in itself improbable. None, I believe, hath been so inconsiderate as to assert, that if the Christian scheme were probable in itself, the evidence we have of it, with all the difficulties they have been able to raise in it, would not be amply sufficient. That they do not perceive the intrinsic probability of Christianity,—those of them, I mean, who discover a due respect for natural religion,—that these do not perceive the intrinsic probability of the doctrines of our religion, I would not willingly impute to any moral depravity of heart: I will rather suppose that they have attended singly to the marvel of the story, and have never taken a near view of the beauty and perfection of the moral and theological system.

From this general state of the principles on which the faith of Christians in these ages may be supposed to rest, when none can have the conviction of ocular proof, it is not difficult to understand what is the peculiar merit of that faith which believes what it hath not seen, whereby it is entitled to our Saviour's blessing. The merit of this faith is not to be placed merely in its consequences, in its effects on the believer's life and actions. It is certain, that faith which hath not these effects is dead: There can be no sincere and salutary faith, where its natural fruit, a virtuous and holy life, is wanting. But faith, if I mistake not, hath, besides, another merit more properly its own, not acquired from its consequences, but conveyed to it from the principles in which it takes its rise. These indeed are what give to every action, much more than its consequences, its proper character and denomination; and the principles in which faith is founded appear to be that integrity, that candour, that sincerity of mind, that love of goodness, that reverent sense of God's perfections, which are in themselves the highest of moral endowments and the sources of all other virtues, if indeed there be any virtue which is not contained in these. Faith therefore, in this view of it, is the full assemblage and sum of all the Christian graces, and less the beginning than the perfection of the Christian character: But if in any instance the force of external evidence should work an unwilling belief where these qualities of the heart are wanting, in the mere act of forced belief there is no merit: "The devils believe and tremble." Hence, we may understand upon what ground and with what equity and reason salvation is promised in Scripture to faith, without the express stipulation of any other condition. Every thing that could be named as a condition of salvation on the gospel plan is included in the principle no less than in the effect of that faith to which the promises are made.

On the other hand, it is easy to perceive that the sentence of condemnation denounced against the unbelieving is not to be applied to the ignorance or the error of the understanding; but to that unbelief which is the proper opposite of the faith which shall inherit the blessing,—that which arises from a dishonest resistance of conviction—from a distaste for moral truth—from an alienation of the mind from God and goodness. This unbelief contains in it all those base and odious qualities which are the opposites of the virtue of which true faith is composed: It must be "nigh unto cursing," inasmuch as in the very essence and formality of its nature it is an accursed thing.

Lest any thing that has been said should seem to derogate from the merit of the apostles' faith, I would observe, that whatever degree of evidence they might have for some part of their belief, in particular for the important fact of our Lord's resurrection, they had ample exercise for it in other points, where the evidence of their sense was not to be procured, or any external evidence that might be equally compulsive, for the whole of their faith. For the great doctrines of the Father's acceptance of Christ's sacrifice of himself—of the efficacy of the Mediatorial intercession—of the ordinary influences of the Holy Spirit—of the resurrection of the body—of the future happiness of the righteous and misery of the wicked—of the future judgment to be administered by Christ,—for these and many other articles, the apostles had not more than the testimony of their senses: It is not therefore to be imagined that they were deficient in that meritorious faith which believeth what it hath not seen; nor is the reproof to Thomas to be extended to the whole of his conduct, but confined to that individual act of incredulity which occasioned it. Thomas, with the rest of the delegated band, set the world a glorious example of an active faith, which they are the happiest who best can imitate: And seeing faith hath been shown to partake in its beginnings of the evidence of consciousness itself, and to hold of those first principles of knowledge and intellect of which it cannot be doubted that they are the immediate gift of God, let us all believe; and let us pray to the Father to shed more and more of the light of his Holy Spirit, and to help our unbelief.

SERMON XVIII.

By JOSEPH WHITE, D.D.

On the Life and Character of Christ.

2 COR. iv. 10.

That the life also of Jesus might be made manifest.

HAVING before viewed the life and character of Mahomet,* let us now turn our eyes to a brighter picture; where every grace that can recommend religion, and every virtue that can adorn humanity, are so blended as to excite our admiration, and engage our love. Independently, indeed, of all comparison, the character of Jesus Christ stands forward as the most striking and illustrious representation of whatever things are true, or just, or of good report; and claims our praise by its own intrinsic excellence.

In the life of our blessed Lord we discover nothing that can either create suspicion, or excite aversion; we see a thousand excellencies which the hardest enemies of the Gospel are compelled involuntarily to approve. All that negative virtue can secure, and all that positive merit can attain, appear to have been united with equal lustre in this lovely and venerable pattern of Christian imitation.

But before I descend to the particulars which it may be necessary to bring forward in contrasting the life of Christ with that of Mahomet, I beg your permission to introduce some interesting, and, I hope, not impertinent reflections on the nature of that historical form in which the Christian revelation has been transmitted to us.

This form involves the correctness of system without its abstruseness, and the energy of eloquence without its ostentation. It happily unites the brightness of example with the precision and perspicuity of precept. To the minuteness of detail which belongs to biography, it adds much of that regular arrangement, and of that vivid colouring, by which the more eminent writers of poetry have endeavoured to mark the distinguishing and appropriate qualities of their favourite heroes. Instead of sometimes amusing and sometimes astonishing us, with those brilliant, but indistinct and fleeting impressions which are excited by general descriptions, or elaborate panegyric, it leads us through a series of uniform and characteristic actions, into a clear and full knowledge of the agent. It enables, and gently impels the mind to combine by its own operation all the detached instances of virtue into one bright assemblage. It transports the imagination, as it were, into the presence of the person whose excellencies are recorded, and gives all the finer sensibilities of the soul an immediate and warm interest in every word and every action. Hence, the manner in which the sacred writers have described the actions of Christ, not only increases the efficacy of his instructions, but constitutes a new, a striking, and peculiar species of evidence for the truth of his religion.

This position it may be of use for us to illustrate yet further.

To compare the character of Socrates with that of Christ is foreign to our present purpose: but of the manner in which their lives have been respectively written, we may properly take some notice. On the history of Socrates then, have been employed the exquisite taste of Xenophon; and the sublime genius of Plato. The virtues of this extraordinary man are selected by them as the noblest subjects for the fullest display and most active exertion of their talents; and they have brought to the task not merely the sagacity of philosophers, but the affection of friends, and the zeal of enthusiasts.

Now the different style of their writings, and the different tempers as well as capacities of the writers themselves, have produced some variety both in the scenes in which they have exhibited their master, and in the opinions which they have ascribed to him. But in the composition of each, Socrates is distinguished by a noble contempt of popular prejudice, and perverted science; by an ardent admiration and steady pursuit of virtue; by an anxious concern for the moral improvement of his hearers; and by an heroic superiority to the pleasures of life, and to the terrors of impending death. What his illustrious biographers have performed in such a manner as to engage the attention and excite the admiration of successive ages, has been accomplished with yet greater success by the sacred writers. They have attained the same end under heavier difficulties, and by the aid of means, which, if they are considered as merely human, must surely be deemed inadequate to the task which they undertook. They were by no means distinguished by literary attainments, or by intellectual powers. Their education could not bestow on them very exalted or correct ideas of morality; and their writings were destitute of every recommendation from the artificial ornaments of style. Yet have these four unlearned men effected by their artless simplicity a work, to which the talents of the two greatest writers of antiquity were not more than equal.

They have exhibited a character far more lovely in itself, and far more venerable, than fiction has ever painted; and in their mode of exhibiting it, they surpass the fidelity, the distinctness, and precision, which two of the most celebrated writers have been able to preserve, when exerting the whole powers of their genius, and actuated by the fondest attachment, they were endeavouring to do justice to the noblest pattern of real virtue of which antiquity can boast. In Jesus have the Evangelists described brighter and more numerous virtues, than Socrates is said even by his professed admirers to have possessed. In their descriptions they have without effort, and under the influence, it must be allowed, of sincere conviction only, maintained a greater uniformity than the most prejudiced reader can discover in the beautiful compositions of Plato and Xenophon.

If the desire of communicating their own favourite opinions, or the mutual jealousy of literary fame, be assigned as a reason for the diversity of representation in the two Greek writers, we allow the probability of both suppositions: but we contend, that each of these motives is inconsistent with that love of truth, which is necessary to establish the credibility of a biographer. We also contend, that the Evangelists were really possessed of this excellent quality; that they never deviated from it, in order to indulge their enmity or envy; and that with apparent marks of difference in their language, their dispositions, and perhaps in their abilities, they have yet exhibited the character of Christ the most striking, if their narratives be separately considered; and the most consistent, if they be compared with each other. Be it observed too, that the difficulty of preserving that consistence increases both with the peculiarity and magnitude of the excellencies described, and with the number of the persons who undertake the office of describing them.

If it be said, that the superior pretensions of Christ, as a divine teacher, required more splendid virtues than what are expected from Socrates, who taught morality upon principles of human reason only; whence is it that the unpolished, uncultivated minds of the Evangelists should even conceive a more magnificent character than the imaginations of a Plato, or a Xenophon? What aids did they apparently possess for representing it more advantageously? That those four unlettered men should have drawn such a character, with more uniformity in the whole, and with more sublimity in the parts, is therefore a fact which can be accounted for only, by admitting the constant and immediate guidance of the Holy Spirit, the real existence of Christ's perfections, and the strong and lasting impression they made upon those who conversed with him. Those perfections themselves were, indeed, extraordinary both in kind and in degree. In their kind they are admirable for the conduct of Christ's followers: and in their degree, they are eminently and indisputably proportioned to the transcendent and unrivalled dignity of his own mission.

Every reader of discernment is disgusted at the fictitious representation of "those faultless monsters which the world ne'er saw:" every writer of taste finds it necessary to procure credit to his representations, by throwing some shades of error and infirmity over the wisest and best of men; every impartial and profound enquirer into the constitution of the human mind is aware that the ruling passion, by which the most amiable and venerable of men are distinguished, sometimes degenerates into excess; that the indiscriminate and eager pursuit of virtue itself imperceptibly leads into vice; that the most illustrious characters are distinguished by some predominant excellence; that he who surpasses his fellow-creatures in some instances, falls below them in others; and that, among the sons of men, no one has yet existed, in whom every great and good quality, every religious and social perfection, have been at once united.

To these incontrovertible and general rules, the life of Christ affords one glorious exception. There is a variety in his virtues, which never shocks probability; and at the same time there is an uniformity, which never creates satiety. Upon the most common actions he bestows a novelty in his manner of performing them: the uncommon he recommends by a simplicity, which adds to their charms, without degrading their dignity.

Here, indeed, it becomes me to observe, that in all his actions he, without any appearance of design, preserves that decorum which the ancient philosophers have explained with so much ingenuity, and which is utterly beyond the reach of affectation or imposture. In abstaining from licentious pleasures he was equally free from ostentatious singularity, and churlish sullenness. In partaking, as he sometimes did, the innocent enjoyments of life, he never fell into the gaiety of the Epicurean; in relinquishing them, when the great ends of his mission required it, he was equally free from the assumed and unnatural insensibility of the Stoic. When he complied with the established ceremonies of his countrymen, that compliance was not accompanied by any marks of bigotry or superstition: when he opposed their rooted prepossessions, his opposition was perfectly exempt from the captious petulance of a controversialist, and the undistinguishing zeal of an innovator.

It is well known, that some virtues owe much of their lustre to local and temporary circumstances; and that the same actions which may be highly, nay even justly, extolled in one age or country, are in others surveyed with listless indifference. "In antiquity," says an acute observer*, "the heroes of philosophy, as well as those of war and patriotism, have a grandeur and force of sentiment which astonishes our narrow souls, and is rashly considered as extravagant and supernatural. They, in their turn, I allow, would have equal reason to consider as romantic and incredible the degree of humanity, clemency, order, tranquillity, and other social virtues, to which in the administration of government we have attained in modern times, had any one been then alive to have made a fair representation of them."

The life of Christ blends these opposite and seemingly irreconcilable excellencies. It avoids their extravagance, and supplies their defects. The courage of our Lord was active in encountering the dangers to which he was exposed, and passive under the aggravated calamities which the malice of his foes heaped upon him. Yet his fortitude was remote from every appearance of rashness; and his patience was equally exempt from abject pusillanimity and stupid apathy.

* Hume's Essays.

He was firm without obstinacy, and humble without meanness. In the general tenor of his life he was mild and gentle; the promoter of peace amongst other men, and the strictest observer of it in his own behaviour. But when great and real occasions called for different deportment, he displayed a nobleness of mind, a contempt of danger and death, such as the importance of his mission required from him, and such as the consciousness of rectitude could alone inspire.

To the virtues of Christ, whether we consider them as too sublime to excite any sentiments of presumptuous emulation, or too rational not to justify our endeavours to imitate them; whether we examine his private or his public conduct; may in a nobler sense be applied the beautiful and animated language, in which a celebrated orator of antiquity has extolled those arts, by which he was himself distinguished. "Adolescentiam alunt, senectutem oblectant, secundas, res ornant, adversis perfrugium ac solatium præbent, delectant domi, non impediunt foris, pernoctant nobiscum, peregrinantur, rusticantur."

Those virtues, indeed, will in no age and no country lose either their usefulness, their beauty, or their merit. They are in various degrees practicable; under every form of government, whether free or despotic, whether barbarous or refined; and in every state of knowledge, whether it be imperfect or improved. In the lowest condition of the world, they tend to lessen the miseries and disorders to which the unsearchable providence of God has subjected our species: they will increase the stock of our happiness, and axal our nature to the highest perfection, when accompanied by every assistance which reason, which philosophy, and civilization, can bestow in forming the moral or the religious character of man.

These observations will, I trust, both elucidate and justify the biographical form in which Revelation is conveyed to us. God, it is true, might have made known to us his will, by a series of laws, by abstract reasonings, by short instructive sentences, by copious and regular systems, or by any of the various modes of human composition. But Christianity aims at a nobler end, and pursues it by the most proper and efficacious methods. We read, indeed, the opinions and the belief of Socrates, and the commands and promises of Mahomet. But by Jesus Christ, virtue, of every kind and in every degree, is exemplified as well as taught. He is the pattern as well as the teacher of the duties we are to perform. His precepts shew us what we ought to practise; his conduct convinces us that it is practicable; and the rewards which he has offered are powerful incentives to us to practise it from the best motives, and in the best manner. His resurrection from the grave confirms our faith; his ascension to glory animates our hopes; the actions of his life, and the circumstances of his death, enlarge and invigorate our charity. By these means all the parts of Christianity form one great and consistent whole: every moral rule is realized, and becomes a proof of religious truth; whilst every religious truth, in its turn, illustrates and enforces every moral rule. The actions of God himself are, indeed, invisible; those of men are imperfect; but the actions of Christ (considered in his human character) are both visible and perfect: they are level to our apprehensions, and most worthy of our imitation.

Religion is thus made intelligible to all, because all are bound to obey it. It is accompanied by a species of demonstration, which the meanest cannot misunderstand; it is recommended by such an instance of its beauty and its usefulness, as is calculated to remove every scruple, and to silence every objection.

To evince the justness of these general observations, I shall now enter more particularly upon that comparison between the character of Christ and that of Mahomet, to which I am led by the subject of these Lectures.

The situation and manners of the Jews at the time when our Lord entered upon his public ministry, and the opposition to the gospel, to which they gave birth, have already been the subject of our consideration. We have seen, that of the many false and mistaken notions which then prevailed among that blind and deluded people, the expectations of a temporal Messiah was the most extensive and most important. Impatient under the galling yoke of servitude, and blindly attached to an opinion, which was at once supported by national pride, and in appearance founded on the literal and express authority of divine revelation; the people in general, and the vulgar in particular, were eager to admit, and zealous to defend, the claims of every pretender to this splendid character. The peculiar nature and wide-spread influence of this prejudice offered the most favourable opportunity, and presented the fairest prospect of temporal authority and dominion, which could have been desired by the most sanguine and ambitious impostor. But of this opportunity no advantage was taken by Jesus Christ. The plan which he pursued was in every respect the reverse of what an interested deceiver would have concerted, whose hopes of success were founded only in the machinations of human policy.

His first public appearance was in the highest degree unpopular, and opposed to all the prejudices and all the pride of his countrymen. Instead of alluring them by the prospect of temporal dominion, to which their hopes and expectations universally pointed, he proclaimed the commencement of a spiritual and invisible kingdom, little calculated to attract the attention of a people, who had never been accustomed to raise their views beyond the objects of sense; and totally inconsistent with every opinion which had been transmitted to them by tradition, and sanctified among them by authority. Instead of erecting his victorious standard as the glorious redeemer of Israel, their mighty deliverer from the disgraceful bondage of Roman oppression, and from the power of every earthly foe; he offered them a redemption, more beneficial indeed, though less attractive to the sensual mind; a redemption from the dreadful tyranny of death. He invited them to a deliverance greater in itself, though less consonant to their wishes, than exemption from servitude to the Roman power; a deliverance from the yet severer and more ignominious slavery of sin.

Had interest, or ambition, been the guide of his actions, he would certainly have assumed that character, to which the warmest hopes and the most rooted prepossessions of the Jews universally inclined. He would not have opposed alike the pride of princes, and the superstition of the people; he would have either courted popularity, or grasped at dominion; he, at least, would not have taken every measure, that had a natural tendency to alarm the jealousy of the magistrate, and to provoke the displeasure of the multitude.

As ambition had no share in his claims, as his kingdom was neither formed on the policy, nor supported by the power of the world, he sought not its favour, nor shrunk from its displeasure. Instead of labouring to increase the number of his followers, by an insinuating flexibility in his own manners, or by a corrupt compliance with their prejudices, he gave offence by the unaffected plainness of the one, and by an undisguised opposition to the other. He disdained to conciliate the affections of any class of men, however dignified by their station, or formidable for their power, by any base or dishonourable concessions: he did not endeavour to win even their assent by a servile or a treacherous accommodation of his doctrines to their follies, or their vices. At the same time he opposed those vices, not with the indiscriminate rage of a blind enthusiast, but with the steady resolution of a wise and upright mind, that mixed zeal with knowledge, and added conviction to authority. Even by the confession of his enemies, he was true, and taught the way of God in truth, neither cared he for any man: for he regarded not the persons of men. (Matt. xxii. 16.)

A conduct like this was utterly inconsistent with the intricate wiles of policy, or the aspiring views of ambition. Far from engaging in the pursuit of secular power and authority, the blessed Jesus repeatedly and peremptorily rejected them when offered to his hands. He disclaimed the office of a ruler or a judge; he even fled from the infatuated multitude, who acknowledged him for their king, and would have exalted him to a throne.

The impostor of Arabia seized the sceptre, before it was offered to him; the dictator of Rome rejected a crown, which it was both unsafe and dishonourable for him to wear; and was conscious, that he had already obtained the solid power of monarchy, while he reluctantly, though ostentatiously, refused its gaudy appendages. But far different was the conduct of Jesus Christ. He declined as well the reality of dominion which Cæsar possessed, as the appearance of it which Mahomet assumed. He declined them, at a time when by accepting them he might have gratified the pride of his countrymen, subdued all the prejudices which obstructed the belief of his mission, and averted many of the dangers which threatened his life.

Those mistaken views of temporal grandeur, which the disciples had indulged, their Master industriously corrected; he sought on every occasion to humble their pride, to draw off their attention from the things of this world, and to fix them on those above.

Men, who set no value on any interests but those which were connected with honour, wealth, and pleasure, contemned the humility of his appearance, and derided the plainness of his preaching. Their pride disdained all association with a person ignobly born, who pursued no measures to exalt himself above the common rank of life. Hence, with an immediate view to that humble appearance which he condescended to assume on earth, the prophet Isaiah thus beautifully delineates his character. He shall grow up as a tender plant, and as a root out of a dry ground: he hath no form nor comeliness; and when we shall see him, there is no beauty that we should desire him. He is despised and rejected of men, a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief; and we hid as it were our faces from him. He was despised, and we esteemed him not. (Isaiah liii. 2, 3.)

Even his numerous and stupendous miracles were not wrought through ostentation, or with any view to serve the purposes of human glory. On the contrary, they were acts of the purest and most disinterested benevolence. They have a kind of ethical excellence, a close and striking conformity to the peculiar temper, as well as the distinguishing and important mission of him, by whom they were performed.

He often enjoined the strictest secrecy to those who were spectators of these mighty works; lest he should appear to affect more than to deserve the high character he sustained. Go thy way, tell no man, (Matt. viii. 4. Mark viii. 26. Luke viii. 56.) was his frequent command to those whom he had rescued from the sharp anguish of disease, the gloomy horrors of blindness, or the agonizing distractions of demoniac phrenzy.

From a similar principle arose his condescension in admitting little children to his arms, in blessing them, and recommending them to the protection of his heavenly Father, and to the tender affection of his disciples. From the same principle, he vouchsafed to wash his disciples' feet; and by so amiable an instance of humility inculcated this gracious lesson, that no office of benevolent assistance should be thought contemptible, or unworthy even the dignity of the most exalted character, if thereby a friend may be relieved in pain, or a fellow-creature extricated from distress.

Now if his humility had been only affected, in order to cover designs of which ambition was the hidden motive, there would have been some unguarded moment when the mask would have dropped off. But the whole life of our blessed Lord, in all its vicissitudes, is marked by the same calm indifference to worldly honours, the same manly disregard of popular applause, the same exemption from the impatience of desire when pre-eminence was offered to him, and from the anguish of disappointment when it was refused.

As the conduct of Christ was not actuated by ambition, so neither was it influenced by any other base and inordinate passion. He did not make his doctrine subservient to the gratification of any darling lusts and corrupt affections in himself, or his disciples; on the contrary, he constantly enjoined the practice of the purest, the strictest, and the most refined chastity; not only in outward actions, but even in the inward imaginations of the heart. He boasted of no exclusive privileges, nor claimed any invidious exceptions from the laws which he had prescribed to others. He allowed no licentiousness under the pretence of religion; and transgressed no rules of decency or of rectitude, under the arrogated sanction of the Divinity.

Though possessed of the most unbounded power, we behold him living continually in a state of voluntary humiliation and poverty; we see him daily exposed to almost every species of want and distress; afflicted without a comforter, persecuted without a protector, and wandering about, according to his own pathetic complaint, because he had not where to lay his head.

Though regardless of the pleasures, and sometimes destitute of the comforts, of life, he never provokes our disgust, by the sourness of the misanthrope; or our contempt, by the inactivity of the recluse. He never affected gloomy austerity; nor sought to be sequestered from the world, in order to preserve the spirituality of his mind. But his ministry was professedly, and really, destined to active employment; and engaged in promoting the noblest interests of mankind. He therefore freely mixed with them in all the habits of social intercourse: and in those moments, when all the avenues of the heart are open to gaiety and affection, he silently instructed his companions in the rare, but exquisite art of being cheerful without levity, and of uniting solid improvement with harmless entertainment. Socrates conversed familiarly with the impious and the licentious, for the sake of correcting more effectually their errors, and restraining their vices; but his reasonings are sometimes unnecessarily abstruse, sometimes paradoxical, and very often indecisive: and in his behaviour instances may be found where his gaiety degenerates into buffoonery, and his irony into bitter and indecent sarcasm. Jesus deigned to associate with publicans and sinners: but he always preserved an exact decorum in word and deed; and even in his most familiar conversations he steadily kept in view the momentous end for which he came into the world.

His attention to their welfare was evidenced not only by his salutary injunctions, which breathed the full and genuine spirit of compassion and love; But by his readiness to embrace every opportunity of relieving their distresses, and administering to their wants. He was, therefore, in a literal as well as a metaphorical sense, eyes to the blind; feet was he to the lame; and the blessings of them that were ready to perish came upon him. (Job xxix. 15, 13.) In every period and circumstance of his life we thus behold dignity and elevation blended with love and pity: something, which, though it awakens our admiration, yet attracts our confidence. We see power; but it is a power which is rather our security than our dread; a power softened by tenderness, and soothing, while it awes.

And yet, with all the gentleness of a meek and lowly mind, we behold an heroic firmness, which no terrors could shake, and no opposition could restrain. This union of opposite qualities constitutes, indeed, the distinguishing beauty of his character. It presents us, as it were, with the lights and shades, which, mixed in due proportion, contribute to the finishing of the picture. Had his actions been governed only by the soft and yielding influences of gentleness and compassion, he never could have completed a work, which called for the most determined efforts of active zeal and fortitude. Besides this deficiency in point of positive exertion, his conduct, if wholly guided by the gentler principles of the human heart, would have subjected him to the suspicion of a blind and irrational impulse: it would have been imputed to a complexional felicity of temper, a mere instinctive benevolence; which, having no moral motive, could be entitled to no praise; and which, being destitute of a steady principle, would prove of little benefit to mankind. The conduct of our blessed Lord was, therefore, guided by reason as well as by affection; and was distinguished as much by an heroic zeal for the truth, and an unrelenting opposition to the errors and wickedness of the times, as by the gentler qualities of meekness, compassion, and forbearance.

That the character sustained by our Lord was not assumed, that he was in reality and truth what he appeared to be, is evident from the perfect consistency of his conduct.

In the exemplary uniformity of Cato's behaviour, we see the cause of that splendid panegyric which the historian has bestowed on him : “ * Esse, quam videri, bonus malebat. ” Now on this very principle we assert the sincerity of Christ ; because, in every period of his history we find that he never swerves from moral rectitude, nor sinks below the dignity of his religious character. In the private scenes of life, and in the public occupations of his ministry : whether the object of admiration or of ridicule, of love or of persecution ; whether, welcomed with hosannas, or insulted with anathemas ; we still see him pursuing with unwearied constancy the same end, and preserving the same integrity of life and manners.

To exemplify these extraordinary qualities and virtues in the actions of that life which they adorned, is a task from which I retire with awful diffidence.

Some of the brightest characters which poetry has feigned, or history has recorded, become more pleasing and more interesting to us from the contrast of their weaknesses and excellencies in different situations, or from the mixture of both in the same action. But the life of Christ has none of those inequalities, which it is the delight of the orator to paint, and of the philosopher to analyze. The natural and unaffected deportment which he invariably preserved, without painful exertion, and without insidious design ; the consistence between each particular action and each particular situation ; the conformity of all his actions to one common rule, the word of God ; and their tendency to one common end, the salvation of mankind ; may be explored by the profound moralist, must be admired by the pious believer, but cannot be described, surely, without a portion of that matchless simplicity, with which they are recorded by the inspired evangelists. Too plain for ornament, and too grand for illustration, the character of Jesus leaves at a distance the powers of language. Surrounded with the meanest circumstances, and at the same time distinguished by the most important and astonishing events, it seems to baffle equally by its humility, and its majesty, all the feeble efforts of human eloquence.

The birth of our Saviour, placed in the lowest scene of poverty, was first announced to the shepherds, watching their flocks : but the message was brought by an angel, and a multitude of the heavenly host. Though he was laid in a manger in despised Bethlehem, the Magi of the East were conducted by a star to visit the humble spot. Sprung, as he was, from the meanest origin, and educated in the meanest occupation ; yet to him was committed the care of immortal souls, and the salvation of a corrupt and deluded world. His associates he had called from the poorest and most ignorant of the people : them, however, did he commission to publish the doctrines of faith ; and on them the Holy Ghost descended. Though a friendless wanderer, in his own country, an exile and an outcast, he was distinguished whithersoever he went by signs and miracles. Even in his last hour, when he was numbered with malefactors on the cross ; the darkness which overspread the land, the rending of rocks, the opening of graves, and all the convulsions, as it were, of sympathizing nature, gave tokens of the Son of God.

Considered then in all its circumstances, the history of Christ shrinks not from comparison with the most partial and lofty representation of the prophet of Arabia.

Of both we find, that the earlier part of life, before the publication of their respective missions, passed away in silence, private and undistinguished. The first years of Mahomet were busied in the cares of merchandize ; till returning to his native city, he devoted to solitude and retirement the leisure which his opulence had procured. The youth of Jesus was spent in domestic privacy, and was remarkable only for affectionate and dutiful submission to his parents ; unless indeed, when in the temple he by his ready answers to the questions of the Rabbins, and his skilful exposition of the scriptures, astonished those that heard him, and gave an omen of his future greatness.

The designs of Mahomet were gradually and cautiously unfolded ; and in order to prepare the minds of his countrymen for the reception of his faith, he first artfully persuaded his own relations and domestics, and drew to his side the most powerful of his neighbours.

Jesus walked forth by the sea of Galilee, and saw fishers casting their nets. These were his first converts and disciples. Though they were destitute of riches and of power, he found in them what his ministry required, an honest and a willing spirit. He won them neither by subtle arguments, nor crafty persuasions; but bade them forsake their nets and follow him, to see his humble dwelling, to hear his heavenly discourses to the people, and witness the wonders he was going to perform.

Jesus called his hearers to repentance, but Mahomet to conquest.

At their first appearance they were both compelled to avoid the rage of the multitude, who would have destroyed them: but Mahomet escaped by a secret, ignominious flight, and Jesus by a public miracle.

The revelation of the Arabian prophet was inconsistent; a system of contradiction, continually shifting with the views of his policy, and the necessities of his imposture; now looking towards Mecca, and now to Jerusalem. Widely different was the conduct of Christ. He did not seek to accommodate his doctrine to fortuitous changes in his external circumstances; he did not at one time revoke what he had asserted, or contradict what he had enjoined, at another. Every part of his teaching was regular and consistent in the objects to which it was directed, and the language in which it was conveyed.

Mahomet allured his followers with the glories of a visible monarchy, and the splendor of temporal dominion. In him we behold the lord of war, and the destroyer of mankind, riding in triumph over the spoils of thousands who fell by his desolating sword; laying cities in flames; carrying misery and bloodshed through the earth; and pursued in his victorious career by the lamentations and curses of its inhabitants. In Jesus we see the adorable prince of peace, the friend and saviour of the world, riding meekly to the holy city, hailed with the acclamations and blessings of much people, whom he had rescued from sin and death, wiping the tears from all eyes, and healing every sickness and every disease.

And here the comparison must cease. The events that followed in our Saviour's life are too august to be placed in competition with any mortal power, and can be comprehended only by minds habituated to the contemplation of heavenly objects. Let us consider the passion of our Lord, and the magnificent scenes of his resurrection and ascension; and then ask, in what part of all the history of Mahometism any parallel of resemblance can be found? Let us consider the last days of Christ's continuance upon earth, and how does the prophet of Mecca sink in the comparison! Let us in imagination hear and see the blessed Jesus, when he gives his Apostles authority to go forth and baptize all nations, and preach in his name repentance and remission of sins; when he empowers them to cast out evil spirits, to speak with new tongues, and to work wonders; when he holds up to them the promise of the Comforter, and power from on high; and when, having blessed them, he ascends into heaven, where he is for ever seated in glory on the right hand of God.

But chiefly, what raises Christ and his religion far above all the fictions of Mahomet, is that awful alternative of hopes and fears, that looking for of judgment, which our Christian faith sets before us.

And at that day, when time, the great arbiter of truth and falsehood, shall bring to pass the accomplishment of the ages, and the Son of God shall make his enemies his footstool; then shall the deluded followers of the great impostor, disappointed of the expected intercession of their prophet, stand trembling and dismayed at the approach of the glorified Messiah.

Then shall they say, Yonder cometh in the clouds that Jesus, whose religion we laboured to destroy, whose temples we profaned, whose servants and followers we cruelly oppressed! Behold he cometh: but no longer the humble son of Mary, no longer a mere mortal prophet, the equal of Abraham and of Moses, as that deceiver taught us; but the everlasting Son of the everlasting Father! The Judge of mankind! The Sovereign of Angels! The Lord of all things both in earth and heaven!

SERMON XIX.

By BISHOP PORTEUS.

On the Causes of Unbelief.

JOHN iii. 19.

This is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil.

WHEN the several parts of the text are reduced to their proper order; they give us the four following distinct propositions.

That light is come into the world.

That men have preferred darkness to this light.

That the reason is because their deeds are evil.

And that the consequence of this choice will be condemnation.

It may be worth our while to bestow a little consideration on each of these particulars.

In this enlightened age, it will be thought no paradox to assert that light is come into the world. The position is true in more senses than one; but there is only one that can suit this passage. The light here meant can be no other than that divine one of revelation, which brought life and immortality (2 Tim. i. 10.) along with it. The Christian dispensation is constantly and uniformly described in holy writ under this figure, from the time that the first faint glimmerings of it appeared at a distance, till it shone forth in its full lustre and glory under the gospel. Indeed there seems to be scarce any other image, that could so fitly and adequately represent it to us. It is of the same use to the spiritual, that the light of the sun is to the natural world. It gives life, health, and vigour, to God's new creation; it makes the day of salvation (2 Cor. vi. 2.) to dawn upon us; it opens to us the prospect of another and a better life; it is a light to our feet, and a lantern to our paths (Psal. cxix. 105.), and guides us in the way to happiness and glory.

The next assertion contained in the text, that men have preferred darkness to this light, may seem to require a proof.

To love darkness rather than light is so opposite to our nature, so inconsistent with our general manner of proceeding, that it seems at first incredible. If it really is the case, so perverse a choice was never made but in religion. Every other kind of light men catch at with the utmost eagerness. The light of the heavens has been ever esteemed one of the greatest blessings that Providence has bestowed upon us, without which, even life itself would be hardly thought worth possessing. The love of knowledge, that light of the mind, appears in us as early, and operates in us as strongly, as any one principle in our nature; and in every instance, the human understanding naturally lays hold on every opportunity of information, and opens itself on every side to let in all the light it is capable of receiving.

How then comes it to pass, that with a mind thus constituted, thus thirsting after light, men can sometimes bring themselves to do such violence to their nature, as to chuse darkness, in that very point where it is of the utmost importance to have all the light they can possibly get; where every step must lead to happiness or misery, and every error draw after it the most fatal and lasting consequences? Yet our Saviour tells us, that this was actually the case in his days, and would to God that daily experience did not show the possibility of it in our own! But when we see the various artifices with which revelation is every day assailed; when we see one man most ingeniously reasoning us out of every ground of certainty, and every criterion of truth; involving self-evident axioms in obscurity and confusion; and entangling our understandings in the gloomy intricacies of scholastic subtilty and metaphysical abstraction: when we see another exhausting all the powers of a most fertile genius, in ridiculing the dispensations of the God that gave it; making the most awful subjects of religion the constant sport of his licentious wit; and continuing to sit with unabated levity in the seat of the scorner, even on the very brink of the grave: when we see a third, with the strongest professions of sincerity and good faith, proposing most humbly what he calls his doubts and scruples, and thereby creating them in the minds of others; extolling one part of Christianity in order to subvert the rest; retaining its moral precepts, but rejecting its miracles and all its characteristic doctrines; giving an air of speciousness to the wildest singularities, by the most exquisite graces of composition, and insidiously undermining the foundations of the Gospel, while he pretends to defend it: when I say our adversaries assume such different shapes, and set so many engines at work against us; what else can this mean but to take from us all the sources of religious information, and bring us back again to the darkness and ignorance of our Pagan ancestors? It is to no purpose to tell us here of the light of nature. It is an affront to our senses, to offer us that dim taper, in the room of the sun of righteousness. (Mal. iv. 2.) Whatever may be said (and a great deal has been said) of the modern improvements of science, the discoveries of philosophy, and the sagacity of human reason, it is to Revelation only we are indebted for the superior light we now boast of in religion. If nature could ever have pointed out to us right principles of belief, and rules of conduct, she might have done it long ago; she had four thousand years to do it in before the coming of Christ. But what little progress was made in this vast space of time; what egregious mistakes were committed, not only in the speculative doctrines of religion, but in some of the most essential points of practical morality, I need not remind you. How comes it then to pass, that this blind guide is at last become so quick-sighted? How comes her eye on a sudden so strong and clear, as to see into the perfections and will of God, to penetrate into the dark regions of futurity, to take in at one view the whole compass of our duty, and the whole extent of our existence? It is plain some friendly hand must have removed the film from her eyes; and what other hand could this be than that gracious beneficent one, which gave eyes to the blind, and feet to the lame; which helped the impotence, and healed the infirmity of nature, in every instance, in none more than in this? It is in short from the sacred sources of the Gospel, that reason drew that light she now enjoys. Let then men walk, if they will be so perverse, by this lesser light, (Gen.

i. 16.), which was only intended to rule the night (ib.) of heathenism; but let them be so honest as to confess that it is only a borrowed, a reflected light; that it owes much the greatest part of its present lustre to that greater, that better light of the gospel, whose province it is to govern the day (Gen. i. 16.), and to lighten every man that cometh into the world. (John i. 9.)

Let us however suppose for a moment (what can never be proved) that mankind are now much better able to investigate truth, and to find out their duty by themselves, than they were in former ages; and that reason can give us (the utmost it ever did or can pretend to give) a perfect system of morality. But what will this avail us, unless it could be shewn that man is also perfect and uncorrupt? A religion that contained nothing more than a perfect system of morality, might perhaps suit an angel; but it is only one part, it is only a subordinate part, of the religion of a man and a sinner. It would be but very poor consolation to a criminal going to execution, to put into his hands a complete collection of the laws of his country, when the poor wretch perhaps expected a reprieve. It could serve no other purpose than to embitter his agonies, and make him see more clearly the justice of his condemnation. If you chuse to do the unhappy man a real service, and to give him any substantial comfort, you must assure him that the offence for which he was going to die was forgiven him; that his sentence was reversed; that he would not only be restored to his prince's favour, but put in a way of preserving it for the future; and that if his conduct afterwards was honest and upright, he should be deemed capable of enjoying the highest honours in his master's kingdom. But no one could tell him this, or at least he would credit no one that did; except he was commissioned and authorized by the prince himself, to tell him so. He might study the laws in his hands till the very moment of his execution, without ever finding out from them that he should obtain a pardon.

Such, the scriptures inform us, was the state of man before Christ came into the world. He had fallen from his original innocence. He was a rebel against God, and obnoxious to his wrath. The sentence of death had passed upon him, and he had no plea to offer to arrest the execution of it. Reason, you say, gives him a perfect rule to walk by. But he has already transgressed this rule; and if even this transgression were cancelled, yet if left to himself, he may transgress it again the next moment. He is uneasy under his sentence, he wants forgiveness for the past, assistance for the future; and till you can give him this, it is an insult upon his misery to talk to him of a perfect rule of action. If this be all that reason can give him (and it is really much more than it can give him) he must necessarily have recourse to Revelation. God only knows, and God only can tell, whether he will forgive, and upon what terms he will forgive the offences done against him: what mode of worship he requires; what helps he will afford us; and what condition he will place us in hereafter. All this God actually has told us in the Gospel. It was to tell us this, He sent his Son into the world, whose mission was confirmed by the highest authority, by signs from Heaven, and miracles on earth; whose life and doctrine are delivered down to us by the most unexceptionable witnesses, who sealed their testimony with their blood; who were too curious and incredulous to be themselves imposed upon, too honest and sincere, too plain and artless, to impose upon others.

What then can be the reason that men still refuse to see, and persist in loving darkness rather than light? They will tell you perhaps, that it is because the Gospel is full of incredible mysteries; but our Saviour tells you, and he tells you much truer, that it is because their deeds are evil. The mysteries and difficulties of the Gospel can be no real objection to any man that considers what mysteries occur, and what insuperable objections may be started, in almost every branch of human knowledge; how often we are obliged, in our most important temporal concerns, to decide and to act upon evidence, incumbered with far greater difficulties than any that are to be found in scripture. If we can admit no religion that is not free from mystery, we must, I doubt, be content without any religion at all. Even the religion of nature itself the whole constitution both of the ~~natural~~ and the moral world, is full of mystery; and the greatest mystery of all would be, if, with so many irresistible marks of truth, Christianity should at last prove false. It is not then because the Gospel has too little light for these men that they reject it, but because it has too much. For every one that doth evil hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds should be reproved. (John iii. 20.) The light of the Gospel is too prying and inquisitive for such an one. It reveals certain things which he could wish to conceal from all the world, and if possible from himself. Nor is this all; it not only reveals, but it reproves them. It strikes him with an evidence he cannot bear; an evidence not only of its own truth, but of his unworthy conduct. The Gospel does indeed offend him; but it is not his understanding, it is his conscience, that is shocked; he could easily credit what it requires him to believe; but he cannot, or rather he will not, practise what it commands him to do.

It is plain that such a man cannot possibly admit a Revelation that condemns him; and it is as plain that the man of virtue cannot spurn the hand that is graciously stretched out to reward him. If he is a truly virtuous man, that is, one who sincerely labours to know his duty, and sincerely intends to perform it, he cannot but wish for more light to guide him in the investigation, more assistance to support him in the discharge of it, more happiness to crown his perseverance in it, than bare reason alone can afford him. This is what all the best and wisest Heathens most ardently desired, what nature has been continually looking out for with the utmost earnestness of expectation. When with a mind thus disposed he sits down to examine the Gospel, suggest to me the least shadow of a reason why he should reject it. He finds in it a religion, pure, holy, and benevolent, as the God that gave it. He finds not only its moral precepts, but even its sublimest mysteries, calculated to promote internal sanctity, vital piety, universal philanthropy. He finds it throughout so great and noble, so congenial to the finest feelings, and most generous sentiments of his soul; that he cannot but wish it may be true; and never yet, I believe, did any good man wish it to be true, but he actually found it so. He sees in it every expectation of nature answered, every infirmity supported, every want supplied, every terror dissipated, every hope confirmed; nay, he sees that God has done exceeding abundantly above all that he could either ask or think; that he has given him (what reason could hardly have the idea of) eternal happiness in a life to come. Will this man love darkness rather than that light? Will he chuse to pursue virtue with much pains, little success, and no other wages than death; or to be led to her through a safe and easy path by an infallible guide, who does not desire him to serve God for nought.

Let me not however be understood to assert, or to represent the text as asserting, that all unbelievers are without exception absolutely wicked men. There are some, no doubt, who lead, what is called, good moral lives. Yet, if you examine even these very strictly, you will, I believe, seldom find that their virtue is so pure, so uniform, so extensive, so complete in all the several branches of duty, as that of a truly devout Christian. And it should be observed also, that men may reject the Gospel, not only because they are dissolute in their conduct, but for various other reasons: because, perhaps, they are too busy, or too idle, to examine carefully into the truth; because, like Gallo, they care for none of these things, and like him, drive them away, with contempt from the judgment seat (Acts xviii. 16.) of their own mind; because they give themselves up to a warm lively imagination; and are impatient to shew that they have more depth of thought, more freedom of spirit, and elevation of mind, than the rest of the world; because, in fine, they are ambitious to figure at the head of a sect, to enjoy the delightful triumph of beating down long-established opinions, and erecting upon their ruins a little favorite system of their own. Now all these causes of infidelity, though less culpable than downright profligacy, are yet evidently great faults, and indicate more or less a depraved turn of mind; and from immoralities of this kind at least scarce any sceptics are entirely free. Or, admit that some are; yet these instances are confessedly very rare; and a prudent man would no more chuse to embark his morality on so precarious a bottom, than he would venture to walk in the dark amidst rocks and precipices, because some perhaps have done it without receiving any harm. In general, therefore, the ground of unbelief laid down by our Saviour in the text, is undoubtedly a true one; and if a man shuns the light, it is an almost certain sign that his deeds are, in some sense or other, in a greater or a less degree, evil, and consequently his condemnation just.

Yet how can this be, you will perhaps say? Can God punish his creatures for walking by that light which he himself has set up in their own minds, though he has at the same time perhaps revealed a fuller light from Heaven? Most certainly he can; for the very same reason that a prince might punish his subjects for acting by the law of nature; instead of governing themselves by the civil laws of the land. It is not a matter of indifference, whether you embrace Christianity or not. Though reason could answer all the purposes of Revelation, (which is far, very far from being the case), yet you are not at liberty to make it your sole guide, if there be such a thing as a true Revelation. We are the subjects of the Almighty; and whether we will acknowledge it or not, we live, and cannot but live, under his government. His will is the law of his kingdom. If he has made no express declaration of his will, we must collect it as well as we can from what we know of his nature and our own. But if he has expressly declared his will, that is the law we are to be governed by. We may indeed refuse to be governed by it; but it is at our peril if we do; for if it proves to be a true declaration of his will, to reject it is rebellion.

But to reject or receive it, you may allege, is not a thing in your own power. Belief depends not on your will, but your understanding. And will the righteous judge of the earth condemn you for want of understanding? No? but he may and will condemn you for the wrong conduct of your understanding. It is not indeed in your power to believe whatever you please, whether credible or incredible; but it is in your power to consider thoroughly, whether a supposed incredibility be real or only apparent. It is in your power to bestow a greater or less degree of attention on the evidence before you. It is in your power to examine it with an earnest desire to find out the truth, and a firm resolution to embrace it wherever you do find it; or on the contrary, to bring with you a heart full of incorrigible depravity, or invincible prepossessions. Have you then truly and honestly done every thing that is confessedly in your power, towards forming a right judgement of revelation? Have you ever laid before yourself in one view the whole collective evidence of Christianity: the consistence, harmony, and connection, of all its various parts; the long chain of prophecies undeniably completed in it; the astonishing and well-attested miracles that attended it; the perfect sanctity of its author; the purity of its precepts; the sublimity of its doctrines; the amazing rapidity of its progress; the illustrious company of confessors, saints and martyrs, who died to confirm its truth; together with an infinite number of collateral proofs and subordinate circumstances, all concurring to form such a body of evidence, as no other truth in the world can shew; such as must necessarily bear down, by its own weight and magnitude, all trivial objections to particular parts? Surely these things are not trifles; surely they at least demand seriousness and attention. Have you then done the Gospel this common piece of justice? Have you ever sat down to consider it with impartiality and candour; without any favorite vice or early prejudice, without any fondness for applause, or novelty, or refinement, to mislead you? Have you examined it with the same care and diligence that you would examine a title to an estate? Have you enquired for proper books? Have you read the defences of revelation as well as the attacks upon it? Have you in difficult points applied for the opinion of wise and learned friends; just as you would consult the ablest lawyers when your property was concerned, or the most skilful physicians when your life was at stake? If you can truly say, that you have done all these things: if you have faithfully bestowed on these enquiries, all the leisure and abilities you are master of, and called in every help within your reach, there is little danger of any materials doubts remaining upon your mind. But if after all these should, be not afraid; trust in God and be at peace; if your own heart condemn you not, then may you have confidence towards God. (1 John iii. 21.) You are in the hands of a gracious Master, who will not require more of you than you are able to perform. To the modest, the humble, the diligent, the virtuous enquirer: who labours after conviction, but cannot thoroughly arrive at it; who never attempts or wishes to infuse his scruples into others; who earnestly strives, who fervently prays, for more light and strength; crying out with all the passionate sincerity of an honest heart, Lord, I believe, help thou mine unbelief, (Mark ix. 24.); to him every equitable allowance will undoubtedly be made, every instance of compassionate tenderness be shown. For like as a father pitieth his own children, even so is the Lord merciful to them that fear him. (Ps. ciii. 31.) But to them who neither fear nor regard him; to the bold unbelieving libertine, who is against the gospel, because the gospel is against him; to the man of pride and paradox, who burns to distinguish himself from the vulgar by the novelty of his opinions, and would disdain to follow the common herd of mankind, even though he knew they were leading him to heaven; to the subtle minute philosopher, who refines away every dictate of common sense, and is lost in the dark profound of his own wretched sophistry; to the buffoon, who laughs and takes pains to make all the world laugh at every thing serious and sacred; to the indolent, negligent, superficial, free-thinker, who reads a little, takes for granted a great deal, and understands nothing thoroughly; to the man of pleasure and amusement, who treats all these things with a giddy, wanton, contemptuous, levity; and thinks that the whole fabric of revelation may be overturned, by a silly cavil, or a profane jest, thrown out in the gay moments of convivial mirth: to these I say, and all like these, the Almighty will one day most assuredly show, that his gracious offers of salvation are not to be despised, and trampled upon, and ridiculed with impunity.

Consider then, you, who reject the Gospel (if any such be here), consider, I entreat you, on what grounds you reject it; and think a little seriously on these things once more in your lives, before you resolve never to think again. Look well into your own hearts and see whether you are really, what perhaps you profess to be, unbelievers on conviction, or whether you have taken up your infidelity, as some do their faith, upon trust. It becomes not us to judge you uncharitably; but indeed it becomes you to examine yourselves very strictly. You may easily deceive the world; you may, if you please deceive yourselves; but God you cannot deceive. He, to whom all hearts are open as the day, he knows whether you are conscientious and honest doubters, or careless, prejudiced, profane despisers, of his word. It is a small thing for you to be judged of man's judgement; he that judgeth you is the Lord. (1 Cor. iv. 3, 4); and by the unerring rules of his justice you must finally stand or fall. Think then whether you can face that justice without dismay; whether you can boldly plead before the tribunal of Christ the sincerity of your imbeliet as a bar to your condemnation. That plea may possibly in some cases be a good one. God grant it may in yours! But remember this one thing; that you stake your own souls upon the truth of it.

JOHN vii. 48.

Have any of the rulers, or of the Pharisees, believed on him?

THIS question was deemed sufficient to confound the witnesses of our Lord's power and wisdom, who had ingenuously acknowledged the manifestations of his divine authority. They had been commissioned by the chief priests and pharisees to seize him as a seducer, and to bring him before the great council, there to answer for his supposed impiety. They listened to his doctrine: they were filled with reverence and admiration; no man laid hands on him: they returned; and in the ardour of astonishment exclaimed,—never man spake like this man! But here they are insulted as ignorant and vulgar, possessed with illiberal prejudices, and deceived by pretences which could have no effect on minds more enlightened. They are told of the deference due to the great and learned of their nation. The credulous multitude may ask, When Christ cometh, will he do more miracles than these? But what attention have these gained from men of eminence? The ignorant may say, of a truth this is the prophet: but have any of the great or learned, any of the rulers, or of the pharisees, believed on him?

Many points of instruction might naturally be deduced from this passage. But it is my purpose to apply it to present times and occasions in a manner more especially adapted to the circumstances of those who hear me.

That divine teacher, who spake as never man spake, still addresses his precepts, his exhortations, his promises, his threatenings, to us, in all wisdom and goodness, with all dignity and authority. The words of eternal life are here inculcated on the weak and inexperienced, precept upon precept, and line upon line; and it is their glory and their happiness if (they indeed continue in the things which they have learned and been assured of) that each from a child hath known the holy scriptures, which are able to make him wise unto salvation. But the time may come when false teachers shall labour to turn away their ears from the truth. And to prepare the mind for other delusions, they may perhaps begin with these or some like insinuations.

“ You have indeed been trained in the practice of Christianity. You have been taught to reverence its doctrines, to cherish its hopes, and to dread its threatenings. But, advancing as you now are, to a more extensive knowledge of the world, what deference do you find paid to these things, but by the obscure and recluse, men whose minds are fettered by prejudice, and enslaved by authority? Do those of liberal intercourse and exalted condition appear at all influenced by what you have been instructed to esteem so sacred? Look round you to the men of greatest reputation for science and erudition. How many of these have laboured to dispel those mists of error in which superstitious ages have been so long involved? Have they not all vanished before the brightness of their reasoning? Away then with the prepossessions of our childish days! and let us freely follow the pleasurable paths of nature, unrestrained by the illusions of bigotry and pious fraud."

Inconsistent as it must appear for these pretenders to unbiased reason, thus to recur to authority, the authority of weak and corrupted men; yet it may be necessary to guard the unwary against their artifice. For this purpose, I would now point your attention to that object which they display before us with so much triumph; the prevalence of unbelief among the great and learned. And the first point I would enforce is this, that

I. It is by no means a presumption against the truth of our religion, that in the active and exalted scenes of life, men reject its authority, either by their practice or professions.

For the present, let us suppose the fact to be, as stated by the adversary. And on the first view of society, there may appear some ground for the supposition. Although many who there support characters of eminence, have, we trust, received the fullest impressions of religion, and, through all the tumult and agitation of this life, look steadily to the blessings of a more glorious existence; yet the light of their examples is intercepted by the busy crowd in which they are engaged. They who force themselves on our attention, and from whom we generally form our judgment, are such as, from their early days, have been directed only to the world and its enjoyments. Nurtured in pride and prosperity, with every seducing object presented to their view, they issue into public life, with imaginations enflamed, passions undisciplined, and understandings imperfectly cultivated. They may have gained those superficial acquirements which are thought to adorn their stations. In every art of elegance they may be deeply learned, and exquisitely refined. But the severe pursuit of solid knowledge is intolerable to the undisciplined and enfeebled. And the words of eternal life, perhaps, have neither been impressed with due care, nor entertained with that satisfaction so necessary to their effectual improvement. These men are placed in such circumstances as command respect and deference, without a scrupulous or rigorous discussion of their real merit. Their prosperity is intoxicating; they are countenanced and flattered by those around them, who are attached to the same objects, and engaged in the same pursuits. Every instance in which their schemes have been successful serves to confirm them in exalted notions of their own abilities, which have perhaps raised them to what they call honour and distinction. The bustle of the little scene in which they are engaged keeps their minds in perpetual ferment; and their retired enjoyments, if in any degree licentious, leave neither leisure nor power for serious and exalted reflection.

Whatever deference may be due to such men, in our worldly intercourse; however distinguished their abilities may appear in those things which have engrossed their attention; yet surely, neither their situation nor engagements seem to qualify them to become detectors of religious error. They may, without profound reflection, discover the advantageous influence of religion upon social life. They may speak of it with respect, as an instrument of policy, necessary for restraining the lower orders of mankind, yet still as an invention calculated merely for this purpose. In this decision, they may applaud their own discernment, and rejoice in their superiority to all mean prejudice and superstition. But before this decision can have any weight, either with themselves or others, there must be a conviction that it is founded, not on a slight and careless advertence to the subject; not on some popular objection, some apparent difficulty casually suggested and rashly entertained; but on candid, serious, attentive, repeated examination. He who decides either in fa-your or in prejudice of a matter so momentous, on any other grounds, evidently forfeits all claims to our attention. It may be therefore worthy of enquiry, whether it be not highly probable that the men now described (and many such there must be, of no small regard in civil life) never have examined the evidence of our faith; and whether it be not a subject which they scarcely can examine with attention and impartiality.

But these are points which seem, from the very nature of the case, to be at once decided.

The days of dissipation and pleasurable indulgence, are evidently not the days of religious enquiry. It is not the business of a mind imperfectly cultivated, an imagination warm and giddy, passions violent, and solicited by perpetual allurements. The turbulence of public life leaves no leisure for those thoughts, which rise beyond the sphere of present objects, how interesting soever and important they may appear. In what happy interval can the man, immersed in the business, the contentions, and competitions of this world, be enabled or disposed to consider the things not of this world? Shall the word of truth, which he hath been habituated to despise, obtain at once, in any period of his engagements, a serious and dispassionate attention? Let us imagine him, in some moment of reflection, reading or conversing on the subject of religion. In either case, the humble preacher of righteousness approaches him without worldly dignity, without artifice or flattery. Could he assure him that the service of God and that of the world were perfectly consistent; that they might go on in amicable union, without the least hazard of the divine displeasure, or the least interruption to the pursuits even of the most corrupt and sensual; he might possibly obtain a patient audience. But his preaching is of a different kind. He thwarts what such men consider as the business and the pleasures of their life, with doctrines the most disgusting. He tells them that their pursuits, however captivating, are no more than vanity and vexation of spirit; that high-minded as they may be, they have fixed on the most sordid objects; that they must mortify their corrupt affections, and look with a due indifference to the things of this world, while they press forward to an eternal inheritance.

But what acceptance can such doctrines gain, when the fastidious hearer is already prepossessed? Far from prevailing over inveterate habits, rooted prejudices and disordered passions, they must be received with aversion and indignation, as a presumptuous attempt to interrupt his favourite pursuits; with scorn and derision, as an insolent claim to a superiority in understanding, over those whom the world pronounces wise and discerning.

This preacher comes in the name of the great God of heaven and earth; and while he denounces the sentence of tribulation and anguish, while he discloses the mystery of grace and mercy, offers at the same time the most reasonable evidence of the authority by which he speaks. But his doctrines are received with impatience and disgust; his evidence is weighed in the false balance of prejudice and corruption, with a desire to find it weak and insufficient. And let this fatal prepossession once engage the mind, the clearer the evidence appears, the more offensive must it prove; the more must it be hated, and, of consequence, the more violently opposed. Or, should it force its way through all the obstacles of depravity, it may be entertained for a while, but without a permanent and lively influence; vicious habits and disordered passions soon resume their power; and the last state of that man, now returning to his usual engagements, is worse than the first.

Such is the natural progress of the contest between religion and corruption. But what is this to the cause of our holy faith? Is it impaired, or at all affected by the prejudices, by the passions, by the disorders and perversions of the human mind? Is truth of so precarious a nature, that it may be altered or subverted merely at the good pleasure of the negligent, the confident, and presuming? Is the evidence of religion less bright, because the obstinate turn away from it? or its motives less powerful, because sinners resist their influence?

And say not thou that truth must have its due impression on enlightened minds, and that the things rejected by the intelligent and enlightened cannot be true. Truth can make no impression when it is not examined and considered; when it is excluded and rejected. We do not object to the certainty of a geometric theorem, because the men engaged in other studies will not purchase the knowledge of it by the necessary deductions, or because their capacities are so contracted that they are not capable of the investigation, or their dispositions so averse to abstract reasoning, that they despise or detest it; or because they coldly reject a study tending to interrupt their worldly pursuits. And as to the degree of understanding and illumination annexed to higher stations and engagements, we may not always judge of this with impartiality and discernment. Whatever be the worldly employment to which we are attached, it necessarily contracts and concentrates the mind to one favourite object. The politician is oftentimes as confined in his views, and as incapable of judging of any matter beyond his department, as the mechanic. In the eye of man, his engagements may be splendid and elevated, but they have their bounds as well as the less liberal employments; and beyond these the mind unused to pass, is darkened in the strange and untrodden region.

The case of the men now described is the same with that of the unbelieving rulers in the days of our blessed Lord. These had their corruptions and prepossessions, to which the doctrine of Jesus was utterly unfriendly. Hence they either neglected or cavilled at this doctrine. The declarations of the prophets were explicit; but they refused to search the scriptures. The evidence of miracles, though never beheld with indifference, yet, as in the days of their forefathers, proved by no means irresistible. They tortured their invention to account for them, without doing violence to their prejudices; and they contented themselves with the most irrational and absurd solutions. Nay, we find them proceeding to an extravagance seemingly unnatural. When at the command of our Lord the dead arose from his grave, and thus stupendously manifested the power of God, the glory of this evidence served but to provoke their rage: and when they could no longer doubt or dispute, they sought to destroy the person on whom this miracle was wrought.

When, therefore, we attribute the disregard or disbelief of our religion, too frequently observed in the active and exalted orders of men, to their engagements, their passions, their corruptions and prepossessions, which render them inattentive to the evidence, and averse from the doctrine of the gospel, which incense them against the truth, and harden them against its influence, the causes we assign are fully sufficient to account for this prevailing scandal; they are such as, without any violence to Christian charity, seem naturally deduced from their circumstances and engagements; and such as, we are assured, have in other like instances operated with all the power we ascribe to them?

And far be it from us, to urge them in the spirit of pride or conscious superiority. Even among those who name the name of Christ, there is found an opposition to reason still more affecting: I mean in those who believe, and yet remain uninfluenced; who are forced by their passions from the paths of righteousness, at the very time when they acknowledge these to be the only paths of truth and happiness. And, more especially, if among those who have full leisure to search, to try, and to examine, who have no engagements or avocations, fewer trials or temptations to deviate from the religion which they profess, any should prove indolent or obdurate, must we not acknowledge this a grosser and more glaring contradiction to principle, than any to be found in the avowed gainsayer? He disclaims and renounces the authority of his Lord and Master, and thus acts unreasonably; but not inconsistently. He doth not acknowledge that authority, and at the same time resist and defy it. He doth not confess that Jesus Christ is Lord; Lord of lords, and King of kings; but he doth not, with the insolent mockery of his murderers, crown him with the ensigns of royalty, and bow the knee before him. What still aggravates the heinousness of this discordance of the nominal christian's conduct with the declaration of his lips is, that the mischief terminates not in himself. He gives occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme. He is, in effect, the enemy of the cross of Christ; by supporting and countenancing those who are formally and openly so. He adds to the illusions wherewith the children of this world deceive themselves; who priding themselves in their knowledge of mankind, triumph in every instance of such inconsistency in those who pretend to be children of light; and fortify themselves with the imaginary discovery, that men do not themselves believe what they attempt to obtrude on others.

But although it be allowed that the unbelief of the men hitherto described, may fairly be imputed to a blinded understanding and an evil heart; still what shall we say of those retired votaries of knowledge, those men of refinement and speculation, who have studied, examined, and rejected the gospel? Let us in the second place consider, whether their authority be a proof or presumption against the truth of our religion.

II. And herein is a marvellous thing! that a religion first propagated in the midst of learning and refinement, tried at the tribunal of reason, approved by judicious and accurate enquiry, corrupted in times of darkness, recovering its purity with the revival of knowledge, strengthened and confirmed by the gradual increase of intellectual improvement, espoused and defended by the most illustrious in human science, should now at length be deemed the idol of ignorance and scorn of the wise!—But who are the wise that affect this scorn? Are they the attentive laborious prosecutors of knowledge; the glorious luminaries of science, who have spread its influence through the world; the illustrious sages who have directed and adorned society? In these our religion finds its most strenuous defenders. Or are they men who owe the greater part, if not the whole, of their reputation, to this their opposition to the gospel? If so, is there not reason to suspect that the gainsayer may be oftentimes extolled far beyond his real deservings? For, “many talk of the truth, who never sounded the depth from whence it springeth.” (Hooker.)

If he lives in the midst of superstition and idolatry, he may without any extraordinary abilities discover, that the religion of his country cannot be from God. He may point his ridicule against its corrupt doctrines with sufficient liveliness, and yet without any wonderful elevation of genius; just as he may point his invective against the cruelty of persecution, without any extraordinary or exalted benevolence. Yet still he may not have the ingenuous caution and discernment necessary to distinguish the corruptions from the pure and essential parts of christianity. He may wantonly extend his censure to these, and be admired; although he but repeats those arguments in one country, which have been repeatedly and effectually refuted in another.

Where religion is professed in greater purity, he may find doctrines which shock the pride of reason, and may glory in that freedom which examines them without reserve or scruple. Yet he may be precipitate enough to condemn the doctrines which transcend, with those which contradict his reason, or he may deride the true distinction. Yet it may not be the less just, because frequently repeated. He may be offended at the endless subjects of religious controversy, in a state of religious liberty; he may conclude that every system is equally false. Yet this may be the conclusion of a rash, an indolent, an inattentive reasoner. And genius and understanding do not always secure against rashness, indolence, and inattention.

In general we know, that an inferior degree of intellectual powers is sufficient for objecting, perplexing, and confounding. In times more distinguished for the superficial elegancies of knowledge, than for deep enquiry and collected reasoning, even this inferior degree may be admired and applauded. And he who employs his abilities, of whatever rank or degree, in opposition to our faith, hath already gained the whole name of the corrupt and vicious, a powerful party, in his favour. Prejudiced, and partial to the advocates of their folly, they easily mistake an affected ostentatious delicacy for liberality of sentiment; a liveliness, and extravagance of fancy for acuteness and penetration; bold assertion for argument and knowledge; fluent elocution for just reasoning; darkened subtilty for deep and critical disquisition; and because these men have not been convinced, they may rashly and ignorantly conclude that they have never been confuted. Rashly, I say, and ignorantly; for arguments the most powerful cannot always have their due influence: nor can conviction operate on minds indisposed to the truth.

And may not men of science and speculation be subject to the same indispositions with the active part of mankind? Are not their minds equally liable to be prejudiced against the truth; their hearts equally liable to be alienated from it; their tempers equally liable to be incensed against it?—Let it not be deemed invidious to observe, that they who contend against the authority of our religion, may not always be unexceptionable in their moral conduct. This may be no considerable impediment to their pursuit of human knowledge. The vicious man of intellectual abilities, may proceed in a mathematical disquisition with the utmost regularity. He can here judge of evidence exactly, detect a fallacy most acutely, and steer his course successfully through the most perplexed and difficult researches. His passions do not attend him in his progress; and are by no means interested in his conclusions. Whatever he may collect, or however he may decide, his sensuality is not condemned, his pride is not mortified, his malice is not restrained. He hath, therefore, no temptation to deviate from the exact line of reason and evidence. Not so in his religious enquiries. When he is to enquire into the truth and divinity of the gospel, with all its precepts of purity and meekness, and benevolence, the question, in effect, at least in its immediate consequence, is nothing less than whether the pursuits of all his days have not been vain and abominable; whether the judgments of the Almighty be not denounced against them; whether he should not subdue those affections which now enslave him, and humble himself before his fellow-creature, who hath been injured by his insolence or oppression? In such enquiries, neither knowledge nor refinement, nor penetration, can render such men competent judges. For “while they pretend to such a scrutiny of other evidence,” (to use the words of one of their own order) “they are the readiest to take the evidence of the greatest deceivers in the world, their own passions.” (Lord Shaftsbury.) And to this, I fear, we are in a great measure to impute it, that there is no one species of false and sophistical argument, of subterfuge, artifice, and cavil, perplexity, confusion, and inconsistency, but abounds in their reasonings, who are deemed the most distinguished in the cause of infidelity.

Every occupation or profession hath its peculiar distempers, of the mind as well as of the body: men of speculation experience both. Let us suppose a case which frequently occurs, and which surely renders the sufferer an object of tenderest compassion. Suppose the brilliancy of genius clouded, and the native vigour of the mind relaxed by an exquisite sensibility tremblingly alive to every gloomy or disagreeable impression. The man of this irritable mind and this relaxed frame is querulous, restless, dissatisfied; he repines, he accuses the author of what he calls his misery; he cannot bear these cheerful views of Providence with which christianity presents him. He pronounces them false, for they accord not with his immediate feelings. Suppose him more cheerful and more conversant with the world: he has been habituated to regard those excesses condemned so severely by the gospel without abhorrence. His habits, his self-will, and self-flattery, determine him against those doctrines which suppose or express the exceeding heinousness of his conduct, and which, if true, must render him debased and loathsome in his own sight.

Let us suppose, however, that these speculative men who have at any time contended against our faith, were not under the dominion of the more disordered passions: that they have really acquired that philosophical refinement and composure, which they sometimes affect. Still there are passions no less enemies to truth, though their objects be not merely sensual. Do not the love of fame, the vanity of being distinguished, the impatience of being caressed and admired, the hope of being transmitted to posterity, as the great reformers of a superstitious world, the conquerors of general prejudice, and the victorious combatants of error ; do not these pervert the judgment ? And surely men are not defended from them by science and erudition.

Few there are who do not over-rate their intellectual powers ; who do not secretly exult in a conscious superiority over those around them. And how shall this superiority be displayed ? In times when every art and science have been improved to the utmost, what resource for the man who aspires to literary distinction ? New improvements in the useful arts, or new discoveries in human science, it would be intolerable, it would be precarious, it would be hopeless to attempt. The aspiring and the confident therefore strike naturally into the path of opposition to opinions generally held sacred. The most eminent in human knowledge have asserted and defended them. To deny them, therefore, is to enter the lists with the most eminent in human knowledge ; an object highly flattering to vanity and self-opinion. — If these passions be not eminently discoverable in the disputer of this world, what meaneth his perpetual glorying in his own wisdom ? His affected contempt, and rigorous censure of all those whom he opposes ? To what can we ascribe his precipitate and peremptory decisions on the nature of the infinite and unsearchable, and the ways of his adorable Providence ? His extravagant paradoxes, those feeble efforts of a perverse mind, that is plunged into absurdity, by straining at something new and extraordinary ? Or what hath given birth to his laboured attempts at subtlety and sceptical refinement, obstructed with all the triumph of confidence and self-conceit ? Or, (to appeal to an indisputable fact) what but vain glory prompts our adversary to propagate his unbelief ? When the advocate for religion stands forth in its defence, he may be accused of interested or sinister motives : but he hath a fair and reasonable account to render of his conduct. He pleads that it is his bounden duty and service ; and that he labours for the temporal and eternal interests of his fellow-creatures. But when the adversary displays his untoward zeal, what can he reply to the charge of vain-glory ? Not that he obeys the commands of God, when he denies or doubts his existence, or declares that this adorable Being beholds not the things that are on earth. Not that he looks to the recompense of reward ; for he hopes but to lie down with the beasts that perish. Not that he reveres and vindicates the Majesty of Heaven. The hideous vanity of such a plea is at once discoverable in the man who wantonly mistakes, or rashly misconceives those particulars, which he presumes to call injurious to this Majesty. Nor can he pretend a concern for the welfare of society, when he opposes a religion of peace and benevolence, the most effectual support and brightest ornament of social life : when he labours to break down the surest barrier against violations of right and order, to subvert the most powerful motives to every laudable pursuit, to stifle the remorse of the oppressor, to aggravate the sorrows of the afflicted, to harden the already hardened heart, and to thunder despair into the ear, in which humanity should infuse the fairest hopes and tenderest consolations.

Whenever, therefore, it is urged that many wise, and many contemplative, and many men of knowledge and refinement, have opposed our holy faith, let it be remembered, that the wise man hath his weakness and imperfections, the contemplative and refined their prejudices and perversions. But whether the despisers of God's holy law wilfully shut their eyes against the consequences of their presumption, or whether they deceive their own hearts, it is our part to be guarded against the danger of their example. For this purpose I have now endeavoured to inculcate the principle, for which they affect to contend with so much zeal : that you are not to be influenced by authority ; but to labour freely and dispassionately in the search of truth ; that you are not to be offended, because men are found indifferent to what they have not examined, or are incapable of examining ; because they are averse to a doctrine mortifying to their pride, and odious to their eruptions ; or because the superficial, the vicious, or the vain-glorious pretender to speculation hath contended against it. Doth this little band of gain-sayers seem considerable enough to demand your attention ? Behold, then ! we claim your attention for a society infinitely more numerous and venerable. We set before you the glorious company of apostles, the noble army of martyrs, the redeemed of all nations and ages, the assembly of Christ's faithful followers, who have sprung up even in the most corrupted times; the good and the wise, and the learned, in whose lives and labours his heavenly doctrine hath shone out gloriously and irresistibly. With one voice they call upon you; they adjure you by the mercies of the living God, to use all diligence to make your calling and election sure: not to submit blindly and implicitly, but to try, to prove, to exercise that portion of reason, to embrace those opportunities of instruction which God hath granted you, before the distractions of the world have dissipated, before its allurements have seduced, before corruption and vanity have blinded and perverted you.

Listen to the awful admonition. So shall the God of all grace stablish, strengthen, and settle you in a steadfast and a lively faith; that faith which shall preserve you blameless and harmless amidst a perverse generation; which shall make every action of your lives gracious and amiable, and prove at once your guide and comfort through the perplexities and dangers, and calamities of this mortal state; which shall raise you to the glory for which you were created and redeemed; to the eternal inheritance of the sons of God, through Christ our Lord.

SERMON XXI.

By MATTHEW HORBERY, D. D.

Late Fellow of Magdalen College, Rector of Stanlake, Oxfordshire, and Canon Residentiary of Litchfield.

The Doctrine of Divine Grace stated and explained.

JOHN iii. 8.

The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou bearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth: so is every one that is born of the Spirit.

THE doctrine, which is taught by our Saviour in this chapter, seems to be as great a paradox to some people in our days, as it was to Nicodemus in his own. When they hear any mention made of the operations of the holy Spirit, and the assistances of divine grace, they are apt to ask, with that Master of Israel, How can these things be? How is this consistent with human liberty and moral virtue? Is not this reducing religion into a kind of charm, which operates in a manner for which we cannot account; and converting men into machines, which do not act themselves, but are only acted upon by the arbitrary force of a superior being?

Without concerning myself with endless objections, I shall endeavour to establish the general doctrine, in a manner, to which, I hope, no reasonable exception can be made. In order to this, I shall,

First, propose the doctrine itself. Secondly, shew its foundation in the word of God. Thirdly, mention the limitations and restrictions under which it ought to be admitted. Fourthly, obviate the ill uses which may be made of it; and Fifthly, specify the good ends which it naturally promotes.

I. The doctrine is this; that the Holy Ghost, by a secret operation on men's minds, disposes them to the love, and assists them in the practice of virtue. This influence is commonly called GRACE. This is a brief account of the doctrine which has been usually taught in the Christian church; but which some writers of GREAT NOTE (as was before intimated) have treated with a great degree of RESERVEDNESS. If it can be defended, it ought; if not, let it be given up.

II. The foundation, which this doctrine has in the word of God, will appear, either from direct assertions of it, or from express promises of assistance, or from directions given concerning it. If the word of God affords us instances in any one of those ways, and much more if it supplies us with instances of them all, they who believe this word of God must consequently receive this doctrine of it as true and useful. Our Saviour directly asserts in the context, that except a man be born of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God. Here therefore, the new birth, which is the first step in the new life, and without which no man can become a new creature, is directly ascribed to the secret influence and operation of the holy Spirit. The same thing is asserted by St. Paul; God, says he, according to his mercy saved us, by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost. (Titus iii. 5.) The growth and increase of this new life, and the progress which the Christian makes in it, i. e. in plain terms, all the virtues and good qualities, all the habits of goodness, and that practice of universal holiness, to which our religion call us, is uniformly, through the whole tenor of scripture, ascribed to the same cause, The love of God, which appears in keeping all his commandments, is shed abroad in our hearts, by the Holy Ghost, which is given unto us. (Rom. v. 5.) If we mortify the deeds of the body, it is through the Spirit (Rom. viii. 13.); if we be filled with all joy and peace in believing, if we abound in hope, it is through the power of the Holy Ghost. (Ib. xv. 13.) Our sanctification is represented as his work, in places too numerous to be mentioned. It is asserted as directly as, in a few plain words, it can be, that the Spirit also helpeth our infirmities. (Ib. viii. 26.) And even where we are exhorted to work out our own salvation with the greatest care and solicitude, it is pressed upon us by this consideration, that God, by the agency and operations of his holy Spirit, worketh in us, both to will and to do of his good pleasure. (Phil. ii. 12, 13.) More effectually to carry on this gracious work, his delight is with the children of men, and, in a peculiar manner, he dwells in them. Know ye not, that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost, which is in you, which ye have of God? (1 Cor. vi. 19.) Know ye not, that ye are the temple of God, and that the spirit of God dwelleth in you? (1 Cor. iii. 16.) Questions these, which carry in them even more than direct assertions; as they intimate, that it is scarce possible, at least that it is a shame, for any Christian to be ignorant of this plain and important point. These are only some of the many passages in Scripture, in which the doctrine of divine assisting grace is inculcated; to which I need add no more, but that plain and full declaration of St. Paul: Now, if any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of his. (Rom. viii. 9.)

The foundation, which this doctrine has in the word of God, appears likewise from express promises of assistance contained in it. I will pray the Father, says Christ (comforting his disciples, under the apprehensions of his own departure from them), and he shall give you another comforter, that he may abide with you for ever; even the Spirit of Truth, whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him: but ye know him, for he dwelleth with you, and shall be in you. (John xiv. 16, 17.) In which promise, though the degree of divine influence and inspiration was peculiar to the apostles, yet the promise itself belongs, not only to those that were near, but also to those that were afar off; even to as many as should believe on his name. For this comforter was to abide with them for ever; in the same sense in which our Saviour promises in another Evangelist; Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world. (Matt. xxviii. 20.) And, If a man (if any man, to the end of the world) will love me and keep my words, my Father will love him, and we will come unto him, and make our abode with him. (John xiv. 23.) There is the like promise of the Spirit to them that ask for him, in the eleventh chapter of St. Luke; where our Saviour teaches his disciples how to pray, and urges the duty upon them, from the example of human parents; who, if their children ask bread, do not give them a stone; or, if they ask a fish, will not for a fish give them a serpent. If ye then, says he, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children; how much more shall your heavenly Father give the holy Spirit to them that ask him? (Ver. 13.)

The directions, which are given in Scripture, with relation to the Spirit and his gifts, shew likewise the foundation, which the doctrine has in the word of God; and are, in effect, so many promises of assistance, if these directions be faithfully observed. Of this kind is that of St. James; If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God, let him ask in faith, nothing wavering. (Ch. i. 5, 6.) For this wisdom is at least one of the manifold gifts of grace, if it does not rather comprehend them all; for the wisdom that is from above, is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be intreated; full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality, and without hypocrisy. (James iii. 17.) Of this kind also are the directions not to quench the Spirit (Thess. v. 19.) and not to grieve him (Ephes. iv. 30.), either by idleness, or pride, or vice; by a careless inattention to the good thoughts and desires, which he puts into our minds, or by a wilful opposition to them. Our Saviour himself has annexed the holy Spirit to the duty of prayer: and in consideration that Jesus the Son of God was in all points tempted like as we are, but is now passed into the heavens (from whence he is both able and willing to distribute those gracious influences, which he purchased for us by his own blood), St. Paul directs us come boldly, i. e. in full assurance of faith, unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need. (Heb. iv. 16.)

III. Thirdly, If men had always expressed themselves upon this subject with the same accuracy, which the Apostle uses here, and been content with asserting the doctrine of grace to help in time of need, my next particular would have been superseded; which is, to mention the limitations and restrictions, under which this doctrine ought to be admitted. And the first and great one of all is, that it be admitted in no sense, but what is consistent with our nature, and the nature of virtue, so as to leave us men and moral agents. In this respect, therefore, the allusion in the text was not designed to hold. The agency of the Spirit is not like the impetuosity of the wind, which reads the mountains, and breaks in pieces the rocks (1 Kings xix. 11, 12.), and carries every thing before it, with a force not to be resisted. He works in a gentle persuasive way, and is found in the still small voice of reason and conscience. His operations are the operations of mind on mind; and if created, if human spirits can influence each other, by arguments, by advice, by monition and persuasion, cannot that infinite Spirit, who not only knows, but fashioned all the hearts of the children of men, influence them likewise, guide them by his counsel, and assist them by his grace, and yet leave them in possession of their liberty? He that planted the ear, shall he not hear? He that formed the eye, shall he not see? (Psal. xciv. 9.) And he that imparted to men all the powers, and all the means of intercourse with each other, shall he be debarred all intercourse and communication with them? We depend upon God for the preservation of our natural life: his presence and his power support us in our being; his arm upholds and strengthens us in every action; in him we live, and move, and have our being. (Acts xvii. 28.) Yet, notwithstanding this natural influence, perpetually issuing from the throne of God, we enjoy a perfect freedom, a liberty which we always can, and which we too often do, abuse to the purposes of sin. And, in like manner, though we are supported and assisted through the whole progress of our spiritual life, by those influences which perpetually flow from the throne of grace, we are still free, and at liberty (and too often use that liberty) to defeat them all, thereby rendering sin itself more exceeding sinful. (Rom. vii. 13.) And as the doctrine of divine preservation gives men no encouragement, in ordinary cases, to cast all their care upon God; as if he would feed them as he does the fowls of the air, which neither sow, nor reap, nor gather into barns, and, as if he would clothe them, as he does the lilies of the field, which neither toil nor spin (Matt. vi. 26, 28.); so neither should the doctrine of divine grace encourage them to rely solely upon that, as if every thing was to be wrought in them, and for them, without the least care or endeavours of their own. They, therefore, who pretend to expect assistance of such a kind, or in such a degree as destroys their natural liberty, and supersedes their own endeavours (which indeed is no assistance at all, but plain violence and force), and they who pretend to look for no assistance, but disclaim it all, under pretence, that it is inconsistent with liberty, and religion and virtue, are both equally to be condemned. The just temper, in this matter, seems to lie between these extremes, which at once ascribes to God the honour of his grace, and leaves to men the praise of doing well.

gards us, as we are men, and moral agents; there is another, which concerns us as Christians of those latter ages, in which Christianity is already planted, and the professors of it no longer exposed to persecution. And this will prevent us from deceiving ourselves by such promises (if any such there be), as had relation to times, which had need of more plentiful communications. As we are not now to expect the spiritual gifts, which enabled the Apostle to plant the gospel, so neither should we expect the spiritual consolations, which supported the martyr in his sufferings for it. These were favours peculiar to the times which wanted them; favours, which, because they never experienced, some men are too apt to disbelieve. But there is very little foundation for any doubt of this kind: for those great illapses of the Spirit, those raptures and illuminations, were vouchsafed to the primitive Christians, and are withheld from the present, for the same reason, and upon the same account; viz. because God gives his grace to help only in time of need, and in such proportion as is needful. Unless, therefore, our circumstances are the same, and our trials as severe, as were those of the first Christians, we have no reason to expect the same extraordinary, the same miraculous, influences of the Spirit. It is by the grace of God, that we are what we are; that we are men, and Christians, endued with liberty and reason, and have only the common trials and temptations of life to pass through: it seems, therefore, to follow, that we should only desire further, that God would be pleased to bless, direct, and assist us, in the common methods of his Providence, and give us such a portion of his good Spirit, as is agreeable to our nature, and suitable to the circumstances in which we are placed. But there is no reason in the nature of the thing, and no foundation in the word of God, for those strong impressions, those rapturous sensations of grace, those visions, and ecstasies, and illuminations, to which some have pretended. If men would not be imposed on in this affair, they ought to examine rather what they do, than what they feel; for inward feelings may be nothing else but the effects of a disordered head, or the workings of a warm imagination. But whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin; whosoever is born of God, overcometh the world; and he that doth righteousness, is righteous. (1 John iii. 9. and v. 4. and iii. 7.) Yet there is no occasion, perhaps, after all, to confine the operations of the Spirit to one faculty, and to suppose that they are always, and only, addresses to the reason of men. For reason is not the part in our nature which wants chiefly to be restored. The great source of corruption lies in the appetites and the will; and it is not so much the weakness of reason, as the strength of concupiscence, that leads us into ruin. And therefore, to be a counterbalance to this force of concupiscence, which is the love of sensual good, it is by no means absurd to suppose, that the holy Spirit may draw men, by sensations of delight, to the love of that which is spiritual. Nor will this appear any infringement of our liberty, if it be considered, that our liberty is weakened and impaired by concupiscence: and that, therefore, there is need of this taste of pleasure to recover it, and restore us to its free and unrestrained use, with regard to spiritual objects. It is to little purpose how clear the light is, wherein we see our duty, if our hearts, through corruption, be insensible to the love of it; and consequently, if the influence of the Spirit be excluded here, it is excluded from that part of us, which seems chiefly to require his holy inspiration.

IV. Fourthly, The doctrine admitted under these restrictions, does not seem capable of being easily abused. But, in general, ill uses have been, and ill uses may be, made of it again; which, therefore, it may not be inexpedient to point out. This doctrine, then, is grievously abused, when it is made to serve the purposes either of enthusiasm, or carelessness, or sin. And it is made to serve the purposes of enthusiasm, when, under pretext thereof, any persons pretend to such favours and communications from above, as Christians, in ordinary cases, have no reason to expect. And they may be sure, that all favours are of this kind, which are not absolutely needful, or at least, in a high degree, profitable to salvation. The natural reason of men, and the written word of God, when rightly employed and used, are a sufficient guide to duty. All immediate inspirations, therefore, all new visions and revelations, as from the Lord, are enthusiastic pretences. But the most fatally pernicious pretence of this kind is, when men, under the influence of such persuasions, think themselves at liberty to dispense with the eternal rules of righteousness, and to contradict the plain express laws of the everlasting gospel. This persuasion cometh not of him that hath called (Gal. v. 8.) us, this wisdom descendeth not from above; but if there be any thing more than what is earthly and sensual, it is devilish. (James iii. 15.)

This doctrine of grace may moreover be abused to the purposes of carelessness and sloth; and it really is so, when, instead of exerting their own endeavours, men only wait for the influence of the Spirit, which will, sometime, they hope, convert them, as in a moment, without preparation, without prayer, without any diligence of their own. But they may as well expect, that the Holy Ghost should descend suddenly, as with the sound of a rushing mighty wind, as that he should convert them in this irresistible manner; and without their own care and endeavours, deliver them like them that dream. No, he imparts his grace, as it were, in number, weight, and measure; and to such as make a good use and improvement of those degrees of it which are already conferred upon them, more shall be given, till at length they have abundance.

But the vilest, the most ungrateful abuse, is made of this doctrine, when, under the cover of it, men justify, or at least excuse themselves, in the known practice of sin. This they do, either when they live in the habit of any vice, pretending that, as yet, they have not grace sufficient to resist it; or more professedly, when they continue in sin, that grace may abound (Rom. vi. 1.), may appear more glorious at last, in the victory over such confirmed and inveterate habits. This turning the grace of God into an argument for immorality, is sure the highest way of grieving that holy Spirit, who is the giver of it; and as to ourselves, is making that which should have been for our wealth, become unto us an occasion of falling.

V. Fifthly, We make a good use of this doctrine, when we suffer it to answer those ends, which it seems in itself naturally calculated to promote. One of these is devotion, or application to God in prayer, and in all other methods, which he has appointed as the means of peace, or channels through which to convey it. Nothing is more destructive of true piety, than that affectation of self-sufficiency, which destroys or interrupts the intercourse between God and us. And, by a contrary rule, whatever opens the way to a frequent communication with our Maker, whatever leads us to it, and encourages us in it, cannot but be a doctrine of great practical importance. Now it is plain, without any enlargement, that the doctrine of Divine Grace is of this kind. For this teaches us at once, that we can do nothing without the assistance of God's Holy Spirit, and yet that this Spirit will not be given but to those that ask him; that ask him with earnestness and importunity, and seek him in diligent prayer. In like manner, and upon the same account, this doctrine must naturally excite us to make a regular and religious use of all the established means of grace. We cannot, with any consistency, neglect the study of the Scriptures, if we believe that a secret influence goes along with it, above what we have reason to expect from any human writings. We cannot, with any consistency, neglect the assemblies for Christian worship, if we believe that Christ himself is in the midst of them, distributing those favours of his gracious presence, which may elsewhere, perhaps be sought in vain. We cannot, with any consistency, neglect the Christian sacraments, if we believe, that besides the outward and visible signs, there is also an inward and spiritual grace; and particularly, that in the Lord's supper our souls are strengthened and refreshed by the body and blood of Christ, as our bodies are by the bread and wine (Church Catech.) And, in all probability, if we were to ask a reason of their conduct, from those persons who do neglect these things, such of them as are able to give one, would allege, that they expect no advantage in the use of them. What are these ordinances, that we should keep them? or what profit is there, if we attend upon them?

The doctrine above explained has further a natural tendency to promote unfeigned humility. It is true, indeed, the sense of our having originally received all our powers and faculties from God, ought in reason to preserve us from the absurd vice of pride. For, if we received every endowment, and every excellence which we may imagine distinguishes us from other people, why do we boast, or why are we vain and proud, as though we had not received them? But still it is a further inducement to that most amiable virtue, which is the foundation of all the rest, and the very basis of all practical religion, to consider, moreover, that the free and right use of our faculties, is owing to a secret influence, which is as much the free gift, as much the grace of God, as even the original donation them. This persuasion, which sets our weakness and corruption so full before us, cannot but teach us to think of ourselves soberly, and as we ought to think. To all which it must be added, as an additional motive to this good disposition, that it is one of the conditions, without which we have little reason to hope, that the grace of God will be long continued. For God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble.

To conclude: The doctrine of Divine grace, when rightly understood, is so far from being an argument for negligence, or sloth, or continuance in sin, that it is a great and powerful encouragement to make us use our own endeavours towards universal obedience. For this informs us, that we are carrying on a work, in which God himself is engaged; and which therefore cannot fail of success, but through our fault. It is God which worketh in us, and with us, both to will and to do of his good pleasure, (Phil ii. 13.) and therefore we are inexcusable, if, under the eye and inspection of such an assistant, we do not work out our own salvation. This consideration, as it may keep the most righteous persons from being confident, so it ought to preserve the most guilty from despair. For their very first attempts towards virtue, in their return from folly, will interest a power in their behalf, which, in spite of all opposition, will be sufficient for them: while they are yet afar off, their heavenly Father will meet them, and have compassion on them. But all this implies, that they have some power themselves to lay hold of the hand, which is thus graciously stretched out to relieve them. It implies, that they are not only able, but obliged to answer the end, for which the grace of God is bestowed upon them. And that is, not to render their own care superfluous, but effectual; not to supersede their own endeavours, but to make them successful. And when they thus labour, that they may not receive the grace of God in vain; when they hope to receive the Spirit, only that they may bring forth the fruits of the Spirit, in righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost; when they strive to keep all God's commandments, and yet do it as of the ability which God giveth (1 Pet. iv. 11.); when they do the best they can, and yet put not their trust in any thing that they do; in short, when they take to themselves the blame of all that is amiss, and ascribe to God the glory of all that is good in them; then the doctrine of Divine grace has had its natural effect upon them, and wrought in them that temper of mind, which by the appointment and promise of God, entitles them to the kingdom of glory. Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. (Matt. v. 3.) There every heart will be sensible, and every tongue will confess, that this great salvation, so much beyond what they looked for, is principally and originally owing not to any works or merits of their own; but to the benevolence and mercy of God the Father, to the merits and mediation of God the Son, to the guidance and assistance of God the Holy Ghost.

S E R M O N XXII.

By MATTHEW HORBERY, D. D.

The Inspiration of the moral Parts of Scripture asserted.

2 TIM. iii. 16, 17.

All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness: that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works.

THE importance of the argument to which these words direct us, is evident from the necessity of Divine inspiration, to give a proper weight and authority to the records of our holy religion. For supposing it to be proved that there really is a revelation given by God to mankind, there is still a question to be satisfied, viz. Where is this revelation to be found? And if in answer to this, men be referred (as they must be referred) to the Scriptures; it may still farther be demanded, what security have we, that these Scriptures themselves are free from error? If we say, with the Apostle, that all Scripture is given by inspiration of God, one would think that when this point was once clear, nothing farther would be expected. He is equally exempt from the possibility of deceiving, and of being deceived; and his word, like himself, is light and truth, and in it is no falshood, or error at all.

But we seem not to receive the same complete satisfaction, as to this point, if we are only told, that some part indeed of the Scripture, (as prophecies and certain doctrines,) must be inspired; but as for other parts, consisting of history or morals, there is no need, and no evidence of inspiration: in one case, men wrote with great faithfulness, in the other, with a pious intention.

Thus account of the inspiration of the Holy Scripture seems in great measure to destroy what before had been built up; the inquirer is left to fluctuate in uncertainty; the sacred volumes will lose much of their veneration; the church of God, which is built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone (Ephes. ii. 20), will be sorely shaken; and every profane hand will be encouraged to take away piece after piece, till (to speak in allusion to the fate of the material temple) there will not be left one stone upon another.

The revival of these notions makes this subject as seasonable, as it is important; and though nothing new upon it will be expected by this learned audience, yet I trust their candor will indulge me, while I remind them of the old approved arguments, at a time when others are not ashamed to revive the old exploded objections. I propose, therefore,

First, to enquire into the meaning of these words of the Apostle; and then to assert and prove the doctrine delivered in them.

No one, I believe, that reads St. Paul's words without a comment, will easily mistake their meaning; or make any doubt, but that he here asserts the complete inspiration of the Old Testament at least, as it was that part of Scripture which Timothy had known from a child. The holy Scriptures, or the Scripture, in the mouth of a Jew, or (what is much the same) of one educated in the Jews' religion, and who had no difference with them upon this article, would certainly be understood to signify that collection of sacred writings which was then received, and constituted the canon of the Jewish church. That was the same then, which it is at this day; and therefore whatever difficulties critics may raise, about the time when this collection was made, or the persons concerned in making it; if St. Paul declares that the whole collection was given by inspiration, this point, as far as his authority prevails, seems to be sufficiently secured. And the reason of the case, at least, extends to the New Testament, a considerable part of which was likewise written before this epistle to Timothy; so that, in this view, we are assured that all the Scriptures, consisting of the Old and New Testament, were given by inspiration of God.

But though this seems to be the plain and natural meaning of the words, as they lie in our English bibles, yet if we consult some writers for the meaning of them, they will tell us, that it is only this; that all Scripture, which is divinely inspired, is also profitable for the purposes hereafter mentioned. This interpretation, however, does some violence both to the words, and to the sense. πᾶσα γραφή, in all probability, signifies, collectively, the whole body of sacred Scripture; and numerous instances might be produced out of the New Testament, where ἡ has this signification, and is of the same import with ἡ. However, if it should here be understood distributively, it is still asserted that every Scripture, that is, every part of Scripture, is divinely inspired: though it is not so easy to comprehend how every part of Scripture, singly and by itself, is also profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness. This is a character, which the whole system of the sacred writings deserve; and by all of them together these ends are sufficiently answered: but that every part alone is of such universal use, is singly able to perfect the man of God, and thoroughly to furnish him unto all good works, is a point neither clear in itself, nor easy to be proved.

If to avoid this difficulty it be said, that the meaning is, that all Scripture, which is divinely inspired, be it more or less, is, taken altogether, profitable for these purposes; it is to be farther observed, (and it is the main observation of all,) that the text will not admit of this rendering. For the words are not πᾶσα γραφή διδόντις, ὠφελίμος, &c. as if διδόντις was part of the subject; but πᾶσα γραφή διδόντις καὶ ὠφελίμος, &c. where the conjunctive particle is an effectual barrier against this sense, and plainly shews that διδόντις and ὠφελίμος are equally predicated of the Scripture. But this meaning will be more readily admitted, when the proof is made out; and therefore I may proceed, Secondly, To assert and prove this doctrine of the complete inspiration of the holy Scriptures.

Only it may be remembered first, that the controversy here is not with infidels, who deny all inspiration whatsoever, but with those, who deny, or doubt of, the inspiration of some parts only of Scripture: the debate is not about the being or reality of inspiration, but the extent of it. Secondly, the point asserted is, that the writings of the Old and New Testament were, all of them, given by inspiration of God: not that the writers themselves were, at all times, and in all the actions of their lives, absolutely exempt either from error or sin. Any defects, therefore, either in their conduct, or their knowledge, upon other occasions, are nothing to the purpose. Thirdly, it is not intended, because it is not necessary, to plead for a verbal inspiration, or for the same degree of inspiration in all cases; but only that they were conducted by some extraordinary direction and assistance, which enabled them always, without danger of mistake or error, to answer the ends designed to be promoted by them.

Scripture is a miscellaneous composition; there are in it prophecies, and doctrines, and history, and morals. The inspiration of prophecy is allowed. St. Peter says plainly, that prophecy came not in old time, (or at any time,) by the will of man; but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. (2 Pet. i. 21.) It has sometimes been pretended, that these words of St. Peter are an explanation of our text; and that all the Scripture meant by St. Paul, is only the prophecy of the Scripture, which St. Peter says was not of the private motion, or personal knowledge, of the prophet's own mind, but proceeded originally from the Holy Ghost. But this point likewise is given up by the writer I have now in view; who contends, that there is another part of Scripture, besides the prophetic, which must necessarily be inspired; and that is the part, which contains "certain doctrines, and commands, or injunctions, which reason could not trace out, but which, when revealed, appear to be perfectly agreeable to reason." By commands or injunctions, he cannot here be supposed to mean those, which relate to morality, because his avowed principle is, that all morality may be known by natural reason; and that revelation is not at all necessary to fix a rule of morality. Whether, therefore, he intends the two positive institutions of Christianity, or what ever else his meaning may be, this seems plain enough, that he does not think the moral, any more than the historical, parts of Scripture were given by inspiration of God: "An honest man," says he, "may demand a proof, that moral truths and historical facts are the immediate effect of inspiration." The point, therefore, between us is reduced to this, whether the histories, and the morals of the Scripture, were given by inspiration?

That the moral part of Scripture was inspired, seems evident, in the first place, from the text: All Scripture, says the Apostle, was given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness; where interpreters both ancient and modern understand the whole compass both of faith and practice, referring the two first to error, or truth, of doctrine, and the two last to viciousness, or integrity of life. But determine as you please as to the exactness of this distinction, it is plain the Apostle sets the moral Scriptures, upon the same foot with the doctrinal, and stamps them equally with the same character of divine inspiration. The man of God (whether that signifies the able minister, or only the pious Christian) cannot be perfect by faith only; nor can the speculative, exclusive of the moral, doctrines of Scripture, thoroughly furnish him unto all good works. But this point need not be rested upon the authority of this passage alone; it will appear from many considerations of reason, and from many other authorities of Scripture.

The great usefulness of moral doctrine, and its vast importance to mankind, will not be questioned. The end of the commandment is charity (1 Tim. 1. 5.); the end of all teaching, of all instruction, of all revelation itself, by this author's own account, is virtuous practice. Suppose a system of doctrines revealed from heaven, and a long series of prophecy given by inspiration of God; what purpose do they serve? and what end were they designed to promote? They were not given for their own sake, for the sake only of being given; say then, they were given for the interest of true religion. But what is true religion without true virtue? This is the great end of all God's dealings with mankind; the great design of that last and best dispensation of the gospel, which is that grace of God that bringeth salvation, teaching us, that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world. (Tit. ii. 11, 12.) Is it then reasonable to suppose, that less care should be taken of the end than of the means? Can we imagine, that when a rule of faith is revealed by divine wisdom, a rule of life (of equal importance at least) should be left entirely to the discoveries, or the deductions, of human reason? Shall a Prophet be sent from God, in an extraordinary manner, to declare his will on special emergencies and on particular occasions? and shall it seem a thing incredible with you, that Prophets should be sent to declare that whole will of God, which is of universal use and concernment, which is the standing law and rule of life, and which to know and to practise is the perfection of human nature?

There seems to be something in this way of reasoning, which cannot well be evaded, but by saying that divine inspiration, which is necessary in one case, is needless in the other. Prophecies, and doctrines of pure revelation, must come from God in this extraordinary manner; but morality, if it be important, is also easy; is founded in truth and nature, may be traced out by reason, is commonly known, and what God has given us sufficient powers ourselves to discover; and it is neither usual, nor necessary, for God to interpose in cases, for which he has, in his ordinary providence, sufficiently provided.

The foundation of this reasoning proceeds upon a maxim which, as it is often applied, is good for nothing. It is not necessary, you say, that God should give us rules of morality, by way of inspiration? And what then? If it be not necessary, it may be serviceable, it may be beneficial, to his creatures. And does God do nothing, but what is necessary? Is this an amiable idea of the Sovereign Goodness? This, which seems rather derived from the conduct of indigent and frugal mortals, than to suit with the exuberant beneficence and riches of the divine nature? And what instance is there of any thing, pertaining to life and godliness (2 Pet. i. 3.), in which God has not done much more than was necessary, even abundantly more than we could either ask, or think? (Ephes. iii. 20.)

But if this should go for nothing, it is farther to be observed, that it might be necessary, (necessary for some purposes, though not for others), that the moral parts of Scripture should be given by inspiration. In this way there is an authority stamped upon them, which otherwise they would want. There are but two ways of teaching morality to any considerable purpose: it must be done in the way of authority, or by demonstration. It is plain, that how capable soever morality may be in itself of demonstration, it is not demonstrated in Scripture. If then you take away that divine authority on which it is supposed to stand, what else do you leave to support it? What weight or influence will the moral precepts of the bible have, if once they come to be considered only in this light, as so many moral sentences of wise men? Would the ten commandments, for instance, be equally regarded, and so effectually engage our obedience to them, if they were supposed to be the words only of a man wholly uninspired? Yet one would think it was not impossible, that so great a law-giver as Moses, so learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians (Acts, vii. 22.), might have been able to do something of this kind himself. Nevertheless, we see this matter was not left to him, but God wrote them himself with his own finger upon two tables of stone. (Exod. xxiv. 12. xxxi. 18. xxxii. 15, 16.) But this is too plain to be insisted on.

It must farther be said, and it has often been proved by many writers, that a complete rule of life is not easily, if at all, discoverable by mere reason. And from some passages even of our author himself it should appear, that morality is a science of considerable difficulty; how much soever he may contend, on other occasions, that it is all knowable by natural reason. Our moral ideas are not innate, any more than any other; "the knowledge of good morals," says he, "is not born in every, or any man:"—"But men come at the knowledge of morality, just as they do at the knowledge of other things, by being taught." But who shall teach them? Those, one would think, should be best qualified to do it, who had made this branch of knowledge their particular study. But the misfortune is, that when this science was most cultivated, it became most intricate and perplexed, by the disputes and differences of the philosophers themselves.

When Socrates had diverted their attention, which had almost wholly been confined to the study of nature, to a subject which more nearly concerned them, there rose up sect after sect, contradicting and confuting each other: differing about the very end, the chief happiness of man, and by consequence differing about the means that lead to it. What method then shall the disciple prefer, when the masters themselves are all at variance? and what way shall the inquirer take, when each of his guides gives him a different direction? "Has not every principle of morality, says our author, been as much the subject of debate and difference, as the precepts or doctrines of revelation have? Has not the existence of God; the liberty of man; the nature of good and evil; what is happiness; what is it that thinks in us; whether the soul be immaterial or not, immortal or not; the nature of justice, moral honesty; in short, every point of morality or natural religion, been controverted?"

It should seem, then, that there is some darkness and difficulty in this subject; and if God may in any degree remove it, by inspiring men to deliver the doctrines of morality in a plain authoritative manner, it should seem also that this is a design, not unworthy of so wise and gracious a Being. If the rule of life be truth, it is not easy for every man, or any man, to find out the whole truth; which consists not in any particular circumstance, relation, or habitude of things, but in all of them put together. If it be founded in the nature of things; or in the relations which intelligent beings stand in to one another; are all these discoverable, and easily discoverable, even by men of the best abilities? And if this truth of things be, (as it is allowed to be) the same in effect, with the nature and will of God, canst thou by searching find out God, his nature and will? Canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection; (Job xi. 7.)

But supposing that all morality may be known by natural reason, and that a great progress was made in this science by the philosophers of Greece and Rome; we are still to remember, that the Scripture-morals came from another kind of men, in a secluded corner of the earth. What was there peculiar in the soil of Judea, that the purest and most genuine fruits should flourish there? How comes it to pass, that all antiquity has delivered down to us but one book that is free from all blemish or defect? And yet this book was compiled by various authors, at very distant periods of time: still all is consistent, all is uniform, all breathes the same spirit, all conspires to the same end: and though running, as it were, in various streams, through different soils and channels, yet it preserves its native purity amidst all the pollution that surrounds it; and thence discovers that the source it proceeds from, is the fountain of living waters. But what consistency is there in the Pagan moralists, compared with one another? What immutability is there not, considered in themselves? Do not some or other of them encourage self-murder, the practice of exposing children, fornication, uncleanness, and even the sin not to be named? And do not all of them offend most grievously against the first principle and duty of natural religion, the unity and worship of the one true God, by directing men to comply with the idolatry and superstitions of their country? Is any thing like this to be found in the Bible, though the Hebrew Scriptures were written while that nation in general were very prone to idolatry?

It is certain and evident matter of fact, that we cannot take any number (hardly any one) of the Pagan moralists, against whose doctrines, in some parts or other, there will not lie very great exceptions. But nothing of this kind appears in the Scripture morals; nothing, but what fairly understood is capable of a just vindication: so that from the very purity and superior excellency of them one would imagine, that they were drawn up under a conduct more than human. It is true, indeed, they are not formed into a regular system, according to the rules of art practised by men. And in this sense what our author says may be true, "that nothing equal to the ethics of Tully, or Aristotle, was wrote for the first sixteen centuries of Christianity." But then, the purity of moral doctrine does not at all depend upon the exactness of method in which it is delivered; the systems of these two great men, with all their art and order, were as beneficial perhaps to the common people of Greece and Rome, as the Religion of Nature delineated is to the common people of England. While the Gospel reformed the world, and neglecting the rules of artificial method, and the enticing words of man's wisdom (1 Cor. ii. 1.), converted the hearts and renewed the spirits of men, turning them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God (Acts xvi. 18.); then indeed the Pagan moral, though it endeavoured to serve itself of the gospel, sunk into neglect, eclipsed by the superior lustre of the Christian: cold and languid were its precepts to a heart inflamed with the love of a dying Redeemer, and an empty lifeless form it appeared, void of all strength and beauty, to those first and most faithful disciples of the cross, before whose eyes Jesus Christ had been evidently set forth crucified among them, (Gal. iii. 1.) Pagan morality is little more than a shell and a carcass, for want of an inward principle to animate and inform it. This mere body may derive its origin from the earth, as the first man's from the dust of the ground; but the inspiration of the Almighty is the breath of life, by which it becomes a living soul.

These considerations may be of some weight; but to draw this matter to a point, we must attend to the sacred writings themselves, and the testimony they bear to one another. The sacred writings were, for the most part, compiled by men, who it is granted were inspired upon some occasions; and the moral parts of them lie mingled and intermixed with other matters, which were allowedly given by inspiration of God. Thus, as to Moses and the Prophets for the Old Testament, they were inspired in their prophecies; and can we think that this inspiration immediately forsook them, whenever they began to deliver or inculcate the rules of morality? They wrote these things at the same time, and in the same page. And is it reasonable to suppose, they were inspired this moment, and left to themselves the next? and then perhaps inspired again the moment after that, in order to foretell some future event? Is not prophesying, in the other sense of that word, as it signifies to declare the will of God, the standing law and rule of life, as useful and as noble an office, as predicting things to come? And why then should not the Holy Spirit be thought equally to provide for both cases, and to prevent any false prophesying in either sense? Besides, any one may see that the prophets themselves make no distinction in this matter, but deliver their moral instructions as they do their predictions, in the name, and by the authority of God, with a—Thus saith the Lord, and, Hear the word of the Lord. Then as to the other class of writings in the Old Testament, which are chiefly, or only, of a moral nature: they were either composed by men, who are known to have had some extraordinary intercourse with Heaven, or at least, they were always received by the Jewish church, as drawn up under a divine influence; and they appear to be quoted under that character by Christ and his Apostles in like manner as they quote the other Scriptures.

David does not only say of himself—The Spirit of the Lord spake by me, and his word was in my tongue (2 Sam. xxiii. 2.); but Christ also, the son of David, plainly intimates the same thing: How then doth David in spirit call him Lord? (Mat. xxii. 43.) And having occasion to quote to the Jews a passage from the Psalms, he tells them, that it was written in their law. (John xv. 25.) And when, after his resurrection, he expounded to his disciples in all the Scriptures, the things concerning himself, he tells them, in conclusion, that all things must be fulfilled, which were written in the law of Moses, and in the Prophets, and in the Psalms, concerning him. (Luke xxiv. 27, 44.) St. Peter says expressly, that David was a prophet (Acts ii. 30.); and in a Psalm of imprecation, which has often been the mark of prophane reproach, he declares the Holy Ghost spake by the mouth of David. (Acts i. 16, 20.) St. Paul has many allegations from the Psalms, too numerous to be repeated; argues from them in the same manner as he does from the Scriptures of the Prophets, and lays an equal stress upon their authority*. St. Paul, in more places than one, alleges the book of Proverbs, and St. James in one place seems plainly to ascribe, what is said there, to God himself. These Apostles likewise bear testimony to the book of Job, and the last recommends it, together with the Prophets, who have spoken in the name of the Lord, for an example of suffering affliction, and of patience. (1 Cor. iii. 19. Jam. v. 10, 11.) But there is the less occasion to be solicitous about every particular book in the Old Testament, since St. Paul has confirmed the authority of them all, not only in the words of the text, but also what he tells us, that Whatsoever things were written aforetime, were written for our learning; that we through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope. (Rom. xv. 4.) Every one in St. Paul's time understood by the Scriptures a system of writings that claimed to come from God. And would he have countenanced this claim, by such a passage as this, unless he had thought, that it was justly founded; and that these Scriptures, through patience and comfort of which we might have hope, did really come from the God of patience and consolation? (Rom. v. 5.)

As to the inspiration of St. Paul himself, no one, that calls himself a Christian, can with any consistency deny it. His pretensions to it are so frequent, and so plain, that if he had it not, he must have been a grand impostor. He declares, that the gospel he preached was

* See the following passages, viz. Rom. iii. 4, 10, &c. iv. 6, 7, 8. viii. 36. 10. 18. xi. 9. 10. xv. 3. 9. 11. 1 Cor. iii. 20. xv. 25. 17. 2 Cor. ix. 9. Ephes. v. 8. Heb. i. 5, to the end of the chapter. Heb. ii. 6, 7, 8, 12, 13. i. 7, 8, 9, &c. iv. 3, 5, 7. v. 5, 6. vii. 17. 21. x. 5, 6, &c. xiii. 6. It seems clear from these passages, that St. Paul did not consider the Psalms of David as a Book of Songs, that had nothing of prophetic in them. See Five Letters concerning Inspiration, &c. p. 103.

not after man, that he conferred not about it with flesh and blood, or with any of the other Apostles, neither received he it of any man, neither was taught it, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ. (Gal. i.) What could this gospel be, which was the subject of St. Paul's preaching, but the same which is the subject of his writings? The whole scheme of salvation by Jesus Christ, the privileges and the conditions of the gospel-covenant, the doctrine of justification, though not by the works of the law, either natural or Jewish, yet by a faith that worketh by love (Gal. v. 6.), that comprehends all Christian morality, and is the root and foundation of all Christian obedience. This gospel he received by the revelation of Jesus Christ, and this gospel he preached with the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven. (Peter i. 12.): which things (says he, joining himself with the other Apostles), we also speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth. (1 Cor. ii. 13.) It is very unreasonable then to suppose, that he did not write, as well as preach, this doctrine, under the same divine conduct and direction. Indeed the very character of his writings themselves allow us not room to doubt of it. For they abound with prophecies and doctrines of mere revelation and doctrines that are themselves a sort of prophecies; as are all those that relate to the future state of Christ's church, his second advent, the rise of anti-christ, and the like. So that here, to borrow our author's own observation, "the events, which we see in the world, establish the credit of the Apostle, and prove that he had some intercourse with Heaven; they prove that he was actually inspired." But, then,

We are reminded in another place, that there are some things in the Epistles, which are spoken without any commandment from the Lord, in which the apostles gave their judgment; and here it seems we have no authority to say, that they did it by inspiration.

The case here referred to, though expressed in this general manner, is only that of St. Paul in 1 Cor. vii. where, supposing all to be true which this writer suspects, it only shews, that in a particular point of present expediency, about which the Apostle had been consulted, he had received no immediate direct command from Heaven. This exception, in this particular case, is so far from hurting his general claim to inspiration, that it strengthens it; it shews the honesty of this Apostle, and his care not to obtrude any thing upon the church, under the stamp of divine authority, which really wanted that impression. But, after all, the matter may be wholly mistaken; and the opposition may lie, not between St. Paul and himself, as sometimes writing by inspiration, and sometimes not; but between what St. Paul determined in the then present distress, and the commands delivered by our Lord himself while he was here on earth, obliging all Christians in all ages of the world. And as to this Apostle's saying, in the conclusion of the chapter, and I think also, that I have the spirit of God, it intimates no distrust, that he himself had of his inspiration: but is a fine, and at the same time a severe, rebuke to some certain persons in the church of Corinth, who seem to have been as cautious in this affair of inspiration, as some certain teachers now in our's. But to all such teachers St. Paul said then, and to all such now his words may be applied, If a man think himself to be a prophet, or spiritual, let him acknowledge, that the things I write unto you, are the commandments of the Lord. (1 Cor. xiv. 37.)

With regard to the other Apostles who wrote any part of the New Testament, we must remember, that, according to our Lord's most true promise, they were filled with the Holy Ghost, who guided them into all truth, taught them all things, and brought all things to their remembrance, whatsoever Christ had said unto them. (John, xiv. 26. xvi. 13.) St. Mark and St. Luke indeed were not of this number, but the reason of the case extends to them; and there is no cause to think, that in that miraculous age, when there was so plentiful an effusion of the spirit, those men should be left wholly to themselves in compiling those writings, which are of perpetual use and benefit to the church. Indeed, as both the Jewish and Christian religion are founded upon facts, it seems a sort of inconsistency in the divine conduct, that the Historians, who record these facts, should be left exposed to all the mistakes and inconveniences of human frailty. God himself was the King of the Jews in a peculiar manner, and the history of that church and nation is in effect the history of his government. And therefore it seems not at all wonderful, that men raised up by his providence, should be guided by his spirit, to record, as it were, the actions of his own reign.

But I have been too tedious already to engage in this point at present; let me only say, that from the character of the persons who wrote these histories, as far as these authors can be known; from the character they have always borne in the Jewish, and in the Christian church; and from the countenance given to this character by our Lord and his Apostles; it should seem, that they are of a class far superior to any human writings. Jews as well as Christians have had other historians who wrote with great faithfulness, as well as other moralists, who wrote with a pious intention; yet we see these qualifications did not advance them to the same high rank with the other, nor are their compositions reckoned a part of the sacred volume. It must be want of acquaintance with the Scriptures, or prejudice against them, that hinders us from subscribing to this judgment of antiquity. For to a mind duly disposed to study them, they discover their origin by their own intrinsic excellence. They may not be all of the same usefulness and dignity; nor are any other of the works of God; but in this, as in other respects, resemble the lights of heaven; where though one star differeth from another star in glory, yet they all declare the glory of God, and proclaim the omnipotence and the wisdom of him that made them.

SERMON XXIII.

By GLOCESTER RIDLEY, LL.B.

The Divinity and Personality of the HOLY GHOST asserted from the New Testament.

ACTS, XIX. 1, 2, 3.

And it came to pass, that while Apollos was at Corinth, Paul having passed through the upper coasts, came to Ephesus; and finding certain disciples, He said unto them, Have ye received the Holy Ghost since ye believed? And they said unto him, We have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost. And he said unto them, Unto what then were ye baptized? And they said, unto John's baptism.

ST. PAUL, set apart to the ministry by the spirit of God, and by him directed and assisted in the discharge of it, applies himself with all diligence to the work; as occasions required, preaching the gospel (Acts, xiv. 21.); strengthening the disciples (Acts, xviii. 23.); ordaining elders (Acts, xiv. 23.); confirming the churches (Acts, xvi. 41.); and publishing the apostolical decrees (Acts, xvi. 4.) When he met with disciples, to whose proficiency he was a stranger, the text informs us what method this skillful apostle took to let himself readily into a knowledge of it, in order to address himself the most properly to their necessities. The cardinal question with him was, Have ye received the Holy Ghost since ye believed? But how astonished was he to hear the answer of these supposed Christians at Ephesus, We have not so much as heard, whether there be any Holy Ghost! Supposing them Christians, lately converted, as St. Paul apprehended, such ignorance was not to be accounted for: instruction in this point being of the very essence and first rudiments of their religion; Unto what then, says he, were ye baptized? They inform him, that they had never received Christ's baptism, only that of John. This sufficiently solved the difficulty, and pointed out to the apostle what was necessary for these Ephesian disciples, which he accordingly supplies by baptism. (Acts, xvi. 5, 6.) and imposition of hands.

This passage of scripture will naturally lead us to observe, 'That a knowledge of the Holy Ghost is essential to Christianity,' as of one to whom we are consecrated at our baptism, and as an article of that faith required of every man before he be admitted to that sacrament. When the Ephesians tell St. Paul, We have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost, he immediately asks, unto what then were ye baptized? We learn farther, 'That it is not sufficient for a Christian barely to have a speculative knowledge or faith in the Holy Ghost, but also that he receive him : ' Have ye received the Holy Ghost since ye believed? Which will open to an enquiry 'into the expediency and necessity of receiving him,' which is of so great importance that St. Paul makes it his leading question in order to judge of the true state and proficiency of these Ephesian disciples. And this will fitly afford an occasion of considering 'the means by which the Holy Ghost is usually dispensed to us,' of which we have here some information, They were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus. And when Paul laid his hands upon them, the Holy Ghost came on them. Points which our divinely instructed Apostle thought of the utmost importance to Christianity, and therefore never unseasonable from a Christian teacher : points immediately flowing from that mysterious truth, which this lecture was intended to inculcate, and therefore not foreign to the occasion of my appearing here at this time : and as the learning of my predecessors has omitted nothing which relates to the other branch of this doctrine, viz. the second person of the ever blessed Trinity, it becomes the most proper business of their successor to apply himself to this less cultivated province : and I wish I could not add, that the carelessness of many supposed Christians, sinking them almost into the state of the Ephesian disciples, of not knowing whether there be any Holy Ghost, and the unwholesome remedies which mistaken zeal has applied to reform this evil, have made an attempt of this kind now particularly necessary. I shall therefore endeavour to inform the ignorant, and satisfy the perplexed Christian in the four following points ;

I. That there is an Holy Ghost ; wherein I shall endeavour to state the scripture doctrine of his essence and personality.

II. In what manner he is received ; and how we may know whether we have received him or not.

III. To what ends the receiving of him is necessary. And,

IV. The means by which we may receive him.

In treating of which, may the Blessed Spirit, who is the subject of them, so cleanse the thoughts of our hearts by his gentle inspiration, that all carnal affections being subdued, they may be open to receive his light and truth, in the sober use of those means which he has appointed, prayer, (James, i. 5.) and the word of God ! (John, 5, 39.)

First I shall shew that there is an Holy Ghost, and endeavour to state the scripture doctrine of his essence and personality.

Spirit, or in old British, Ghost, is a name of kind, taken in scripture rather negatively, in opposition to what it is not, than defining what it is ; as, a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me have (Luke xxiv. 39.) : and it is likewise distinguished from the animal soul and flesh, as by St. Jude, sensual [or animal] having not the Spirit. Wherefore it would be a great mistake to ascribe to the Holy Ghost such effects and operations, as owe themselves only to the flesh or animal life. To these it is really opposed ; but it is called a Spirit only by a metaphor or analogy, as the nearest approach which the grossness of our ideas, the types of sensible objects, can make to the true nature of it. Its subtilty, and activity, mighty in its effects, but indiscernible in its operation, are the points of comparison ; and therefore applied to God, and to angels whether good or evil, and to the human or rational soul. But when applied to these, it would be absurd to understand the word in its strict and proper signification, so as to infer the same qualities, properties, and effects in them, as in the air or wind itself. If God, for his powerful and boundless energy be called a spirit, and be described as flying upon the wings of the wind, (Ps. xviii. 10.) yet would it be strange divinity to infer from thence an inconstancy and changeableness in him, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning. (James i. 17.) If he maketh his angels spirits, (Heb. i. 7.) sent forth to minister for those who shall be heirs of salvation, (Heb. i. 14.) the revelation, which tell us so, would be of little use, should we argue from thence, that their voice was delusive and unmeaning as the echo, repeating nothing but what ourselves first gave out; that they were in this respect become wind also, and the word was not in them. (Jer. v. 13.) So again the human soul, itself undiscerned, yet discovered by its effects, when we hear the sound thereof in the voice of reason, is called the spirit that is in man, (Job, xxxii. 8.) as it blows where it listeth, (John iii. 8.) because we cannot command it to animate what nass we please, and know not whence it cometh or whither it goeth; but to stretch the comparison farther than the points of similitude intended, would lead us to that false conclusion of the ungodly, that we shall be hereafter as though we had never been, because the breath in our nostrils is as smoke, and our spirit shall vanish as the soft air. (Wisd. ii. 2, 3.) As it hath pleased God to convey the knowledge of heavenly things to us only by the mediation of sensible objects, we must remember, that these sensible objects are but types and characters of what they signify, and not the things themselves; wherefore as the resemblance is not universal, the application should be limited; and not carried farther than scripture warrants, nor ever be interpreted literally, only by analogy: otherwise the wildest fancies and grossest conceits may be advanced as true divinity, if we will admit for such, all the conclusions which a lively imagination may extract from metaphor.

After having guarded against these grosser errors which rise from a confusion of kind, we may proceed to distinguish this spirit more particularly from all others, to which the name is common, by the character annexed, the Holy Ghost. It is therefore very different from the spirit that is in man, which was so disordered by the fall of Adam, that far from communicating holiness for the sanctifying of others, it has none inherent in itself, but every imagination of the thoughts of our hearts are only evil continually. (Gen. vi. 5.) And still more so is it from those spirits or angels whose character is directly opposite to this, and who are called evil angels, (Psal. lxxviii. 49.) foul, (Mark, ix. 25.) unclean spirits. (Mat. x. 1.) It remains then that this Holy Ghost is either one of the good angels, or the spirit and substance of God himself.

How immense soever the distance may be betwixt creature and creator, yet the soul of man is so inconveniently situated, as not easily to discern it through the interposition of the senses. If we usually take our accounts of the sun, not by his real appearance in the heavens, but by the shadows which he casts among us; how much more when we would search out God, who dwells in the light which no man can approach unto, (1 Tim. vi. 16.) must we be sent to judge of him by the dusky mediums that intervene? If the invisible things of him are clearly seen, (Rom. i. 20.) yet it is no otherwise than as they are understood by the things that are made. Right reason can proceed safe enough by making due use of the index, yet denying any exact resemblance; but imagination is apt to perplex us, by always representing the medium, and confounding the properties of the sign with the thing signified; and by mistaking these indices for just representations. Sceptics deny all divine truths, and bigots believe any absurdity. When God would exhibit himself to Elijah, and signify his power and anger against the impieties of Ahab and Jezebel, a great and strong wind rent the mountains, (1 Kings, xix. 11, 12.) after that came an earthquake, and after that a fire; yet the Lord was not in the wind, the earthquake, or the fire: so if God be called a spirit or a fire, we must not expect to find the real essence or attributes of God in those symbols; for they are both of them creatures: whence it must be great rashness to infer or conclude strictly from the symbols, as it will endanger either our faith, or our reason, and lead to infidelity or a blind credulity. In the point before us, the term itself will not discover to us, whether the spirit spoken of, be the divine nature to which it is sometimes applied analogically, or whether it be a created substance, which it signifies properly. In order to discover this, we must search the scriptures, which alone can inform us what are the appropriate characters which distinguish God and the creature; and which of these characters are applied to the Holy Ghost. The divine nature is set forth to us, 1. by incommunicable attributes which flow from, and declare his essence: 2. by works which testify those attributes, and which are impossible for creatures to perform : and 3. by an appropriate honour which is the creature's acknowledgment of him.

1. The incommunicable attributes, which flow from and declare his essence, are principally these; Omniscience, Omnipresence, Eternity, and Omnipotence. These cannot agree with the limited perfections of a creature, and are the scripture characters of God, whose understanding is infinite; (Psal. cxlvii. 5.) the fulness which filleth all in all; (Eph. i. 23.) which is, and which was, and which is to come, the Almighty. (Rev. i. 8.) The spirit then to which these attributes are given in scripture is God. But these are ascribed to the Holy Ghost, the spirit which searcheth all things, yea the deep things of God? (1 Cor. ii. 10.) which leadeth unto all truth, (John xvi. 13.) and is therefore called the Spirit of Wisdom and Revelation. (Eph. i. 17.) He is the very argument and testimony of God's Omnipresence, who dwelleth in us how widely soever dispersed and scattered by his spirit. (1 John iv. 13.) He is called the eternal spirit; (Heb. ix. 14.) and though this text should be thought rather to signify the divine nature which was in Christ, than point to the Holy Ghost mentioned in the text, yet we cannot but conceive Him eternal whom we read of moving upon the waters, ere time began, before the evening and the morning made the first day, (Gen. i. 2.) and who shall abide for ever. (John xiv. 16.) Nor can he be otherwise than Omnipotent, who is the finger of God, (Luk. xi. 20. compared with Math. xii. 28.) and the power of the Highest. (Luk. i. 35.) If any expect abatement to be made for these poetical expressions, as owing themselves to the oriental grandeur, I must observe, so far from that, that on the other side allowances must be made for the poverty of language, which faints beneath the weight of that truth, it was intended to carry: which will appear by appealing,

2. To the works peculiar to God, and which are testimonies of his attributes. Thus St. Paul tells us, His eternal power and godhead are clearly seen from the creation of the world; (Rom. i. 20.) and God challenges it solely to himself without the aid or ministry of others; I am the Lord that maketh all things, and stretcheth forth the heavens alone. (Is. xlv. 24.) Yet by his word were the heavens made, and all the host of them by the spirit of his mouth, (Psal. xxxiii. 6.) and by his spirit he garnished the heavens. (Job, xxi. 13.) So again it was God who breathed into man the breath of life, (Gen. ii. 7.) in whom we live, move, and have our being. (Acts, xvii. 28.) Yet holy Job tells us, that the spirit of God made him, and the breath of the Almighty gave him life. (Job, xxxiii. 4.) The divine power which (Rom. i. 4.) raised up Christ from the dead was the spirit of holiness, and who likewise shall quicken our mortal bodies, (Rom. viii. 11.) and the miracles which none can do except God be with him, (Joh. iii. 2.) are the gifts, (1 Cor. ii. 4.) and demonstration of the Spirit. (1 Cor. xii. 4. 10.) From his omniscience he is enabled to teach all things (Joh. xiv. 26.); and from his omnipresence, to accompany the apostles, and give them power to be witnesses both in Jerusalem and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth. (Acts, i, 8.)

3. When God's attributes are proved from his works, he expects man's acknowledgement of his divinity by a peculiar honour, which honour he will not give or allow to another. (Is. xlii. 8.) Such are religious invocation and address; consecrating ourselves to his service by baptism; benediction in his name; and dedicating temples to him. Yet this honour we are allowed to pay to the Holy Ghost, but to no created power whatever. Thus our Saviour directs us, Pray the Lord of the harvest that he would send forth labourers into the harvest. (Mat. ix. 38.) But the Holy Ghost is the lord of the harvest; it was he that separated Paul and Barnabas (Acts, xiii. 2.); whose office in general it is to appoint overseers over the flock to feed the church of God (Acts, xx. 28.); and who is expressly mentioned as the lord of the harvest in this text by St. Luke, who tells us, as the most ancient MSS. read, that Christ chose the apostles through or by the Holy Ghost. And he only can be that third person distinct from the Father and the Son to whom St. Paul prays in both his epistles to the Thesalonians, That the Lord would make them increase and abound in love, to the end he might establish their hearts in holiness before God even the Father, at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. And again, The Lord direct your hearts into the love of God, and into the patient waiting for Christ. (1 Thes. iii. 12, 13. 2 Thes. iii. 5.) The Lord here addressed to is neither the Father, nor the Son, and is sufficiently pointed out to be the Holy Ghost, as the author of love and of holiness. Another instance of this honour is renouncing all other gods, and solemnly dedicating ourselves to the service of the true God, by being baptized into his name; an honour which St. Paul seems as fearful lest any should ascribe to him, as the angel in the Apocalypse lest St. John should worship him (Rev. xxii. 9.); and blesses God that he had baptized two only, lest any should say that he baptized in his own name (1 Cor. i. 15.); yet this baptism is appointed to be equally in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost (Matt. xxviii. 19.); and being then adopted by the Spirit, and born of the Spirit, we thereby become the sons of God. Another branch of religious worship is blessing: for this purpose the tribe of Levi was separated to stand before the Lord and to bless in his name. (Deut. x. 8.) When St. John wrote to the seven churches in Asia, he wishes them grace and peace not only from Him who was, and is, and is to come, but also from the seven spirits which are before his throne, and from Jesus Christ (Rev. i. 4.): where the number regards not a multiplicity of persons, but the manifold graces of the Holy Ghost. In which manner St. Paul blessed his Corinthians long before; The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost be with you all. Amen. (2 Cor. xiii. 14.) The fourth instance of religious honour was consecrated temples, which is always done either to the true, or to a falsely reputed God. And the true God reckons the building or making temples to others, as a forsaking of him. Israel hath forgotten his Maker, and buildeth temples. (Hos. viii. 14.) But our bodies are the temples of the Holy Ghost. (1 Cor. vi. 19.) And St. Paul avows the consequence, exhorting to flee fornication, lest we defile our bodies, for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are. (1 Cor. iii. 17.) From these arguments, and more of the like nature, we should certainly be led to infer that the Holy Ghost is no other than the Divine Spirit, very God. And that we should be safe in such an inference appears from this, that the divinely instructed apostles themselves have often made it before us. Because the Holy Ghost dwells in us, therefore our bodies are the temples of God. St. Peter informs us that Prophecy came not of old time by the will of man, but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. (2 Pet. i. 21.) But St. Paul tells us that this Holy Ghost was God. For all scripture, says he, is given by inspiration of God (2 Tim. iii. 16.); and it was God who at sundry times, and in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers by the prophets. (Heb. i. 1.) Which justifies the conclusion generally drawn from the passage in the Acts, where the case of Ananias and Sapphira is related, Why hath Satan filled thine heart to lie unto the Holy Ghost?—thou hast not lied unto men, but unto God. (Acts, v. 3, 4.) Nay the very incommunicable name Jehovah is frequently ascribed to him by the evangelical writers. We are informed in the pentateuch that the Lord (יהוה) spake unto Moses, saying, Let them make me a sanctuary, that I may dwell among them; according to all that I shew thee, even so shall ye make it. (Exod. xxv. 1, 8, 9.) St. Paul referring to this, says, that Moses was admonished of God, when he was about to make the tabernacle according to the pattern shewed him; which pattern he informs was typical, a figure for the time present, the Holy Ghost, signifying thereby such and such truths. (Heb. viii. 5. comp. with Heb. ix. 9. See also Heb. viii. 10. comp. with Heb. x. 16.) And to mention no more, in the 6th of Isaiah, the prophet represents the Lord (Jehovah) sitting upon the throne, high and lifted up, and his train filled the temple. Above stood the seraphim, and one cried unto the other and said, Holy, holy, holy, Lord

God of Hosts, the whole earth is full of his glory. And Isaiah heard the voice of the Lord saying, whom shall I send, and who will go for us? then said I, here am I, send me. And he said, go and tell this people, hear ye indeed, but understand not: and see ye indeed, but perceive not, &c. (Isaiah, vi. 1, 2, 3, 8.) There is no question made, but that this is the true God: yet here we have an intimation of a plurality in his essence, in the 8th verse. Whom shall I send, and who will go for us? and a farther intimation in the 3d verse, that this plurality is a Trinity, Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of Hosts! And agreeably to these intimations those inspired commentators, St. John and St. Luke, include the second and third persons of the Trinity in this idea of the Lord God of Hosts; the first ascribing the glory then seen to the Son (John, xii. 41.); and the latter, in his history of the Apostles, ascribing the words to the Holy Ghost. (Acts, xxviii. 25.)

If then that spirit, to which divine incommunicable attributes, works, honour, and names are ascribed, is God; and if divine revelation be the proper evidence from whence only we can receive information in this point, how can we conclude otherwise than that the Holy Ghost is God? Will it be said the evidence has been tampered with, and corrupted by the Catholics? Yet here the various copies, versions, and additions agree, abundantly sufficient to support the premises. Will they say the conclusion is illogical? Yet the first Christians, who are likely to be the best interpreters of Scripture, were fully in the belief of it; future synods and councils found no cause to censure their faith in this article, but established it by their suffrages and decrees; may the one half of our adversaries the Sabellians and Socinians have allowed it: only Arius and Macedonius, with such as fight from their tents, have had courage enough to encounter those arguments, and attack the divinity of the Holy Ghost. The others infer it so necessarily, as to persuade themselves, that he is no other than the very person of the Father, considered under a different mode of acting; or that he is a quality or energy of the divine nature. But this is an error as little countenanced in scripture, as that which would degrade him into the rank of creatures, for from thence we learn that the Holy Ghost has a personal subsistence, and is therefore more than a quality or energy of the divine nature; and that this personal subsistence is distinct from the person of the Father, and also of the Son.

Thus, to know and to will are personal properties; but these are affirmed of the Holy Ghost. The things of God knoweth no person but the spirit of God, ὁ θεὸς ἡ καὶ πνεῦμα. (1 Cor. ii. 11.) And, all these worketh that one and the self-same spirit, dividing to every man severally as he will, (1 Cor. xii. 11.) And agreeably hereto he is represented as decreeing (Acts xv. 28.), as appointing to the Ministry (Acts, xiii. 2.), as speaking (John, xvi. 13.), as giving (1 Cor. xii. 7.), and as witnessing (John, xv. 26.): he is also said to come (John, xvi. 13.), to dwell (Rom. viii. 9. 11.), to be resisted (Acts, vii. 51.), and the like, which with many more, naturally lead to the Catholic belief that the spirit thus characterised must be a person. And indeed Sabellius is consistent enough; for, as from the former arguments he acknowledges the Holy Ghost to be God, so from these he acknowledges him to be a person, no other than the person of God the Father. But the opinion of the Socinians finds no countenance here; a chief master in that school first lays down as a principle, that the Holy Ghost is a mere quality, neither a person nor a substance, for these two reasons; 1. Because he is called the Spirit of God, and the Spirit of Christ, therefore it is not a person itself, but only the quality of a person; and, 2dly, because it is elsewhere called the power of God, which is a mere quality, and we ought not without great and sufficient cause to leave the propriety of words, and explain them in an improper sense. But it has been already seen, that in divine subjects we cannot conclude strictly from the primary or proper signification of the terms. 2dly, I observe, that the Jews (and to them, and by them, was the revelation made) had other ideas of those terms than Crellius would recommend to us; they believed the spirit which is the soul of a man was the person of the man; and that a proselyte at his baptism received another spirit, or soul, whereby he became another man. Baptism therefore was called among them regeneration and a new birth, and the New Testament is full of allusions to these notions, which shews they were common at that time, as, being born again (John, iii. 3.), putting off the old man (Col. iii. 9.), becoming new creatures (2 Cor. v. 17.), and the like: so again power among the Jews, in theology, signified more than a quality; it certainly meant a person; when angels, principalities, and powers (Rom. viii. 38.) are ranked together, persons are meant at least, if not spirits that were persons, and Simon Magus was believed by some to be the great power of God: and among their writers the power signifies the person of God himself, agreeably to which our Saviour is described as sitting at the right hand of power. (Matt. xxvi. 64.) Wherefore by his own rule Crellius should have observed the propriety of idiom among those who used it, and thence inferred the personality of the Holy Ghost from his being the spirit of God, and the power of the Highest. And when to this so many personal properties are assigned to him in scripture, his old rule will never help him to guard against the Catholic conclusion. Others therefore have recourse to rhetoric, and resolve some of those expressions into a prosopopeia, by applying to the attribute that personality which properly belongs to him whose the attribute is; as the Holy Ghost said, separate me Saul and Balaam, means, that God by his wisdom said so. And where this figure will not serve their purpose, they suppose a metonymy, ascribing personal properties to the spirit of God, which belong to the man who is assisted by the spirit, as, the spirit searcheth all things, means, the true believing Christian, in whom God's spirit is, searcheth all things. But neither of these figures will interpret the personal properties ascribed to the Holy Ghost. There are no less than six ascribed to him in one single verse, When he (the other comforter understood) the spirit of truth is come, he shall guide you into all truth; for he shall not speak of himself, but whatsoever he shall hear that shall he speak, and he shall shew you things to come. (John, xvi. 13.) No figure will enable us to interpret this text quite through, either of the person of the Father, of whom the Holy Ghost is supposed to be an attribute; or of the persons of the Apostles, to whom it was promised to be communicated! If of the latter, this must be the English of it; the Apostles by the assistance of divine wisdom shall come, and guide themselves into all truth, and shew themselves things to come. Neither can we interpret it of the person of the Father, and say, that when he shall guide them into all truth, yet he shall not speak of himself, but whatsoever he shall hear, that shall he speak. From whom should he hear it? Our Saviour proceeds, he shall receive of mine and shew it unto you. That is, the Father shall receive knowledge of the man Christ Jesus (as the Socinians teach) and shew to it the Apostles. But if our Saviour says, he shall receive of mine, because all things which the Father hath are mine, then to interpret it of the person of the Father makes this nonsense of it; he shall not speak of himself, but whatsoever he hears or receives of himself, that shall he shew. Such artful expositors of scripture are the Socinian writers! Their faith disdains mysteries: nothing less than absurdities will satisfy them. So that the Holy Ghost is undoubtedly a person; for he has personal attributes or properties assigned him, which no figure can account for, in referring them either to the person of God the Father, whose the spirit is; or to the person of the believing Christian, to whom the spirit is communicated.

Nor is he only represented in scripture as a person, but also as a person plainly distinct from the Father; I will send unto you from the Father the spirit of truth, which proceedeth from the Father. (John, xvi. 26.) And in other places he stands personally distinguished both from the Father and the Son. As in the form of baptism; in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. (Matt. xxviii. 19.) The words point to a distinction of persons, and the doctrine of baptism confirms such an interpretation. For at the first baptism, I mean that of Christ himself, they were all three present, and had distinct personal offices; It came to pass that Jesus being baptized,

... the Holy Ghost descended in a bodily shape like a dove upon him, and a voice came from heaven, saying, Thou art my beloved Son, in thee I am well pleased. (Mark, i. 11. Luke, iii. 22.) And in the future baptism of Christians, the mercy of God the Father saves us by the renewing of the Holy Ghost shed on us through Christ. So again the form of benediction, The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost (2 Cor. xiii. 14.), denotes three persons, with their oecomenical characters.

I might proceed to multiply texts, but I think these are sufficient, to prove against Socinus, that the Holy Ghost is a person, and not a mere quality or attribute only. Also, against Sabellius, that the person of the Holy Ghost is distinct from the person of the Father and the Son: as we had before proved against Arius and Macedonius, that the Holy Ghost was God.

Truths, which not only the Catholic church of Christ has always maintained, as drawn from, and proved by clear testimony of divine revelation; but which also our adversaries have divided among them, and therein approved our exposition. Does the church teach that the Holy Ghost is God? So acknowledge Sabellius and Socinus, not prejudiced in favour of the Catholic opinion, but convinced by the plainness of the scripture proofs, which they think so strong, as to infer from thence, that he is no other than God the Father. Does the church teach moreover, that the Holy Ghost is a person, and distinct from the Father? The evidence for this is so obvious through the New Testament that Arius and Macedonius, as little biassed by the authority of the church as the others were, draw the same conclusions from the same scriptures; and believe him a person so distinct, as to make him a creature. Search the scriptures; their obvious meaning teaches this doctrine: if we doubt, consult their early expositors; this is their interpretation: examine what adversaries say; they are not agreed together, but the result of their evidence is a confession of these truths. Appeal to councils; this is their decreed form of faith. From all which, we believe in the Holy Ghost, the Lord and giver of life; therefore a person; proceeding from the Father; and therefore distinct from him: who with the Father and the Son together be worshipped and glorified; which ought not to be, unless he be God.

As to the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father and the Son, there was a dispute which long subsisted betwixt the eastern and western churches. The eastern chose to stick close to the words of scripture, which expressly mentions only his procession from the Father, and were jealous of the western church: lest they should insinuate two fountains of the Divinity, while they maintained his procession from the Son, as well as from the Father. But the western church intended no such conclusion as the Greeks were afraid of; yet held the procession from the Son, because the Father and the Son were, not two separate fountains of divinity to the Holy Ghost, but one God, one undivided source and original: and maintained their opinion by an easy deduction from scripture, which teaches us that he is the spirit of God (1 Cor. vi. 11.); and call him, if sometimes the spirit of the Father, so at other times the spirit of the Son (Gal. iv. 6.) and of Christ. (Rom. viii. ix. Phil. i. 19. 1 Pet. i. 11.) If the Father be said to send him, so also Christ promises, I will send him to you. (John, xv. 26.) If he be said expressly to proceed from the Father, he is no less clearly intimated to proceed from the Son, as when he says the Holy Ghost de meo accipiat, shall receive of mine. (John, xvi. 14.) But if jealousy of error began the dispute, a proper indignation in the Greeks widened it, because the Latins presumed to add the clause to their creed, without the sanction of a council. However, they are and were all along agreed in the truth itself, that the Holy Ghost is the spirit of both: the caution of the Greeks was not meant to deny so much, nor the forwardness of the Latins to assert more.

The Holy Ghost therefore is, "a person, proceeding from the Father and the Son, distinct from each," and "God:" to which when we have added, that "yet there is but one God," and that he is consequently "not another but the same God with the Father and the Son;" we have then declared the whole scripture account of what the Holy Ghost is.

And here our adversaries triumph over the credulity of the Catholic Christians, whose faith can swallow such absurdities. For this, anti-scripturists reject the evidence of divine revelation, and heretical scripturists explain it away: both betraying their consent, that the plain sense of scripture is against them: both agreeing to supersede its authority, and carry their appeal from thence to the senses. But it is as absurd, as an appeal of sounds to the eye, or of colours to the ear. How can they be the sufficient judges of what never fell within their notice, of what neither eye has seen, nor ear heard? (1 Cor. ii. 9.) The terms in which the truths are expressed, we acknowledge are improper; and it strictly taken, and pursued through all their consequences, will certainly lead us into error, if not into absurdity. But it is not our faith in the Trinity only, but our faith in God, that is subject to the same inconveniences. We are informed, that the eyes of the Lord are over the righteous, and his ears open to their prayers, but the face of the Lord is against them that do evil. (1 Pet. iii. 12.) Yet how is this consistent with our faith, that God has neither body, parts, or passions? Or if we believe that God is infinite, our idea is existence in every point of space, which implies multiplicity, or extension; but God is one, as well as without parts; and to make a multitude of one, is not less a mystery than the Trinity, and extension without parts is an absurdity in philosophy. Such inadequate judges are our senses of spiritual and divine truths! So unworthily do our imaginations delineate them! That we cannot form full, clear, and consistent ideas of them, is not owing to any real absurdity in the doctrines, but the disproportion of our faculties to receive them: and their being above human comprehension, is an argument that they did not spring from human invention. But of what use then is reason in religion, if it be inadequate to divine subjects? Must we not check its enquiries, and believe implicitly? By no means: religion is supreme reason, and though we are too short-sighted to discover all the agreements and harmony which constitute it, yet certainly we ought not to shut our eyes on that account; we are religious creatures only because we are reasonable ones. And revelation is so far from curbing and confining the exercise of reason, that on the contrary it enlarges it, opens a wider field to expatiate in, gives new principles to build upon, a greater variety of premises to conclude from. The error of bigots and free-thinkers too, is in not giving sufficient freedom and scope to thought. The first wrap up their talent in a napkin, unreasonably dreading the austerity of their Master: the others venture but half their principle, and use but a moiety of the treasure put into their hands; their reason travels no farther than their eyes or ears, nor listens (though God himself speaks) to any thing but the report of their senses. Whereas truths revealed by God, must be as solid a foundation to conclude from, as our own experience. The senses are indeed placed as centinels to guard against error: and therefore lest we should reject God's word, or give an easy ear to human imposture, he has been pleased to give sensible evidence that it came from him, and seal his revelations with variety of miracles. But when our senses have satisfied us, that the revelation does come from God, their judgment afterwards would be very impertinent concerning the properties, affections, and relations of divine objects. But reason proceeds never the less safe, and unembarrassed, and judges from proper evidence; not measuring heavenly things by sensible, but laying the several parts of the revelation together, and comparing spiritual things with spiritual. (1 Cor. ii. 13.) What sign shewest thou? (John, ii. 18.) was a fair and just question of the Jews to our Saviour, that they might be convinced that he came from God, accordingly he appeals to his future resurrection, and when he was risen from the dead, the word which Jesus had said was believed. (John, ii. 22.) But when Nicodemus, who had acknowledged him to be a teacher sent from God, impertinently asked him of his doctrine, How can these things be? (John, iii. 9.) instead of explication, he rests himself upon the authority and sufficiency of the evidence. Verily, verily, I say unto thee, we speak that we do know, and testify that we have seen. (Ver. 41.) Nor need we apprehend that at this rate the grossest contradictions may be admitted, and that transubstantiation itself will stand on as safe a footing as the doctrine of the Trinity: for this plain observation may be made; that when both the terms of a proposition are used only in an analogical, and not a proper sense, or our ideas are inadequate both to the subject and the predicate, we shall more easily fancy a contradiction than prove it: but the case is otherwise where the terms are objects of our senses, as in transubstantiation; there, though we cannot be proper judges of the divine virtue and efficacy communicated to the elements by the power of God, yet our senses are as good judges after consecration, as before, whether the elements continue in their substance bread and wine or not.

Others may say, that after the revelation is admitted for divine, it is not always easy to ascertain the sense and meaning of that revelation: how may we be satisfied about that? Here recourse must be had to the original languages in which the revelation was delivered, to grammar and criticism, history, and antiquity, to the best MSS. versions, and editions, to the quotations and interpretations of the primitive Christians, to the faith of the Catholic church, their disputes with heretics, and the decrees of general councils. All these conspire in support of the doctrine which has been now delivered.

Lastly, it may be asked, if this doctrine is of so great importance as the Catholics suppose it to be, how comes it to pass; that it was so lately discovered? That the Gentiles should be suffered to sit in such gross darkness for 4000 years; and the Jews themselves, those favourites of heaven, the nation of priests, who were entrusted with the divine oracles for the instruction of the world, should be totally ignorant of it? As the point supposed in the objection seems to receive some countenance from the text, where we find that the disciples, whether Jews or Greeks, (for both were St. Paul's auditors at Ephesus,) had yet never so much as heard whether there was any Holy Ghost; I intend (God willing) in my next lecture to occur at large to this objection.

In the mean time we need not fear to conclude with the words of Dionysius of Alexandria, a celebrated Father in the third century, and whom (from his wafers, and perhaps too uncircumspect opposition to Sabellianism) the Arians challenge as their own, who concludes his defence of himself with this form of doxology, derived to him from his ancestors in the faith, which shews us at once his own sense, and that of Catholic antiquity.

To God, both the Father and the Son our Lord Jesus Christ, with the Holy Ghost, be ascribed glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen.

SERMON XXIV.

By GLOCESTER RIDLEY, LL. B.

Why necessary to receive the Holy Ghost.

TITUS, iii. 5, 4, 5, 6, 7.

For we ourselves also were sometimes foolish, disobedient, deceived, serving divers lusts and pleasures, living in malice and envy, hateful and hating one another.

But after that the kindness and love of God our Saviour toward man appeared,

Not by works of righteousness, which we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us, by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost;

Which he shed on us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Saviour:

That being justified by his grace, we should be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life.

HAVING proved the divinity and personality of the Holy Ghost; and answered at large an objection urged against the novelty of this doctrine; having also explained the manner of receiving the Holy Ghost, shewing what his gifts and graces are, and how to distinguish them from counterfeits; I proceed to

The third enquiry which I proposed to make, namely, into the expediency of receiving the Holy Ghost: What is the end and benefit thereof?

Of great importance we should suspect it to be from St. Paul's making it his leading question to the Ephesian converts, Have ye received the Holy Ghost since ye believed? (Acts, xix. 2.) How great that importance is, is very explicitly set forth in the words before us. The sum of it is salvation; according to his mercy he saved us by the washing of regeneration and regeneration of or by the Holy Ghost. The parts which make up this salvation are, 1. An exemption from punishment by our acquittal in judgment, being justified; and, 2. A promise of great reward, eternal life. Both acts of mercy; for we of ourselves could not stand in that judgment, being as he describes, foolish, disobedient, deceived, serving divers lusts and pleasures, living in malice and envy, hateful, and hating one another: wherefore our justification is an effect of great love and kindness, it proceeds not from works of righteousness which we have done, but we are justified by grace: much less could we claim eternal life, which follows only upon such justification, and even then by promise, not of necessity; being thereby made heirs not necessarily but through hope of eternal life. The whole is ascribed to the Holy Ghost shed on us abundantly through Christ.

This representation is built upon a supposition that we are all sinners; the truth of this we must be convinced of, before we can be sensible of our want of grace, or apply ourselves in earnest to the means of receiving it.

We have seen the character St. Paul gives of the Christians in his time, that they were deep immersed in their sins when the gospel found them. And suppose ye that those Galileans were sinners above all the Galileans? (Luke, xiii. 2.) or that the Greeks and Barbarians were less corrupt? The Gentiles are plainly implied in the character when he says ἤμαρ γὰρ καὶ ἡμεῖς. We ourselves also were sometimes foolish, disobedient, &c. even we as well as others. And in his epistle to the Romans he gives a dreadful description of the Heathen world, so bent to sin, that they were abandoned to it, given up to vile affections and a reprobate mind. (Rom. i. 26, 28.) He tell us elsewhere, that all have sinned (Rom. iii. 23.); all the world is guilty before God.

(Rom. iii. 19.) Jew and Gentile are concluded under sin. (Rom. iii. 9.) The writers of the Old Testament give the same account; there is none that doeth good, no not one (Ps. xiv. 3.); there is not a just man that doeth good and sinneth not. (1 Kings, viii. 46.) The Pagans give the same account; St. Paul's contemporary Seneca complains that every one has sinned more or less; that there is not a man to be found who could acquit himself; that the misfortune of human nature is such, that there is a necessity and love of sinning; and he informs us, not only what men were at that time of day, but that heretofore they had sinned, and would continue to do so as long as they lived. All history and philosophy attest this truth; all laws, precepts, and government suppose it. But the strongest unhappiest proof of all, is, that every one of us knows it by experience; and if we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. (1 John, i. 8.) Was the case otherwise, we should have no occasion for, no interest in a Saviour; the end of his coming was to save sinners (1 Tim. i. 15.); they are the object of his mercy, and all men are the object of his mercy, for the grace of God to salvation has appeared unto all men (Tit. ii. 11.); and the gospel, the good tidings of peace and salvation, is commanded to be preached in all the world to every creature. (Mark, xvi. 15.)

The fact therefore is too notorious to be denied by any sober man; the greatest difficulty has been to account for so universal a pravity. If all men sin, under all circumstances and dispensations, there seems to be some original fault in our constitution, some unconquerable bias infused into it, which brings us under a necessity; and this removes the fault from our own wills, and transfers it to the Author of our nature. And indeed some original fault we must be obliged to acknowledge, not only from the above consideration, but also from the complaint of the Psalmist, that he was shapen, or brought forth, in iniquity, and in sin did his mother conceive him. (Ps. li. 5.) And that of upright Job, comparatively so at least; yet even he says, that no one was free from corruption, no though his life was but a day long: agreeable hereto we find the philosophers lamenting an inborn implanted principle of sin. Both Jews and Pagans used to offer sacrifice, and expiate the mother and the infant: and our Saviour informs us that the natural birth itself excludes us from heaven; that what is so born is flesh, which must be born again of the spirit before it enters there. (John iii. 5.) Whence it appears that we are born sinners, and infants must be accounted such, otherwise they have no claim to salvation through Christ. But will not this make God, the Author of our nature, the author also of sin? God forbid we should entertain so blasphemous a suggestion, which Christians and Heathens have jointly agreed to reject! though their accounts of it otherwise have been not a little wild and perplexed. However, as a knowledge of the disease is necessary to shew the aptness of the remedy, I shall with all humility enquire how this corruption is propagated, and how cleansed by the operations of the Holy Ghost.

In order hereto I find it will be convenient to take notice of two very remarkable and different accounts given of it in the third century of Christianity.

The one was Origen's, who supposed the present bias towards evil proceeded from ill habits contracted by the soul in a pre-existing state, where it had been created from eternity with an absolute freedom of will; but for their bad elections were encrusted with gross terrestrial bodies, and turned down into this world both for their punishment and their cure. That they undergo several changes and degrees of perfection and misery. Those who had once been angels, from an abuse of liberty were now become men, and those who now are men, by a right use of their liberty would become angels again; and that the very devils themselves should at length find a revolution in their favour. If we would know whence Origen drew his opinions, we must find out his school; his master Ammonius was a philosophical Christian; the disciple therefore derived his instructions from the scriptures and philosophy. And as we cannot find any foundation in scripture to build such tenets upon, we must trace up to the other source, and look for them among the writings of his favourite Plato. There we read of souls attending Jupiter; some of which by the pravity of their will, which he calls their charioteer, forsake the contemplation of truth, and thereby lose their wings, or those spiritual desires which lift them up to heaven; for which they are thrust into suitable bodies of philosophers, kings, artists, mechanics, and husbandmen; in which if they behave well, they obtain a better transmigration; if ill, a worse; till purged through different states, at length their wings grow again, i. e. their spiritual desires revive, and they revert to their first condition in heaven. And this doctrine of transmigration, with many others, Plato received from Pythagoras.

The other opinion which obtained much more in the same century was propagated by that arch heretic Manes: he taught two eternal principles; one was light, the author of good, and this was God; the other was darkness, the author of evil, and that was matter; that every one of us receives a soul from each of these, the one of which is a part of God, the other a part of the evil principle, which enters into our constitution and makes a part of it; that this was an evil substance, and the cause of natural corruption. And as necessity is inseparable from matter, from this evil principle proceeded a necessity of sinning; and that all things are done by fate, according to the eternal predestination of God with respect to these two contrary principles. These, or such like opinions were indeed espoused by elder heretics in the church, such as Cerdon, Marcion, and some others; but Manes seems rather to have succeeded to them as a Persian, and heir to the doctrines and books of his master, Terebinthus, deriving them from Zoroaster the contemporary and probably the acquaintance of Pythagoras. Contrary as these opinions look, it would be no great difficulty so far to reconcile them as to shew, with no little probability, that they both derived from the same tradition, which was divided amongst them, and corrupted. Notions of this evil principle we meet with among all nations, so widely scattered from one another, that they must have received it from some very ancient doctrine; the Jews, the Egyptians, the Romans, the Chinese, the Peruvians discover it; but these all suppose him to have been created, and the Persians in particular shew how they came by this opinion, calling him expressly by the name of Satan. These considering that angel only after his fall, and from a tradition of the temptation in paradise, fancied sin proceeded from the overpowerful influences of an evil principle; but the Grecian philosophers caught the other part of that angel's history, who fell from heaven by an abuse of his free-will, whence they taught that the will was free to good or evil, though both acknowledged that our immersion in matter lays a bias upon it to the last.

The unhappy increase and consequence of the Manichæan doctrines in the end of the third century, indulging men in their vices by throwing the blame on an evil nature and necessity of sinning, made Pelagius in the beginning of the 4th, a man eminent for his piety in the Christian church, endeavour to awaken men from this indolent giving way to vice, by magnifying the powers of nature and free-will, of which the Manichees had spoken too unworthily; and taught a freedom of will in all men to good or ill, without the assistance of grace; though he acknowledged that the flesh gives a propensity to ill, and that therefore the divine assistance was desirable to facilitate our choice of virtue. This was agreeable to the Platonic opinion before mentioned, a little new dressed and altered by Origen and his disciples. But it was contrary to scripture, which teaches us, that it is God, and not nature, that worketh in us both to will and to do (Phil. ii. 13.); that without Christ we can do nothing (1 John, xv. 5.) and therefore exhorts us, not only to watch according to our own powers, but also to pray (Matth. xxvi. 41.) for farther help, that we enter not into temptation: and as it is quite subversive of the doctrine of grace, was warmly opposed by St. Augustin before the middle of that century. His abhorrence of Pelagianism might perhaps make him fly too far towards the other extreme, to which when young he had been addicted; however some of his incautious followers have certainly too much inclined to Manichæism. Some dregs of which appear, not only in the Fomes Peccati of the Mahometans, which locally descended to them from the instructors of Manes who were Saracens; but also in the corrupted substance which the Zuinglians made original sin to be, and in the transformation of our natures into devils; being half devils and half beasts, as if our souls were emanations of the bad principle, imprisoned in bodies which we have in common with the brutes; in the doctrine of a necessity of sinning in consequence of God's predestination; and some others, which are originally Manichæism strained through the less guarded passages of St. Augustin.

I thought it convenient to take notice of these two very different accounts, and trace them up to their originals, 1. That I might remove out of the Christian church some strange doctrines which we find taught in it, and restore them to their true owners. 2. To observe that this universal corruption is assented to by men of all complexions, remote from one another both in sentiment and situation as east is from the west; the darkness of Paganism would not cover this truth, and heresy felt it in its own perverseness; no air or clime could heal the disease; fled men to China or Peru, the wound went with them. So that we must deduce it from the same common source that we derive our natures from, which is, the first parents of human kind. A third use which I would make of this view is, to be a check upon our judgments, that, since the extremes of free-will and necessary evil have introduced many errors into the Christian church, we be upon our guard, lest the authority of names, and veneration of persons, mislead us contrary to the scriptures. Let not the unblameable beginning of Pelagius's life seduce us into a vain confidence of our own strength, that we can do without Christ, to the overthrow of grace; nor the sanctity of that great light and champion of Christianity St. Augustin, who found cause to retract many things which his zeal had dropped, persuade us to leave off working out our own salvation (Phil. ii. 12.), from misinterpreted notions of God's decrees, and irresistible grace. I know no better guide to conduct us through this intricate question than that father himself is : he tell us, the true Christian "so asserts free-will as to impute the origin of sin, both in angels and men, to an abuse of that, and not to a nature essentially evil of which we have no account ; this utterly destroys Manichæism : at the same time, that the will, since captivated, cannot recover its liberty again but by the grace of God ; which destroys the heresy of Pelagius."

This is the true state of the case according to the scriptures : they will guard us against the two dangerous extremes of an arrogant merit to which we have no claim ; and the indolent excuse of fate and necessity, for which we have no grounds. If we examine those sacred records, they will inform us, that God created man in his own image (Gen. i. 27.) ; which Solomon explains, when he says, that God hath made man upright (Eccles. vii. 31.) ; able to weigh things with an equal balance, which had no light end to kick at spiritual good for want of knowledge, nor necessarily weighed down to earthly things from the overpoise of affections. An attribute ascribed to God by the prophet, thou upright, doest weigh the path of the just. (Isaiah, xxvi. 7.) Whence the book of Wisdom observes, that God, made man the image of his own propriety ; and so long as no perverse choice made him decline from this original uprightness, he had great variety of enjoyments prepared for him in Paradise, with privilege to eat of the tree of life, by which means he might live for ever. Thus man was created in incorruption, and his righteousness, had he continued in it, would have made him immortal. The knowledge of spiritual good, without which the will could not have been free, or have power to choose it, was not essential, but supernaturally vouchsafed by immediate revelations from God, and communications with him : immortality was not necessary to his nature, but the additional gift and reward of his Creator, to be-acquired by the use of means.

We are afterwards informed, that by the suggestions of the serpent, which the envy of the devil employed, (one of those angels who sinned and kept not their first estate (2 Pet. ii. 4. Jud. 6.) or dignity, but deserted their own habitations, fragments of which tradition we before observed among the philosophers ; through his suggestions, I say, we are informed that our first parents were prevailed upon to make a wrong election, choosing to indulge appetite, and the senses, rather than believe or regard the commands of information of heaven, by one obstinate act renouncing the divine assistance, and defying the mortality which God had threatened. The soul, which before was enlightened by the perpetual presence of God in it, after this voluntary departing from it was confounded in the darkness of its own natural faculties : all the knowledge he attained, was the comfortless experience of a benighted traveller ; he knew his sun was set, and that his own eyes would no longer serve him to escape precipices : they were indeed open, but discerned only the want of the divine light and protection : they could discover no traces to lead him where the light dwelleth (Job, xxviii. 12. 19.), nor was it in his power to command the morning, and call forth the day-star to rise in his heart again. Nor was this all his misery ; for the consciousness of his guilt introduced disordered passions into his soul, such as shame, fear, remorse, irregular appetites, and aversion from God. They made themselves aprons ; they were afraid ; and hid themselves (Gen. iii. 7, 8, 10.) from the presence of God. Thus his freedom of will was weakened towards spiritual good, by the want of that supernatural knowledge which made it a poise against carnal things ; and at the same time inclined to evil by the inlet and torrent of irregular passions. The consequence of this loss of righteousness, was loss of happiness : man thus disordered, and averse from God, could not but be miserable. His Maker therefore in justice deprived him of those blessings in paradise which were the entertainment of his innocence, and not without a mixture of pity too, excluded him from the opportunity of reaching to the tree of life, lest he should eat and live for ever (Gen. iii. 22.) ; and so immortalize a sinful and miserable being. Thus was he left to his own blind conduct and the sweat of his brow for a subsistence, subject to the calamities of his own diseased affections, and the tu-multum behaviour of his posterity born in the same condition, till the decays of age or wore or broke the springs of life, crumbling his body into original earth, and dismissing the soul, polluted with many habits of sin, and for ever deprived of its body, which was once designed its comfort and instrument of happiness, to spend its future existence in the remorse of past guilt, and a view of the ruin wilfully brought upon itself and human nature. The departure of the spirit of God from the soul, was the death of it. So Adam died in the day that he eat of the forbidden tree. The troubles and afflictions, which necessarily attended his deserted state, were the first scenes that opened upon him in this new region of death, the beginnings of his punishment:

—Præmis in faucibus Orci
 Leus et uinctus posuere cubilia caræ. Verg.

The dissolution of the body was but a single arrow from the loaded quiver of this king of terrors, and the natural consequence of being driven from the tree of life. The sorrowful widowhood of the soul, afterwards through ages of hopelessness, altogether make that eternal death which dying he was to die. (Gen. ii. 17.)

Such was Adam's sin, and such his punishment: the important question follows; How far are we concerned in either?

Adam for his sin was driven out of Paradise; and it is certain that his posterity were driven out with him. Labour and weariness were appointed to him; and we feel that the curse descends to those sprung from him; he became subject to diseases and death. I mean that which respects the dissolution of soul and body; and experience convinces us that he has left this unhappy inheritance to his children. And as all these were but the consequential punishment of that spiritual death which Adam died, in losing the divine assistance and support of God's holy spirit which he voluntarily renounced and forfeited; so the like appearances of sickness and decay in us, are a manifest proof, that where the root is cut off from the waters and receives no nourishment, the dew (Job, xxix. 19.) of heaven will not rest upon the branches to give them life and verdure. These were inflicted upon him as a punishment of his disobedience; in which punishment we are involved, without any personal guilt of our own; we therefore are sufferers on the account of Adam's sin, and are treated in the same manner that he was, whose actual guilt alone it was: forsaken of God; void of supernatural knowledge; strangers to, and averse from spiritual good; and immersed in the affections of a sensual life.

But there is a passage in the third of Genesis which seems to represent the consequences of eating of the forbidden fruit more like the glorious effects which the serpent promised: And the Lord God said, behold the man is become as one of us, to know good and evil. (Gen. iii. 22.)

Then was the devil no liar, and the throwing Adam, because thus improved, out of Paradise (as the following words sound) casts a reflection on the divine philanthropy. To avoid this sense of the words, many of the fathers, and I think the general stream of interpreters, suppose them a sarcasm used by God, as a kind of triumph over man's mistake and misery. But a still less harsh explication may be given, quite consistent with the words, and more agreeable to the tenor of scripture.

Mammonid observes that the tree is not said to be of the knowledge of true and false, which are the objects of the understanding; but of good and evil, not moral but natural, things pleasant and disagreeable to the sensual appetites. While Adam continued innocent, and followed the dictates of the divine reason, such objects made but transient and secondary impressions upon him; but when he renounced that guidance, and preferred sensual delights and entertainments, instead of spiritual truths, the mind was taken up with the apprehension of sensible objects, and given up to earthly and vile affections. This, according to that learned Jew, was the knowledge of good and evil. But if so, how could God say, Behold the man is become like one of us? What we translate of us, may be singular in the original, and is so rendered by Onkelos, ex eo. If therefore Adam אדם be taken collectively for human kind, as it frequently is when π is prefixed, as it is here, the sense of the passage will be this; Behold, all mankind issuing from this stock is as one, left to the guidance of sensual appetites; and therefore that they might not immortalize a miserable being, God excluded him, and them in him, from the privilege of eating of the tree of life. This represents God more like himself, mixing mercy with justice, and not triumphing over fallen man: this represents us, as we find ourselves, carnal, earthly, animal, a kind of reasoning brutes, entangled and entertained with sensible objects, and subject to the infirmities, wants, decays, and miseries which our own blindness and perverseness, and that of others like ourselves, expose us to. This leaves room (what many moderns are so solicitous about) for a Tully to shine in the knowledge of social duties resulting from natural and civil relations; and for a Newton's genius to exercise itself in observations upon nature as high as telescopes can reach, or low as microscopes descend. They may excel in degrees of the knowledge of such good and evil; but if they have no principles of farther knowledge, what furniture or felicity will this be to them, when all these things shall be dissolved (2 Pet. iii. 11.), when relations cease, and nature fails?

This interpretation harmonizes with the sacred writings in other places. St. Paul tells us, that through the offence of one, judgment passed upon all men to condemnation (Rom. v. 18.); that by one man's disobedience many were made sinners (Rom. v. 19.); through the offence of one, many be dead (Rom. v. 15.), or that in Adam all die. (1 Cor. 15, 22.) Wherefore we, (who are but the unfoldings and continuation of Adam) are counted or dealt with as sinners on the score of his actual guilt, and evidently share in the punishment which was inflicted on it. Thus Adam's sin is imputed to us, or reckoned and placed to our account, so far as to involve us in the sentence passed upon him. Thus infirmity was made permanent with the malignity of the root. (Esdr. iv. 22.) And because Adam transgressed, death was appointed in him, and in his generations, of whom came nations, tribes, peo- ple and kindreds out of numbers (iv. 7.)

But a late celebrated writer informs that "to affirm that the first actual sin of Adam was imputed to all mankind as well as to him, is to affirm what the scripture does not teach. And if to impute to other persons the actual sin of one, to account it theirs as well as his, it is evident this is impossible with God, who cannot account sin or any thing else to be what it is not." (Clark's xviith Ser. p. 303, 304.) An appetite to the tree of knowledge, and a degree to be wise in contempt of God's word, is the actual guilt of many of Adam's sons as well as of Adam. If God cannot account to some persons the actual sin of another, then can he not do what he has threatened, visit the iniquities of the fathers upon the children (Exod. xx. 5.); then could he not command, what we find recorded as his command. (Deut. xiii. 14, 15.) That if any city prove idolaters the inhabitants should be destroyed utterly, and all that was therein. Fathers, children, grand-children, great grand-children, and the new-born children, (as Maimonides expounds it) were all killed for the sin of their parents. Then again on Christ was not laid the iniquity of us all (Is. liii. 6.), we therefore must for ever bear our own actual sins. And if it be impossible for God to account sin to be what it is not, it is equally impossible for him to account it not to be what it is; wherefore the word of reconciliation (2 Cor. v. 19.) must seem an idle tale, since God cannot but impute our trespasses unto us. But if to account as ours, the actual sin of another, be so to place it to our account, as to involve us in the punishment inflicted upon, or due to that other; then, as Christ bore our sins upon the tree (1 Pet. ii. 24.); so to us may be imputed the transgression of Adam. And this the scripture does teach, when it informs us, that we are made sinners by his disobedience; and that all die in him. Truths which this writer could not but acknowledge, which he does in the next paragraph, where he tells us, that "the consequences of thus introducing sin into the world (by Adam) common with him and his posterity are, mortality, exclusion out of paradise, the miseries of the present life, and a greater liableness and stronger temptation to sin in their corrupt affections." These he says are the natural and necessary consequences of "his losing those free gifts and favours of God, which neither we nor he ever had any claim of right to enjoy." Yet as it is a loss to us of free gifts and favours which we are deprived of only for Adam's guilt, it is plain that his guilt is so far placed to our account, and imputed to us in punishment.

But we are not only made sinners by imputation, but become such, secondly, in consequence of the spirit of God receding from the soul, whereby we lose that divine image in which we were created, and are sunk in the darkness and ignorance of our own unassisted natural faculties. Adam was absolutely free to good as well as evil, but lost the principle of free-will by his distorted and perverse application of it: for the heavenly light withdrawn, left him and his posterity incapable of loving spiritual good, of which they were ignorant, by their estrangement from God, and the want of his gracious communications. Having the understanding darkened, being alienated from the life of God, through the ignorance that is in them, because of the blindness of their hearts. (Eph. iv. 18.) Nor were they only thus negatively bad; but thirdly, positively so, by having their affections determined to carnal things from the perpetual presence of those things, and the appearance of good which they exhibited to the senses, which work in them a disinclination and aversion to any attempt that is made to draw them off from their beloved engagements and deceptions. This is the old man, our original human nature, which the Apostle tells us is corrupt, through the deceitful lusts (Eph. iv. 22.) κατὰ τὰς ἐπιθυμίας ἡρώδης, appetites the consequence of error. This is the φρόνημα σαρκὸς, the disposition, wisdom or affection of the flesh, which hangs a bias on the will, and is the distortion and depravation of it. This concupiscence is the principle of actual sin in us, and as it would (if we are not assisted by the grace of God) be infallibly the parent of it, it has in itself the nature of sin, and casts us out of the favour of God. They that are in the flesh cannot please God

(Rom. viii. 8.) for its affection is enmity against him; it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be, (Rom. viii. 7.) And as thus by one man sin entered into the world, so

II. Also death by sin; as an alienation from God is a state of sin, so a state of sin is a state of death; wherefore the Gentiles are described as dead in trespasses and sins. (Eph. ii. 1.) The dissolution of soul and body follows as the wages of sin (Rom. vi. 23.), through which the body dies, which is the first death, while the soul in its perpetual exile shall suffer a second death (Rev. xx. 6.), burning in the flames of unsatisfied appetites which shall not be quenched, and suffering from the consciousness and remorse of past guilt, which shall never die.

Such is our fatal inheritance from Adam, affording abundant occasion for the divine philanthropy, to which not our merit, but our misery recommends us; and the salvation effected for us by the renewing of the Holy Ghost, is represented in the scriptures as corresponding to every part of our ruin, as an instance of grace, and to which we had no claim by nature.

If our old man be corrupt, through the loss of the divine image and similitude, by which our understandings are darkened, and our wills perverted, by this we are renewed again in knowledge after the image of him who created us (Col. iii. 10.), which is called our new man, created after God, in righteousness and true holiness. (Eph. iv. 24.)

If the φρόνημα σαρκὸς or natural concupiscence hangs a weight on our affections, and inclines them to earth, the φρόνημα πνεύματος or spiritual desires, is a balance against the carnal mind, and restores the will to its freedom, which is the glorious liberty of the sons of God. (Rom. viii. 5. 21.)

If the same natural concupiscence leads us to the commission of actual sins, and creates an enmity betwixt God and us (Rom. viii. 7.); our Saviour takes upon himself the sins of those to whom he sends the spirit of adoption (Rom. viii. 15. 32. 34.), to assure them of the love (Joh. iii. 16.), and engraft them into the family of God (Joh. i. 12.), and to seal them to the day of redemption. (Eph. iv. 20.)

Lastly, if this carnal mind be a principle of death in us, of a spiritual, a temporal, and an eternal death, the spirit is in us a principle of life and peace, (Rom. viii. 6.) quickening those who were dead in their sins by having forgiven them all trespasses. (Col. ii. 13.) The dissolution of soul and body is no more a death but sleep (1 Cor. xv. 20. 2 Thess. iv. 13, 14, 15.), a rest from labour (Rev. xiv. 13.), a returning home from exile (2 Cor. v. 8.), a passage to a blessed immortality. (Joh. v. 24.) The spirit which raised up Jesus from the dead, shall also quicken our mortal bodies (Rom. viii. 11.), and raise our corruptible in incorruption (1 Cor. xv. 42.), where our mortality shall be swallowed up of life. (2 Cor. v. 4.) A life more lasting and more glorious than this which is measured and influenced by suns and moons, for the glory of God will lighten it, and the Lamb will be the light thereof (Rev. xxi. 23.); where we shall reign for ever and ever, and receive from the Spirit the consummation of that bliss of which he is here the earnest.

As this account of the need and necessity of receiving the Holy Ghost in his enlightening, sanctifying, and quickening graces, is drawn from the sacred scriptures; so is it the genuine doctrine of the church of England, as may be seen not only in her articles of original sin, free-will, and justification; but also in her first rudiments laid down by Archbishop Cranmer and the rest of the committee of divines, in their treatise called a "Necessary Erudition for a Christian Man." Where we are thus instructed: "The state and condition of free-will was otherwise in our first parents before they had sinned, than it was either in them or their posterity after they had sinned; for our first parents, Adam and Eve, until they wounded and overthrew themselves by sin, had so in possession the power of free-will by the most liberal gift and grace of God their Maker, that not only they might eschew all manner of sin, but also know God, and love him, and fulfil all things appertaining to their supreme felicity. For they were created in a state of righteousness, and after the image and similitude of God, having power of free-will to obey or disobey. So that by obedience they might live, and by disobedience they should worthily deserve to die. From this most happy state, our first parents falling by disobedience, most grievously hurt themselves and their posterity: for besides many other evils that came by that transgression, the high power of man's reason and freedom of will were wounded and corrupted; and all men thereby brought into such blindness and infirmity, that they cannot eschew sin, except they be illuminated, and made free, by an especial grace, that is to say, by a supernatural help, and working of the Holy Ghost. Although there remains a certain freedom of will in those things which do pertain to the desires and works of this present life, yet to perform spiritual and heavenly things, free-will of itself is insufficient. And therefore the power of man's free-will being thus wounded and decayed, hath need of a physician to heal it, and an help to repair it, that it may receive light and strength, whereby it may see, and have power to do those godly and spiritual things, which before the fall of Adam, it was able and might have done."

I shall now proceed to consider the means of receiving these graces; but before I do so, it will be necessary to examine some doctrines, which, if true, will make those means so arbitrary, as to take away all encouragement and invitation to seek after them. This I propose to do (God willing) the next opportunity.

SERMON XXV.

The Means of Grace.

TITUS, iii. 4, 5, 6, 7.

But after that the kindness and love of God our Saviour toward man appeared,
Not by works of righteousness, which we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us, by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost;
Which he shed on us abundantly, through Jesus Christ our Saviour:
That being justified by his grace, we should be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life.

HAVING shewn that the occasion or want of grace is as universal as human nature; and that God's will and desire to save is represented as reaching to all men, I endeavoured to answer some objections drawn from the doctrine of election and reprobation, with regard to particular persons to whom the gospel is preached; and then with regard to whole nations from whom that light is at present withheld: I afterwards entered upon the consideration of the strongest argument against universal grace, I mean the supposed want of it for 4000 years, from the fall of Adam to the Ascension of Christ; where having shewn, that there was grace in various measures dispensed under the several dispensations before the law, under the law, and without the law, I proposed to remark more distinctly to what purposes the grace then dispensed was effectual, and what the disadvantages of those dispensations were, compared with that of the gospel; previous to my fourth and last enquiry, viz. into the means of that grace shed abundantly on us through Jesus Christ.

Under each of those states there was, by means of divine communications either immediate or remote, grace dispensed sufficient for the attaining a love of God; a knowledge of religious and social duties; a withdrawing the affections from the world; and a faith in the promises of good things beyond this life.

1. A love of God: Thus Enoch had a testimony that he pleased God (Heb. xi. 5.); and Noah was found perfect and righteous (Eccles. xlv. 17.); Job was upright and feared God (Job. i. 1.); and David's soul panted after him, loving nothing in comparison of him. (Psal. lxxiii. 24.) The gentile philosophy would supply us with many specimens of their exalted notions on this head, though the true object of worship was mistaken or unknown. The prayers, alms, and fasts of Cornelius (Acts, x. 4.): and the many devout worshippers among the Greeks (Acts, xvii. 4.), recorded in the New Testament, are more perfect instances of this love, even to the true God, the God of Israel.

2. The knowledge of religious and social duties was revealed to the antediluvian world, by which they were convinced of their ungodly deeds, which they ungodly committed. (Jude, 15.) These were handed down to the postdiluvians by Noah, and were called his precepts by his sons, who carried with them into all the regions of the new world the great lines of religion and morality. This was the law of the Most High which Abraham kept; which restrained Abimelech; which made Joseph dread to sin against God; and taught upright Job to eschew evil. But as this law was corrupted or obliterated, and in danger of being totally lost, God was pleased to republish it by Moses; while the broken fragments of it only were left to the rest of the world, which the legislators and philosophers have industriously sought after, and wove among their own systems of law and ethics. Their own reasonings and observations upon the fitness and beauty of those rules, which made them approve them, and give a sanction to them, where their divine authority was unknown, and their proper application and unfolding them in particular cases, was what St. Paul calls the work of the law written on their hearts. (Rom. ii. 15.) A third operation of the Holy Ghost in those days was a power in men to withdraw their affection from the world. Thus Moses chose rather to suffer affliction with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season; esteeming the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of Egypt. (Heb. xi. 25, 26.) Nay, the time would fail says the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, to tell of those before the coming of Christ who were stoned, were sawn asunder, were tempted, were slain with the sword; who wandered about in sheepskins and goatskins, being destitute, afflicted, tormented; who were tortured, not accepting deliverance, that they might obtain a better resurrection. (Ibid. 32, 35, 36, 37.) The Pagan moralists are full of these sentiments in their writings, and not entirely destitute of examples in their practice.

The fourth effect and sign of the Spirit of God in those early times, was a faith in the promises of good things beyond this life. By this, Abel offered a more acceptable sacrifice than Cain; and Noah became heir of the righteousness which is by faith: by this Abraham was justified, and thousands of his descendants died in full expectation of future good things. Among the Gentiles, besides those whose actions were in some degree influenced by the hopes of rewards and happiness hereafter, many we read of who renounced the world, gave in their names as worshippers of the God of Israel, in confidence of his favour in another world, becoming therefore his servants and soldiers, enlisted as St. Luke expresses it ἡγιασμένοι, or as we render it, ordained to eternal life. (Acts, xiii. 48.)

The principal disadvantages of their state in comparison of those under the gospel, were, that when they knew and felt their corruption they were strangers to the cure of it; St. Paul breathes out the melancholy sigh of men in that state when he cries, O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of death! But the Christian gives thanks to God for his redemption through Jesus Christ our Lord. (Rom. vii. 24, 25.) It is true the others were acquainted with rules to direct them, and believed that a behaviour conformable thereto would make them like God and happy; but the more light they had given them to discern their duty, the more heinous and dangerous their offences appeared, so that the commandment which was ordained to life they found to be unto death. (Rom. vii. 10.) But we know that Christ has redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us (Gal. iii. 13.) blotting out the hand-writing of ordinances that was against us, which was contrary to us, and took it out of the way, nailing it to his cross. (Colos. ii. 14.) They had indeed an indistinct faith that God would be favourable to them in another world, but whether he would entirely pardon their sins for which their consciences reproached them, or in what manner or measure he would punish them, they knew nothing of. But now not only a total remission of sins is preached by the word of reconciliation, but life and immortality is also brought to light through the gospel (2 Tim. i. 10.)

With regard to their final condition, it may be farther asked, whether the grace vouchsafed before the incarnation was sufficient to save those to whom it was given? If it was, what more can be obtained by Christians? If not, how does that deserve the name of grace, which served not to benefit, but perplex and disturb mankind? And here not charity only will lead us to hope, but truth oblige us to believe, that the ages before Christ came in the flesh had grace sufficient vouchsafed them, by which they might be saved. For Christ who was sacrificed for us was the lamb slain before the salvation of the world (Rev. xiii. 8.), for the redemption of the transgressions that were under the first testament. (Heb. ix. 15.) If no grace or favour was dispensed to them, but they all stand condemned in Adam's sentence, there seems no room left for another tribunal, to judge those whose consciences accuse or excuse them both in the law, and without the law, which yet, according to St. Paul's gospel, will be done in the day when God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ. (Rom. ii. 12, 16.) In which judgment the Ninevites who repented at the preaching of Jonah, i. e. under fewer means of grace, shall condemn the obstinacy of such as would not repent under greater, after the coming of Christ. Nay, we have our Saviour's word for it, that Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob shall sit down in the kingdom of God. (Matt. viii. 11.) Nor is this salvation confined to Jews only, as an exclusive privilege because God loved Jacob; for Esau whom he hated, as has been before observed, is not supposed to be finally lost or reprobated. Among his posterity, and out of the Jewish church, was holy Job, of whose salvation I think neither Jew or Christian ever doubted, who allowed him any existence. The Jewish doctors granted a place in the life to come to their proselytes of the gate, the devout Gentiles, who observed the moral law, not from a philosophical opinion of its beauty and fitness, but from a religious sense of its divine obligation, and from a love and dread of the Sacred Imposer. Of this number, among others, was Candace's eunuch (Acts, viii. 27.), and Cornelius the centurion (Acts, x. 1.), and other devout Greeks a great multitude. (Acts, xvii. 4.) A due use of their few talents recommended them to the trust of more from the preaching of the gospel; but such as behaved like them before Christ's ministry, cannot be supposed totally out of the reach of God's merciful acceptance. Not but that there will doubtless be a great difference betwixt them in their degrees of happiness; else there had been but little use in the ministry of Philip to the eunuch, or of St. Peter to Cornelius, or of Christ and his Apostles to the true Israelites and devout Greeks. And if the fewer allotments of grace will abate the number of stripes (Luk. xii. 48.) to those who transgress, we must with great justice suppose, that they will also make an abatement in glory to those who have used them worthily. The five talents of the Christians, well managed, procure for them the precedency over five cities; the two talents of the Jews will enable them to obtain two cities, though no more; and even the one talent of the Gentiles, if it had not been buried in the earth, but had been properly improved, would have recommended them to still farther means of grace through an acquaintance with the living oracles deposited in the keeping of the Jews, which was vouchsafed to some, by which means they would also have received, though not an equal reward with those who were more favoured, yet a proportionable one. (Matt. xxv. 14, &c.) The earthly Jerusalem is represented as a type of that which is above; and the tabernacle as the pattern of heavenly things. (Heb. viii. 5.) In which view the author of Ep. Hebr. observes many particulars, which seem to cast light upon this point. There was the court of the Gentiles, and others still nearer and nearer to the Divine Majesty for the Israelites and priests; but neither of these had permission to enter into the Sanctum sanctorum: the Holy Ghost thus signifying, that the way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest, while as the first tabernacle was yet standing, which was a figure for the time then present. (Heb. ix. 8, 9.) But God has prepared some better things for us: wherefore we, brethren, have boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus. (Heb. x. 19.) Nor was this all; for as the happiness was less, so the number of those who attained to it before the gospel dispensation, was probably much less than of those since the incarnation. But this, not because sufficient grace was denied, but because they resisted it, the generality of the old world brought the deluge upon it: however: this is no proof that the Spirit was not yet; for the Spirit strove to correct the imaginations of their hearts. (Gen. vi. 3. 5.)

If a very inconsiderable number of the Jews are sealed (Rev. vii. 4.), St. Stephen gives us the reason, not because there was no grace under that æconomy, but because they were uncomplying with it, stiff-necked and uncircumcised in heart and ears, they and their fathers always resisting the Holy Ghost. (Acts, vii. 51.) And with regard to the Gentiles, St. Paul tells us, that when they knew God, they worshipped him not as God, neither were thankful; wherefore even as they liked not to retain God in their knowledge, God gave them over to a reprobate mind. (Rom. i. 28.)

But though all these had light sufficient to have led them to some degrees of happiness in another life, and their voluntary departure from it will justly subject them to punishment; yet their want of that abundance which God undeservedly has afforded us, shall make it more tolerable even for Sodom and Gomorrah in the day of judgment, than for us, if we neglect such great salvation. (Heb. ii. 3.) The fear of greater punishment to those who reject greater grace, and the sure confidence of more abundant glory to those who have more abundant grace vouchsafed them here, should make us earnest to obtain the largest measures of it that we can, and diligent to improve what we do obtain. Which brings me to the last general head,

To enquire into the means by which the Holy Ghost is dispensed and shed abundantly upon us.

It is from the Giver only that we can know by what means he will please to dispense his gifts; and where he has appointed any, we may safely rely upon them, so as to expect grace by the due use of them, but can have no sure grounds to expect it from any other. For though God be not so tied to his own appointed means, as to restrain himself from bestowing grace by any other method if he pleases, yet his appointment lays a necessary obligation upon us to apply to it for such spiritual aids as he has promised to give thereby. Yet, though we are to apply ourselves to such means, and from them only can expect grace, we must not look upon them otherwise than as means, nor believe them to be, or themselves to give that grace of which they are no more than the channels. So that to neglect the means appointed by God, is either infidelity, in not believing them to be available for the end for which God has appointed them; or else, a great impiety, in contemning the grace thereby to be vouchsafed. To apply ourselves to other means than those appointed, is enthusiasm, as it dreams of divine communications from the impulse of our own imaginations, without sufficient warrant from the ordinary revelation of scripture, or an extraordinary one duly attested. Or to reverence even the appointed means in such a manner as to look upon them as if they were what they convey, or that by their natural efficacy they produced those effects, of which by God's will only they are the moral instruments, is a superstitious opinion, and idolatrous veneration.

The great instituted mean is the gospel in general, as comprehending the divine truths inspired by the Holy Ghost, and written by the sacred penman, together with those heavenly lessons written in the sacred character, God's own hieroglyphics, those verba visibilia, as St. Austin calls them, the sacraments, speaking to every man in his own tongue the wonderful dispensations of God. Of this gospel, comprehending as well the sacraments as the written word, are those characters to be understood, that it is the power of God to salvation to every one that believeth (Rom. i. 16.); that it is an incorruptible seed by which we are born again. (1 Pet. i. 23.)

But the spiritual man, like the natural, is to be considered in three states; 1. His conception, to which the written word does peculiarly conduce. 2. His new birth or regeneration, which is effected by baptism. And, 3. His growth and nourishment, which owes itself chiefly to the divine sustenance of the Lord's supper. Of which I shall treat in their order.

1. The written word: the great end of which is, to procure us the gift of faith, for faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God. (Rom. x. 17.) When men had a full, though sorrowful knowledge of sin, and were sensible of the infirmity and misery of their condition, that they had greatly offended, and had just reason to dread punishment; (which were lessons which God taught them in the schools of the law and of philosophy, and lessons which had been so fully learned by the disciples under each, as was seen before, that both were convinced of their need of farther light and assistance;) when this fulness of time was come, when the Jews longed for a Redeemer, the Prophet that should tell them all things, and fled to Amon confessing their sins, that they might escape the wrath to come (John, iii. 23. Matt. iii. 5, 6, 7.), which they deserved and feared; when philosophy had experienced its inability to reform mankind, and gave up the cause of virtue as hopeless and unattainable by their systems, and despaired of atonement from their custom of sacrifices, wishing for farther information from heaven; then Christ the blessing (Gen. xii. 3.), and the desire (Hag. ii. 7.) of all nations came, to make manifest the mystery which had been hid from ages and generations, the hope of glory, (Coloss. i. 26, 27.) When they found themselves stripped of their innocence, and half dead, and that the priest and the Levite would afford them no assistance, our Saviour came, like his own good Samaritan, to bind up their wounds, and pour in oil and wine.

But as the gospel succeeds into, so also it supplies the place of the law, whether as re-delivered to Moses, or gathered up by the philosophers, and supersedes not their use by making it unlawful to seek for any light there, it comes not to destroy (Matth. v. 17.), but to fulfil, or complete what was defective in them: it restores the spiritual meaning of the Mosaic statutes, which the Jewish interpreters had buried under their glosses; and gives a sanction and divine authority to the moral precepts, of which philosophy had lost the knowledge. So that the lowest of its praise is to surpass the highest excellences of any preceding economy, to be a finer system of morality than any of the Gentiles could furnish out, and a clearer exposition and reading on the Jewish law than any of their Rabbis have been able to make. To those who hear it, it better answers the very end at which they aimed, and for which they were designed, doctrine, conviction, correction, and instruction in righteousness. It therefore more effectually conveys the grace, in some measure, attainable under former dispensations, a conviction of our sins, and compunction for them. It is sharper than the two-edged (Heb. iv. 12.) instrument of the priest with which he dissected the sin-offering, piercing to the very inmost recesses, and lays open our most hidden blemishes and defects; till pricked to the heart from a sense of guilt, and of the Majesty offended by it, we cry out for help, Men and brethren, what shall we do? (Acts, ii. 37.) But though the word be the same seed, and so equally good, yet cast into different soils, it has very different effects. Some, though their vices flash in their faces at hearing the word, and conscious guilt cuts them to the heart, yet instead of humbling, they harden themselves and gnash (Acts, vii. 54.) upon the preacher with their teeth: instead of bewailing, defend or excuse their crimes: instead of fearing the punishment, make light of the threatening; and instead of reforming, add sin unto sin. Who, when they hear the words of the curse, yet bless themselves in their heart, and say, I shall have peace, though I walk after the imagination of mine heart to add drunkenness to thirst. (Deut. xxx. 19.) Others again though brought to tremble when reasoned with of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come; yet, with Felix, divert the thoughts for the present, under pretence of waiting for a more convenient season. (Acts, xxiv. 25.) If such are deprived of farther grace, they cannot charge God with unkindness: his Holy Spirit has stood at their doors, and knocked, and they refused to open unto him. But to those who have complied with this grace, by acknowledging and grieving for their offences, and flying to God for help, the word is an instrument of conveying more, by opening to them a clear and distinct hope of salvation.

And here begins the peculiar use and efficacy of the gospel: the thunders, and lightnings, and smoke of the mountain (Exod. xix. 16. 18.), which accompanied the law, vanish away and are heard no more; the terrors of the Divine Majesty soften into the affections of our Father who is in heaven. (Matt. vi. 9. See 2 Cor. iii. 7, 8, 9. 14. 18.) He is represented to us as love (1 John, iv. 8.) itself, as willing to be reconciled (2 Cor. v. 19, 20.), and not impute our trespasses unto us. That the guilty mind may bear up against the uneasy apprehensions of an angry God, from the repeated declarations of his kindness and philanthropy. (John, iii. 16. Tit. iii. 4.) The sufferings of the Son of God for our sins (1 Pet. ii. 21, 24.), the ransom of his blood (Acts, xx. 28. Eph. i. 7. Col. i. 14. 1 Pet. i. 18, 19.), and the satisfaction thereby made for us (Rom. v. 9. Col. i. 20.), are perpetually inculcated, and in various methods, to discharge the conscious soul of its fears from the divine justice, that all that labour and are heavy laden may have rest. (Matt. xi. 28.) The fellowship and abiding of the Holy Spirit with us (2 Cor. xiii. 14. Phil. i. 2. John, xiv. 16.), to adopt us into the family of God (Rom. viii. 15. Gal. iv. 6.), and unite us unto him (John, xvii. 21. 23. 1 John, iii. 24.), who enables us to combat against nature (Rom. vii. 7. 9. Eph. ii. 2. 8.), and the prince of this world: to sow the seed and principle of eternal life in our hearts (Rom. viii. 10.); to triumph over death (Rom. viii. 11.), and seal us to the day of redemption (Eph. iv. 30.), are so frequently and affectionately promised, that the sense of our own weakness and mortality need no longer discourage us from entertaining the hope of glory laid up in heaven for us, whereof we have heard in the word of the truth of the gospel. (Col. i. 5.) This love of God, and grace of our Lord Jesus Christ through his salvation applied to us, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost, are not the objects of our senses, and are proposed in the written word only as in our power to obtain; the natural man therefore who will believe nothing but his outward senses,* can have no evidence of their truth, nor consequently entertain any hope of the promise; we may so engage and embarrass ourselves with things present, as to neglect or reject the revelation; or our prejudices and ignorance may so interpret it, as either to disbelieve the mercy offered, or despair of it; offending against stumbling-blocks of our own laying, or treating as foolishness whatever conclusions are drawn from premises of which our senses have no certain testimony. But through the prolific influences of the Holy Spirit accompanying the written word, by which it becomes the good seed sown, and without which it is but scattered chaff, it may take root in our hearts, producing that faith which gives substance to the things hoped for, and evidence to the things not seen. (Heb. xi. 1.) This gift is conveyed to us by the word; and where this gift is, it becomes the pledge, or rather earnest of the farther graces of the Holy Spirit, which the written word is also designed the instrument of deriving to us, and without which our faith shall not save us; for faith, if it have not works, is dead, being alone (James, ii. 17.); and this gift is the grace of repentance, a turning from Satan unto God. (Acts, xxvi. 18.)

The word, which gives us the knowledge of God's love to us, will also be a means of shedding abroad in our hearts, 1. A love towards him; we shall love him, because he first loved us (1 John, iv. 19.); and this love will be in us a principle, 2. Of obedience; encouraging us thereto, from an assurance of pardon for our past offences, the promises of aid and assistance beyond the power of our own nature, and the gracious acceptance of our sincere endeavours, though they reach not to a perfect service; for this is the love of God, that we keep his commandments (1 John, v. 3.). And this love of God engages us, 3. To a love of our brethren: not barely from civil virtue, the praise and beauty of humane actions, the fitness and benefit of social duties; but from the common interest and relation that we all bear to the same Creator, who has made of one blood all nations (Acts, xvii. 26.); the common hope we all have in the same Redeemer, who died for all (2 Cor. v. 15); and the communion of the same Spirit, which unites us to one head, and makes us one body. (Eph. ii. 18, 19, 20, 21, 22. iv. 15, 16. Col. ii. 19.). 4. The same word discovering to us the glories of another life, and the hindrance which this world is in our way to heaven (this world, of whose emptiness, trouble, vanity, and uncertainty long experience had before convinced us); this influences our affections, and draws us off from earth, and sets them on things above. (Rom. xii. 2. Col. iii. 2. 1 John, v. 4.)

These are the beginnings and rudiments of the new man, the conceptions of the Christian life: thus are we begotten again through the gospel (1 Cor. iv. 15. 1 Pet. i. 3.) which is the incorruptible seed that liveth and abideth for ever. (1 Pet. i. 23. 25.) But all this is yet short of regeneration; it is only a preparation to the new birth, which is the effect of baptism, when we are born of water and of the spirit; and after which the same graces do shoot forth, and unfold themselves into farther degrees, and more perfect measures. But this will be observed more at large hereafter.

At present it will be proper to consider, that though the word be seed, from which these graces germinate and take root in the heart, yet it is but the channel by which the divine graces are conveyed thither. It has not power of itself to work in our understandings a faith in God, nor influence the will to a repentance from dead works, without the aid of the Holy Ghost. It is true there are some historical parts so properly attested, that the mere natural man may find reason to give his assent to the relation; but this is far from divine faith, which is totally exercised about good things not known, but hoped for only; and in believing truths future and out of sight (Heb. xi. 1.), of which we can have no sensible evidence. So again, some moral precepts there delivered may appear so suitable to the present state of things, and our civil and natural relations, that the carnal man may see their beauty and convenience, and act agreeably thereto; but the Christian conversion is the work of God, as it flows from a love of him, a sense of duty and gratitude to him, to the forsaking fathers and mothers, houses and lands (Matt. xix. 29.), to the denying ourselves (Matt. x.

24.), creeping under the body (1 Cor. ix. 27.), rejoicing in afflictions (Acts, v. 14. Rom. v. 3. Phil. i. 29. James, i. 3.), throwing up every present good and grateful sensation for the hope of what neither eye has seen, nor ear heard, nor can the heart of man conceive (1 Cor. ii. 9.); things which the natural man receiveth not, for they are foolishness unto him, neither, though plainly proposed in the written word, can he know them, for they are spiritually discerned. (1 Cor. ii. 14.) Thus for instance, when the preacher opens his mouth, we may either indulge nature, by engaging ourselves in secular thoughts, and wave the information; a Felix dismisses Paul with a Go thy way for this time (Acts, xxiv. 25.); and a Gallio careth for none of these things. (Acts, xviii. 17.) Or we may, by grace, suspend this worldliness for a while, permit our hearts to be diverted to a new care, and attend to the things spoken. (Acts, xvi. 14.) After we have given attendance, and have heard our Saviour, or his Apostles, instructing or directing us, we may, either by the aids of grace be of the number of those blessed, who though they have not seen yet believe (John, xx. 29.); being convinced upon reasonable evidence that the revelation is from God; and then by a divine faith assenting to those truths, which our natural ideas are too short to reach; readily admitting, that if earthly things are too great for our comprehension, heavenly things (John, iii. 12.) must be more so: or, we may resist this grace, and make natural ideas the standard by which we weigh spiritual objects, properties, or relations, and so continue or relapse into infidelity. The Spirit that unites us to God, and adopts us into his family, may satisfy us of the possibility of being born again; though the carnal man may reject as absurd, that a man that is old, should enter a second time into his mother's womb. (John, iii. 4.) When we are told of a future eternity, we may scoff at the discovery, by giving way to our sensual appetites, and choose to eat and drink, because to-morrow we die (1 Cor. xv. 32. 35.); mocking at the doctrine of a resurrection with such obvious interrogations, How are the dead raised up? And with what body do they come? Others may receive the grace of God so far, as to suspend their contradiction, though not yet arrived at the gift of faith, and desire to hear again of this matter. (Acts, xvii. 32.) And some, through illumination and sanctification of the Spirit, are persuaded that whosoever liveth and believeth in the Son of God shall never die (John, xi. 26, 27.); assured from a knowledge of the scriptures and the power of God (Matt. xxii. 29.), that while we are present in the body we are absent from the Lord, desirous that this tabernacle may be dissolved (2 Cor. v. 1—6.), despising the gratifications of sense, and the deceitful arguments it proposes (which others make their oracle and their deity), groaning earnestly for their spiritual robes, that Christ would transform this vile body, and fashion it like unto his glorious body, according to that divine, though to us incomprehensible, energy, by which he is able even to subdue all things to himself. (Phil. iii. 21.)

In like manner the precepts contained in the written word, require the operation of the Holy Ghost, to give them influence on the will and affections. Precepts which the carnal man rejects as unnatural, and therefore unreasonable to his fleshly wisdom; but towards which the Spirit of holiness, if we will permit ourselves to be led by him, creates in us a new appetite and hunger, till it becomes our very meat to do the will of God. (John, iv. 34.) I might produce a great variety of instances, but I think enough has been said for my present purpose, which is to shew, that when the bare letter of the scripture is proposed, to the mere unassisted natural man, his understanding is too weak to apprehend many of its truths, his will and affections too blind and engaged to approve and follow its directions. It may indeed give them human evidence of historical truths, and philosophical arguments for social virtue; but the mystery of godliness, and evangelical purposes, is what we can never embrace, unless the Spirit give power to the latter to work a divine faith in us; without which, the word preached profits not them that hear. (Heb. ii. 4.) Our images, the likeness of any thing that is in heaven above, or in the earth beneath, or in the waters under the earth (Exod. xx. 4.), can be no fit representatives of God, when grossly understood: our line cannot measure the deep things of God, neither can our shakels justly estimate an eternal weight of glory. Such points must indeed be foolishness to the natural man, seeing, they see, but perceive not; and hearing, they hear, but do not understand. (Mark, iv. 12.) The Spirit teaches us to discriminate (1 Cor. ii. 15.), and reveals to babes, to men of humble, teachable, unprejudiced hearts, things that are hid from the wise and prudent. (Matt. xi. 25.)

But though the word be only an instrument, of itself insufficient to illuminate or sanctify the hearer, for faith is the gift of God (Eph. ii. 8.); and he it is, who worketh in us both to will and to do of his good pleasure (Phil. ii. 13.); yet it is the instrument by God appointed for the conveyance of the beginnings and first motions of these graces in our hearts; and in the hands of God an instrument sufficient for the end designed. For faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God (Rom. x. 17.); where the written word is meant, for the Apostle refers to the prophets and the Gospel. And St. Peter informs us, that the gospel preached (1 Pet. i. 23. 25.) is the incorruptible seed, of which we are born again. We are not therefore to expect or apply ourselves to dreams and visions, to receive from thence illapses of the Holy Spirit; for whatever extraordinary instances of this kind may happen (God being not tied, as was before observed, to ordinary means though we are), yet these are not the common privileges of the gospel. Joel's prophecy, that it should come to pass in the last days, that your young men shall see visions, and your old men shall dream dreams (Acts, ii. 17.), was, (as St. Peter informs us) fulfilled on that day of Pentecost, when about one hundred and twenty Galileans (on whom the Jews thought the spirit of prophecy never rested), men and women, young and old, saw the appearance of fiery tongues, and spoke as the spirit gave them utterance. The Apostle proceeds to shew the accomplishment of the prophecy then, by characters which are not applicable to our days. The blessings of these times, is, as he tells us, that whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved. (Acts, ii. 21.) And when St. Paul preaches upon that text (Rom. x. 13, &c.), he informs us, that such calling is an effect of the word (not of dreams and visions), and that the word is dispensed by the preachers of the gospel, divinely commissioned (and not by angels or immediate revelations). It is hither our Saviour refers us; They have Moses and the Prophets, let them hear them. (Luke, xvi. 29.) And reprehends the fanciful expectations of supernatural evidence, by declaring that it would have no more efficacy (if granted) than that ordinarily appointed mean the written word, If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded although one rose from the dead. (Luke, xvi. 31.) And though the angels may have their charge over us, yet their commission is not to prevent, but forward the ministry of the word. The angel that was sent to Cornelius declared not the Gospel, nor dispensed the Spirit; but directs him only to whom he should go, to hear words of him; and while Peter spake, the Holy Ghost fell on all them which heard the word. (Acts, x. 6. 22. 44.)

The word then being the instrument by which God conveys the beginnings and principles of faith and Christian life to us, it is our duty to attend to that for it, and not lay it aside, or discredit it as the letter and element only: let us not say with Hosius the Polish bishop, 'We have bid adieu to the scriptures, having seen so many, not only different but contrary interpretations given of them; let us then rather hear God himself speak, than apply ourselves and trust our salvation to these jejune elements: there is no need (as he proceeds) of being skilful in the law and scriptures, but of being taught by God; that labour is ill employed (says he) that is bestowed on the scriptures, for the scripture is a creature, and a poor kind of element.' Thus let papists resolve the truth of God into their pope's infallibility; and let enthusiasts, if they please, lick up their filthy vomit, in favour of their private and extraordinary communications; and let the modern reasoners and disputers of this world shake hands with their allies, and join in confederacy to set aside the written word, by preferring their own fancies and prejudices to the plainest revelation. But Christ commands us to search the scriptures (John, v. 39.); and St. Paul to give attendance to reading (1 Tim. iv. 13.); affirming that the scriptures are profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works. (2 Tim. iii. 16, 17.) If there have been different, and even contrary interpretations of scripture, let that warn us against the ignorance and obstinacy which have usually occasioned them. Let those who are to teach especially labour by a skill in languages, grammar, criticism, history and antiquity, the Jewish in particular, to understand the plain and primary sense of the letter, though it be a poor jejune element; for it is nevertheless the element without which we shall never attain to that knowledge, which is to make us wise unto salvation. And when the letter is obtained, let us learn to distinguish betwixt the spiritual object and the material type which represents it; nor rigidly conclude from symbols, points not drawn into comparison in the text, or supported by other parts of the revelation: taking both the thing signified, and the extent of its analogy, not from one particular representation of it, but view it in its several exhibitions, comparing spiritual things with spiritual. This, with the grace of God assisting his own appointment, will guard us against dangerous errors, though not from mistake in all points. Neither will it help us to a distinct knowledge in spiritual concerns; for from the disproportion betwixt our faculties, and the true objects, we can see then but as in a glass, darkly, and know only in part. conducting ourselves by that reflected light, for we walk, not by vision, but by faith. (2 Cor. v. 7.)

Without the word, we can bring forth no fruit; if we are not careful to prepare the soil for its reception, it will be ed. and die away; and even when the soil is rightly prepared, the improvement will not be always the same, but God shall cause it to bring forth at his good pleasure, in some thirty, in some sixty, in some an hundred fold. (Mark, iv. 8.)

SERMON XXVI.

By GLOCESTER RIDLEY, LL. B.

TITUS, iii. 5, 6, 7.

—By his mercy he saved us, by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost;
Which he shed on us abundantly, through Jesus Christ our Lord:
That being justified by his grace, we should be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life.

In treating of the means which God has appointed for the conveyance of the graces of the Holy Ghost distinct from that which is called common or extra-evangelical, I mentioned three particulars; the written word, and the sacraments of baptism, and the Lord's supper: all which are implied in the general term the Gospel. These three particulars correspond to the three states of the spiritual man, under which he is represented in analogy to the natural man. The first was his conception, to which the written word does peculiarly conduce: how far it is weak, and how far efficacious to this end, was shewn in the last discourse. But conception only is not sufficient to the Christian life, if when the children are come to the birth, there be no strength to bring forth. (Isaiah, xxxvii. 3. lxvi. 9.) I proceed therefore to consider,

In the second place, the Christian new birth or regeneration, which is effected by baptism, called in the text the laver or washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost. The law by which was the knowledge of sin, fills the soul with the horrors of guilt, and the dread of punishment; it shews how vile we are, how offensive to the holiness of God, how much we are exposed to his just resentment; the compass of nature contains no healing medicine that can recover us, though thou wash thee with nitre, and take thee much soap, (Jer. ii. 22.) it will not cleanse thee: the blood of bulls and of goats cannot take away sin. (Heb. x. 4.) Our old man, loaded with diseases and infirmities, finds its footsteps incline unto the dead, but knows no Medea's cauldron to restore it again, and give it its long lost youth and vigour; it despairs of rising with the phoenix from its own ashes, renewed in strength and fresh with life. But our Saviour brings life and immortality to light through the gospel (2 Tim. i. 13.); he quiets our fears of the divine vengeance by an assurance of pardon, which he has procured for us by his propitiating blood, that we may be justified by his grace; and of new powers that shall be communicated to us, to restore our nature, by the renewing of the Holy Ghost, which he will shed on us abundantly; and that the same spirit shall adopt us into the family of God, unite us to him, and make us heirs of eternal life. These are the promises of the gospel, the glad tidings of peace and salvation. (Is. lii. 7. Rom. x. 15.) The written word, which contains these promises, is the incorruptible seed in which those graces are folded up that are to produce the future Christian. The preachers are they who are ordinarily appointed to cast the seed into the heart; wherefore St. Paul tells the Corinthians, that in Christ Jesus he had begotten them through the gospel (1 Cor. iv. 15.), and calls his convert Onesimus, his son, whom he had begotten (Philem. 10.), i. e. converted in bonds at Rome. The travail of the new birth is not in him who is to be born, but (as the scriptures (Gal. iv. 19.) and the fathers represent) in the prayers and groans of the church, and the labours of the catechist. And when the graces latent in the word have unfolded themselves, and produced an hearty sorrow for past sins and a sincere resolution of forsaking them for the future, by renouncing the service of the world, the flesh, and the devil, called repentance from dead works (1 Heb. vi. 1.); together with a full assurance of God's philanthropy and reconcileableness to sinners, of atonement and propitiation through the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ, and of the assistances of the Holy Spirit in his sanctification to future obedience (1 Pet. i. 2.), and sealing us to an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for us. (1 Pet. i. 4.) This prepares us for the new birth, which is effected at our baptism, the washing of regeneration. Repent and be baptized for the remission of sins (Acts, ii. 38.): he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved. (Matt. xvi. 6.) The written word shews the malignity of the disease, and the method of cure; but baptism is the salutary application of the medicine.

Its proper effect is, in general, salvation; thus the text informs us, by mercy he saves us, by the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost. And St. Peter speaking of Noah's deliverance, says, the like figure whereunto even baptism does also now save us. (1-Pet. iii. 21.) And our Saviour assures us, that it is necessary to this end, except one is born again of water and the Holy Ghost, he cannot see or enter into the kingdom of God. (John, iii. 3. 5.) The particular graces conferred in baptism, of which salvation consists, are reckoned in the text, 1. Regeneration, and, 2. Renovation.

1. Regeneration; which contains several benefits, such as, 1. The actual grant, and not the promise only of remission of sins; cleansing us from the filth and absolving us from the punishment due to them. Ye are washed, ye are sanctified, ye are justified in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the spirit of our God. (1 Cor. vi. 11.) Which was done at baptism; whereof Ananias exhorts Paul, Arise and be baptized, and wash away thy sins. (Acts, xxii. 16.) This pardon is attended, 2. with a discharge and freedom from bondage, for Christ died that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is the devil; and deliver them who through fear of death, were all their lifetime subject to bondage. (Heb. ii. 14, 15.) And so many of us as are baptized into Jesus Christ, are baptized into his death. Therefore we are buried with him by baptism into death, that the body of sin might be destroyed, that henceforth we should not serve sin. (Rom. vi. 3, 4. 6.)

we are delivered from the power of darkness, (Col. i. 13.) and have redemption through the blood of Christ, even the remission of sins. (Eph. i. 7. Col. i. 14.) By his mercy he saved us, by the washing of regeneration, that we might be justified by his grace. But regeneration is not completed by forgiving only, but in giving also; and contains these farther graces, 3. Adoption, which is the effect of redemption, for God sent forth his Son, to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons. And because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father. (Gal. iv. 4, 5, 6.) This is most properly our regeneration, when we are born again of the Spirit, and become the sons of God, being born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God. (John, i. 13.) Wherefore the catechumens (i. e. persons preparing for baptism, but not yet baptised) were not allowed to say the Lord's prayer, till they had made themselves sons by regeneration in the waters of baptism. This was the privilege and birthright of the baptized, who then had a right to say, Our Father who art in heaven, when they were born again to such a Father by water and the Holy Ghost. 4. Inheritance, or a title to eternal life, was the privilege of this adoption. If children, then heirs; heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ (Rom. viii. 17.); heirs through hope of eternal life, as the text expresses it; an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for us (1 Pet. i. 4.); to see and enter which, it is necessarily required that we be so born again. (John, iii. 3. 5.) And of this new birth the Holy Spirit is the witness and the seal; Ye were sealed with the holy spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance. (Eph. i. 13, 14.) But regeneration only is not sufficient; if the same person be born again of water, he is still but flesh and blood, and that cannot inherit the kingdom of God. (1 Cor. xv. 50.) Our salvation will not be complete unless we are saved from ourselves, as well as from the power of Satan. It is necessary therefore that we become new creatures, (2 Cor. v.

This is the second principal grace mentioned in the text, as conveyed in baptism; the washing of regeneration and renovation by the Holy Ghost. This grace, it is true, necessarily attends the former, for when we are born of the Spirit, we are then changed, and become other persons, we are transformed, by the renewing of our minds, (Rom. xii. 2.) for what is born of the Spirit is spirit. (John, iii. 6.) Yet other things are denoted by renovation, than were by regeneration. Such as, getting quit of the rust and corruption of our old nature, putting off the old man with his deeds which is buried with Christ in baptism, and assuming new dispositions and abilities, the beginning to restore us to our original purity and liberty, free from indelible stain, or unconquerable bias or prejudice, rising with Christ in baptism through the faith of the operation of God, (Col. ii. 12.) putting on the new man which is renewed in knowledge, after the image of him that created him. (Col. iii. 10.) So that regeneration is our being born again, and made sons of God by our adoption at baptism, together with the privileges which are thereby made over and sealed to us, 'pardon of sins, or justification,' 'redemption from the tyranny of sin and Satan,' and a 'title to a glorious inheritance.' Renovation attends it, but is a still more secret and wondrous work of the divine Spirit, destroying our old form, the character impressed upon the soul by our corrupt nature, and inducing a new one, restoring it to its original image in the likeness of God, giving new light, new desires, new affections; regeneration therefore, as it is more particularly used, is complete at once, and receives no degrees; but renovation is gradual. An entire new form is indeed wrought at first, but so as to be daily capable of improvement, of new graces, of higher perfection, and a still nearer resemblance of the divine original which we are fashioned after. When baptised with fire by the operation of the Spirit, we are changed as the iron, not in essence, but in quality; our dark inflexible temper brightens in the flame, and is made ready to bend to future instruction, and to receive that perfection which art and care shall afterwards produce. For renovation, as it is ascribed to baptism, which gives it its first spiritual dispositions and capability of receiving the divine image, so also is it represented as the effect of the word written in the prophets and apostles; which supplies suitable arguments for the farther improvement of the understanding, and suitable motives to influence the will, being the sincere milk to babes (1 Pet. ii. 2. 1 Cor. iii. 2.), and strong meat to them that are of full age. (Heb. v. 14.) Wherefore baptism in which this spirit is administered, which acting like fire gives these new qualities to the soul, was usually called illumination.

These are the graces conveyed in baptism; which yet are not indifferently bestowed, but discreetly dispensed upon conditions. The conditions have been already considered in the former discourse as wrought in our hearts by the ministry of the word; to the producing,

1. An hearty sorrow for sin, and a sincere resolution of forsaking it hereafter, called conversion or repentance from dead works: at baptism we are required to testify this conversion by solemnly renouncing the enemy of our salvation the Devil with his great instruments of deceit the affections of the flesh, and the temptations of the world: and as solemnly giving in our names to the service of the true God, engaging obediently, to keep God's holy will and commandments, and walk in the same all the days of our life. Whence baptism was called the sacrament of conversion, and is, according to St. Peter, the answer or stipulation of a good conscience. (1 Pet. iii. 21.) So that, although he saves us not by works of righteousness which we have done, yet he requires that we engage ourselves to perform works of righteousness hereafter, before he will so far receive us into favour as to regenerate and renew us by baptism: which shews the necessity of good works, and that the performance of them is a subsequent condition of that justification which we obtain in baptism. But we are not only to testify our conversion, but,

nomy of our salvation, in the reconcilableness of the Father, the satisfaction of the Son, and the aids of the Holy Ghost; to be sought for and obtained in the holy Catholic church; for these ends and purposes, the forgiveness of sins, and the inheritance of eternal life. These are the points invariably mentioned in all the ancient creeds; afterwards more fully opened and explained, as the corrupt interpretations of heretics gave occasion. Whence baptism was also called the sacrament of faith, and was supposed to be, on our part, a sealing to the truth of such articles: and the forgiveness of sins being one of these articles which we are required to seal to as the great end of baptism, it follows, either that every one in the church is capable of it; or if there are any persons in the church, who are reprobated from eternity independent of their own behaviour, such persons, when admitted, are required by God to believe what is not true. This stipulation is essentially requisite not only in adults, but also in the sponsors for infants: as it is the best compensation for the want of that actual faith and repentance, of which as infants are incapable, so if there was no method of conveying the benefits and privileges of them, they would be also incapable of salvation. But till they can square their wills to the true meaning of their engagements, baptism, by communicating that same Spirit, which is the author of those graces in the susceptors, 'will avail to their preservation against all contrary powers; so that if they depart this life before the use of reason, they will by this Christian remedy of the sacrament itself (the charity of the church recommending them) be made free from that condemnation which by one man entered into the world.' If they live, the Spirit, like the reason of their own souls, of which they are also unconscious, is in them, as a spark raked up, which will kindle as they grow in years. Wherefore infants being thus capable of the Spirit, which even the adversaries of infant-baptism allow; and capable of salvation, which our Saviour says is not attainable but by those who are born again of water and the Spirit; we infer not the lawfulness only, but the expediency of baptizing infants: and so the church uniformly understood that text in St. John till Calvin introduced a new interpretation. And the stipulation of a good conscience being required, we charitably admit the stipulation of sponsors, agreeable to the practice of the Jewish baptism, at that time when our Saviour instituted his, without any notice of an abrogation or disallowance of this part, nor can we find any interruption of this practice in the Christian church.

After the Christian's birth, there is his manhood also; when he becomes fit for service, when he is called upon to bear a part in the Christian warfare, and to fight the good fight of faith (1 Tim. vi. 12.) for which, greater measures of grace are necessary, to furnish and arm him with the weapons of his warfare. (2 Cor. x. 4.) For this purpose he is brought before the chief officer in the church militant appointed for the dispensation of spiritual gifts, that he may there renew and confirm those engagements, which he entered into at his baptism, before a subordinate, and perhaps not in his own person; and receive, by solemn prayer and invocation, those large effusions of the Holy Ghost, as shall give him the spirit of ghostly strength to combat the temptations with which the world now assaults him, and with which the concupiscence of his nature, not totally eradicated, prompts him to comply: the spirit of wisdom to escape the fascination of his own judgment, now beginning to open and fall in love with its own charms, and all those manifold gifts of grace, which will prove mighty through God to the casting down imaginations or carnal reasonings, and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ. (2 Cor. x. 5.) The episcopal laying on of hands and benediction thus perfects our baptism: establishes, roots, and confirms us in the faith in which we were before planted; anoints us, as proselytes are presumed to have been after baptism, when taken entirely under the wings of the divine majesty; seals or enlists us, as the soldiers stigma, unto God's militia; and gives the Spirit as an earnest, that nothing shall be wanting on God's part, which our situations and necessities require, where we are not wanting to ourselves; knits us together in the unity of the Spirit; completes our insertion into the church, and is a pledge of our union and communion with it. Thus our Saviour was confirmed by a visible descent of the Holy Ghost after his baptism (Matt. iii. 16.): the apostles and disciples on the day of Pentecost (Acts, ii. 4.): the new converted church at that time baptized, received afterwards the plentiful effusions of the Spirit by the invocation of the apostles (Acts, iv. 31.): the gentile converts baptized by Philip, had the Holy Ghost poured out upon them by the laying on of hands by Peter and John. (Acts, viii. 14, 15, 16.) And when Paul had laid his hands on the Ephesian disciples, (whether Jews or Gentiles, who had been baptized, either immediately before by some assistant of Paul, or long before by John the Baptist;) the Holy Ghost came on them, and they spake with tongues and prophesied (Acts, xix. 6.), as the occasions of the times then required. The same practice has been continued without any evidence of interruption in every age of the church by episcopal confirmation, giving to every one an earnest of such spiritual supplies, as their own, or the church's exigencies should from time to time make necessary. Thus by these several means the Christian is first conceived, then born, and at length comes to the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man. (Eph. iv. 13.)

But it is not sufficient that we are born, and arrive at maturity; it is farther necessary that the Christian life be supported, and health maintained. The sacrament therefore of the Lord's supper was ordained to answer the end of spiritual food and medicine. (John, vi. 55.)

1. Of food; 'If our bodies, says Mr. Hooker, did not daily waste, food to restore them were a thing superfluous; and it may be that the grace of baptism would serve to eternal life, were it not that our state of spiritual being is daily so much hindred and impaired after baptism. While we are subject to diminution, and capable of augmentation in grace, this sacrament is necessary.' The cup of blessing, St. Paul tells us, is the communion of the blood of Christ, and the bread that we break is the communion of the body of Christ. (1 Cor. x. 16.) And our Saviour himself assures us of what efficacy and use they are, when he tell us, that his flesh is meat indeed, and his blood is drink indeed. (John, vi. 55.) Whence Tertullian represents the end of receiving this sacrament, to be, that the soul may feast upon or be fattened with God; or as it may be expressed with more delicacy in the language of the psalmist, it is a means by which God satisfieth the empty soul, and filleth the hungry soul with goodness. (Ps. cvii. 9.) For the bread, says Origen, is by prayer made the body of Christ, sacred itself, and sanctifying those who worthily receive it. While it retains a bodily substance in outward appearance, its almighty efficacy manifests the presence of a divine power in it. The cravings of the soul, which hungers and thirsts after righteousness, is nourished thereby; the languid, conscious and afraid of human infirmities, receives strength and vigour to pursue his course, and go on to perfection: the weak and weary, faint with struggling with temptations, and ready to sink under them, are staid and comforted with this divine refreshment: the sorrowful, and afflicted at this world's misfortunes, have the wings of their afflictions trimmed and disengaged, to soar above carnal thoughts, and leave their cares behind them: all the graces which we had before obtained, but through human weakness since impaired, are here, as our several wants require, renewed, strengthened, or improved. Nor is it our food only, but,

2. Our medicine also; this world is but a kind of hospital whither we are sent for cure; and when that is perfected, we are discharged: so that while we continue, we have some degrees or dregs of the disease remaining, and in perpetual need of the great physician of souls. Our Saviour indeed bespeaks the sinner in baptism, as he did the impotent man healed at Bethesda, Behold thou art made whole, sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee. (John, v. 14.) But when our consciences accuse us of many subsequent offences, from surprise, daily incursions, and even voluntary sins, it must also suggest to us fears, lest that, as we have broke the covenant, we should also forfeit the benefit of it, and thereby have incurred God's heavier displeasure. Wherefore it is as necessary, I mean on man's part, for his satisfaction, that the assurance of pardon should be repeated frequently for fresh offences, and the renewal of his own engagements certified after revolt in such a manner as God will accept, as it was at first before such revolt and forfeiture: so that it is of great use to the soul wounded with the serpent's bite, to have a sign of salvation, and to put them in remembrance of the commandment of the law. (Wisd. xvi. 6.) That by shewing forth the Lord's death till he come (1 Cor. xi. 26.) they might have in perpetual remembrance his body given for them (Luke, xxii. 19.), and his blood shed for the remission of sins (Matt. xxvi. 28.), and by partaking thereof by faith, may apply the benefit of the remedy to himself; not by any charm in the bread and wine: for what was said of the brazen serpent, may be justly applied to this outward symbol in the Lord's supper, he that turneth himself towards it, was not saved by the thing that he saw, but by Thee that art the Saviour of all. (Wisd. xvi. 7.)

Yet lest the frequent repetitions of pardon should prove an encouragement to sin, the church denied the benefit of eucharistical absolution to those whose sins were very grievous in kind, continued in, or highly aggravated: and even in cases where the charity of the church admitted them, the pardon was looked on as not so perfect as that granted at baptism: the one entirely renewed; the other healed indeed, but left a weakness and a scar behind, which required more cure for the future, and larger effusions of grace to strengthen and wear off. To these two effects procured by means of this sacrament, I mean strengthening and restoring grace,

A third is added, the gift of immortality; a promise of it was given in the written word; a title to it was sealed in baptism; but this still more disposes and prepares us for it, as a preservative against the corruption of sin and Satan.

It is one great mean of participating of him, who is life itself. I, says our Saviour, am the bread of life, which came down from heaven; if any man eat of this bread, he shall live for ever. (John, xi. 25.) Whoso eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood hath eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day. (John, vi. 48. 51. 54.) For it is impossible, says Irenæus, that our bodies should continue in the grave, which have been nourished by the body and blood of Christ. This was by the operation of the Holy Ghost, whom, in the ancient liturgies, they invoked to descend on the symbols, and make the bread the body of Christ, and the wine the blood of Christ. Yet they held that what was eaten was indeed bread, though the virtue in that bread was to vivification; and while the cup invited to taste, the spirit that accompanied it led to immortality.

But what are food and medicine to him that cannot breathe? Inspiration and expiration are continued signs and means of life. The true Christian therefore must open his mouth, and draw in the Spirit. (Ps. cxix. 131.) The Holy Ghost first inspires us with the spirit of supplications (Zach. xii. 10.), which when received, we must breathe out again in prayers for continual supplies of grace, which being according to the direction of the spirit and the will of God (Rom. viii. 26, 27.) will be a most effectual means of obtaining them; for if ye be- ing evil know how to give good gifts unto your children; how much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him? (Luke, xi. 13.) This is an exercise without which the Christian cannot live at all; he must pray without ceasing (1 Thess. v. 17.), continue in prayer (Col. iv. 2.); men ought always to pray, and not to faint (Luke, xviii. 1.); never remit that devout frame and disposition of soul, which is always open to receive the divine influences, and comply with its motions; expecting from our heavenly Father every good thing we want, directing all our actions in obedience to his will, and to his glory. This according to Origen, is to pray without ceasing, for a good life is the Christian's great and continual prayer. In which we must never wilfully omit the daily stated opportunities of what is more properly and strictly called Praying: nay, if unavoidably interrupted, we may express our earnest desires in short and quick ejaculations, which are the pantings of the soul after God: and even in cases where the sense of danger almost overcomes us, and the proper means of escape and deliverance are so hidden, that we know not what to pray for, the soul has still this relief, it may send forth its groans unuttered, and the Spirit will be present to help our infirmities, and make effectual intercession to him who searcheth the heart, and knoweth the mind of the spirit. (Rom. viii. 27.) But we must not confine ourselves to our closets in private prayer; we must walk abroad, and seek those public places where this Spirit breathes more freely, or descends in more abundance: and this is the sanctuary or place of public worship. There rested the cloud (Exod. xl. 34. 1 Kings, viii. 10.), as it were in token of a plentiful effusion: he visits every place: there is no going from this Spirit; but his Shekinah, his dwelling, and resting place (Psalms, cxxxii. 15.) is here. The Jews have a saying, that whosoever two or three are sitting together, and conferring together about the law, there the Shekinah will be with them. Which our Saviour has confirmed with regard to prayer, saying, If two of you shall agree on earth as touching any thing that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of my Father which is in heaven. For where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I (by his Spirit) in the midst of them. (Matt. xviii. 19, 20.) How great a lover of agreement and harmony this uniting Spirit is, what an enemy to dividing and separating, we may learn from his making the congregation the seat where he delights to dwell: his most extraordinary effusion was, when the whole Christian church was met together on the day of Pentecost, when the disciples were all with one accord in one place. (Acts, ii. 1.) He accompanies the sacrament of water, to baptize us into one body. (1 Cor. xii. 13.) He blesses the sacramental bread, that we being many may by partaking of it be one loaf and one body. (1 Cor. x. 17.) This love of unity was as evident under the Mosaic dispensation; all were to meet once a year at Jerusalem; and when their dispersion prevented this, they are represented as dry bones scattered in the valley. (Ezek. xxxvii. 1. 7. 10.) It is promised indeed that they shall be restored again to life, which was the promise of sending the Holy Ghost in the days of the Messiah, under the gospel dispensation; but in order to this, the emblem relates, that the bones were to come together first, bone to his bone, before the breath would come into them and make them live.

I do not mention orders, not only because, like confirmation, it is but a more solemn kind of prayer and invocation, and so might pass under that head; but because it is not properly the means of deriving sanctifying grace to the receiver, which confirmation is; its peculiar end being to convey the gift of office and ability; and which has fallen in my way to be treated of already.

The providence of God in his judgments, his trials, and his mercies, are also sometimes considered as means of grace; but perhaps they might more properly be called seasons and occasions, kindly dispensed by God for the exercise and unfolding those graces which had been before administered by other means. However, if means, they are such as God has entirely reserved in his own hands, and are not in the power of the church to dispense. Wherefore they are not reckoned among the means of gospel, but of extra-evangelical grace, common to every man as well without as within the church, and which it is no part of our duty, as Christians, to seek after, but to be careful to make a proper use of, when it shall please God to visit us with them.

I have now attended the Christian from the womb to his consummation; viewed the principles and rudiments of grace, and watched them as they gradually expanded into more and more perfect degrees of holiness, preparing the receiver for an eternal weight of glory. (2 Cor. iv. 17.) Operations so superior to nature, so remote from our apprehensions, that as few are rash enough to pretend to explain, so neither are there very many found who care to attend even to what is revealed concerning them. But the happy subject in whom they are wrought, knows them to be the work of God: he experiences that there is a new creation (2 Cor. v. 17.), and a resurrection from the dead (Eph. ii. 5, 6.), effects disproportioned to the visible means employed; whence he has a lively sense and demonstration within him of those several points, which have been laid down as the general heads of discourse in this lecture.—He knows many great and invaluable advantages in the present fruits of the Spirit (Gal. v. 22.), besides the hope (Tit. iii. 7.), nay more, the earnest (Eph. i. 14.) of an heavenly inheritance.—He has a certainty that he has received the Holy Ghost; and that the same blessed Spirit dwells within him, by the motions and continuance of his graces (Rom. viii. 13.), in a full assurance of pardon (Col. ii. 13.), in an unfeigned love of God (Rom. v. 15.), and of his brother (1 John, iv, 12, 13.), in new desires, new affections, new dispositions which transform his mind (Rom. xii. 2.), and alienate him from this world (Col. iii. 1, 2.), lifting it upwards to that which is above. These mighty works within him are so many proofs of the divinity of the power by whom they are wrought, and not justify only, but require worship from him to the divine Author. It is certainly our duty to look up to the hand from which we receive such benefits, and begin our grateful and devout acknowledgements as St. Paul does, by mentioning first the immediate giver, there are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit. (1 Cor. xii. 4.) Let us beseech him that he would continue, and make his abode with us, beautify our souls with every virtue, enlighten them with every grace, cleanse them from all filthiness and corruption, and strengthen them to immortality! Yet let us not rest here, since the same Spirit teaches us for whose sake, and by whose purchase, and according to whose will, as the economy of salvation requires, these gifts and graces are administered. There are diversities of administration, but the same Lord. And as through him, by the Spirit, we have access to the Father (Eph. ii. 18.), from whom originally comes every good and perfect gift (James, i. 17.), all divine power and efficacy, there are diversities of operations, but it is the same God, that worketh all in all: therefore with a due sense of this great honour and privilege, as sons of God, let us address ourselves to him for pardon, and admission to our heavenly inheritance, 'O God the Father of heaven, have mercy upon us miserable sinners!' But as we have no deserts of our own, no works of righteousness to claim his favour by, and are entitled only through the sufferings and satisfaction of Christ, let us beseech him to intercede for us, and plead his merits with the Father, 'O God the Son, Redeemer of the world, have mercy upon us miserable sinners!' And since the benefits of his merits are applied, and our pardon sealed, and ourselves enabled to render an acceptable service only by the operations and assistances of the Holy Spirit, let us implore his aid also, 'O God the Holy Ghost, proceeding from the Father and the Son, have mercy upon us miserable sinners!' Yet remembering that, how various soever the economy may be, salvation is the one sole undivided end and work of all, therefore to them as the one sole undivided cause of all, let us address our earnest prayers and invocations as to the great Power to whom we have consecrated ourselves and services, 'O holy, blessed, and glorious Trinity, three persons and one God have mercy upon us miserable sinners!' And to this holy, blessed, and glorious Trinity, for the means of grace by them vouchsafed to us, and for the hopes of glory hereafter, be ascribed, as is most due, all honour, majesty, and dominion, all praise and adoration, both now and for ever. Amen.

SERMON XXVII.

By JOHN BALGUY, M. A.

On the Excellence and Immortality of the Human Soul.

EccLES. xli. part of the 7th verse.

And the spirit shall return unto God who gave it.

THIS chapter begins with an exhortation to youth, to season their minds with an early sense of God and their duty; that it may direct them in all their ways, and be a support and comfort to them in the declension of life. The wise preacher, shews the folly of deferring the thoughts of religion, and the improvement of men's minds, to their latter days. He is so far from looking upon old age as a proper season for the accomplishment of this great work, that he represents it as scarce able to bear its own weight: and then describes, in a noble allegory, its various infirmities and gradual decays, till it terminate in death and dissolution. Next he pursues the soul and body after their separation, points out the fate and lot of both, and traces them to their respective originals. The dust, says he, shall return to the earth as it was, and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it. That is, the body shall dissolve into that earth of which it was first composed, and be incorporated with it; but the soul, being of a higher and nobler nature, will survive the separation, and return into the hands of its Creator, to give an account of itself, and be by him treated and dealt with according to the condition and circumstances in which he shall find it. My text is therefore a plain and positive declaration of a future state; and, by probable consequence, of the perpetuity of that state; which are therefore to be the subjects of the following discourse. And what can be more worthy of our inquiry and concern? Of all questions that can possibly come under our consideration, the most important is, Whether there be not another life after this? Whether we are to die like brute beasts that have no understanding, or to live again in a future state, and exist for ever? These are points of such vast moment, such infinite consequence, that they necessarily demand every man's most serious attention. In other pursuits we may be engaged by a principle of curiosity, or the love of truth, or perhaps some particular interest: but on the resolution of these points depends our all; for so indeed it is upon the comparison. If death make an utter end of us, and we have no prospect beyond it, this life may be looked upon as a mere shadow, or a dream not worth regarding. But perhaps it will be asked, what occasion there is to examine a question that we find already determined to our hands: for does not revelation assure us of a future state? and are not life and immortality fully brought to light in the gospel? This is very true; but still the proofs and evidences of natural reason deserve to be considered; partly to arm our minds against the objections of unbelievers, and enable us to promote their conviction; and partly for the support and confirmation of our own faith. And indeed it cannot but give satisfaction to every rational Christian, to find that the doctrines of that revelation which he has embraced, are perfectly agreeable to the natures of things, and the reason of his own mind. Let us then briefly consider the great doctrine of a future state in this light, and see what indications, what evidence, we can discover by it. In order thereto, it will be requisite to consider—the nature of a human soul—the present condition and circumstances of mankind—and the moral perfections of our Maker. I begin with inquiring into the nature and frame of a human soul; concerning which let it be observed, in the First place, that it plainly appears to be a simple, uncompounded, indivisible substance. All matter is evidently composition; every part or parcel of it being an endless combination or heap of substances; and, by consequence, necessarily liable to dissolution and corruption: for the particles whereof it consists are always unavoidably subject to disunion and separation; and accordingly hence it comes to pass, that every system of matter is broken up in time, and sooner or later moulders away. But that the soul; not thus compounded, is manifest from all its perceptions, and all its operations; as might be shewn at large, were not such arguments too abstracted for the present occasion. The soul then being an uncompounded, single substance, can admit of no division or dissolution; and from hence it clearly follows, that it is and must be incorruptible. But how incorruptible? May not God annihilate it whenever he pleases? Doubtless he may: and the same may be said of the whole creation. Whether it be probable that he will do so, is to be inquired and considered afterwards. In the mean time, we may safely conclude from the foregoing consideration, that the soul is not capable of being destroyed by second causes; which is all that the present argument pretends to prove. But,

Secondly, Another argument, drawn from the nature of the soul, is the excellence of those powers and faculties which God has given it. But having particularly considered this point in the foregoing discourse, it will be needless to resume it here, nor shall I repeat. It may be sufficient to point out, in a few words, where the force of the argument lies. Since God has endued us with intellectual and moral capacities; those great and sublime powers, which dignify our nature, and render us partakers of the divine image; it can never be supposed, with the least colour of probability, that he should confine us to the short span of this present life; and intend us, in a few years, to perish for ever. Since the soul of man is so highly exalted, and so nobly framed and furnished, it must, in all likelihood, be designed for a very different duration, as well as a more perfect state. Especially if we consider,

Thirdly, That we neither do nor can arrive in this life at that perfection, and maturity, of which our natures are manifestly capable. All the creatures beneath us seem to attain their full perfection in their present state; I mean, to rise to the height of their respective capacities. But this appears far from being the case of human souls. Even those men that have the largest abilities, and fairest opportunities, and make the best use of them, neither do nor can accomplish their minds to the extent of their faculties. They can neither obtain that measure of knowledge, nor those degrees of virtue, nor that portion of happiness, whereof they are capable. Part of human life is spent before the first dawns of reason; and a great part of it passed before we reach any ripeness of understanding. To which may be added, the disadvantages and decays that commonly attend men in the last stage of life. And how short, how scanty, is the intermediate term for the culture of our minds, and the improvement of our faculties? Yet short as it is, a great part of it is unavoidably taken up in providing for the occasions of our bodies, and answering the demands of sense. Are we then so framed, as barely to be allowed just to taste the sweets of knowledge, and the satisfactions of truth? Are these desirable objects set before our eyes to engage our affections, and excite our longings; and as soon almost as we understand the worth of them, to be snatched away from us for ever? Was the soul formed with such large capacities, for such small improvements, and so inconsiderable a duration? Was it fitted for a perpetual progress, and an endless growth; and yet designed to be cut off, as it were, in its infancy, and perish almost at its first setting out? For, in truth, the understandings of men in this life, appear only to be in their infant state; as being doubtless capable of exceeding their present attainments, as much as the knowledge of grown men exceeds that of children. Again: The measure of man's virtues and moral graces is no less imperfect and defective, supposing him as careful and diligent about them as he ought to be; yet even on this supposition he could be no very great proficient. Considering the patterns that men have to copy after, and the perfections they have to imitate, a whole eternity may seem requisite for accomplishing their minds, and completing their improvements: or, to speak more properly, they can never be completed; because they will ever be capable of further degrees, and higher advancement. Besides, we contract in our first years such an attachment to our senses and appetites, and such a fondness for their respective objects, that the remainder of our lives is seldom sufficient to disengage ourselves, and recover a right bias; much less for arriving at a state of perfection. In short, we have so many indispositions to remove, so many disorders to rectify, so many evil habits to shake off, and so many good ones to introduce and establish; that the best men can only be considered as beginners and probationers in virtue: so far are they from being able to perfect their natures. Can it then be supposed, that God should have ordained us only to make an entrance into the paths of wisdom and virtue, or, at the utmost, a very short and precarious progress, and then totally disappear, and drop into oblivion! When we have just found our feet, and learned to guide our steps, must we then be struck down, to rise no more! Can these be the fruits of our moral endeavours, and religious improvements? No man can possibly believe it, till he have quite forgotten who it is that governs the world; as will further appear afterwards. And since man's virtue is thus imperfect in this life, his happiness must needs be so too: for as to outward goods, they are little more than shadows of true bliss. The enjoyments of this world are empty, and unsatisfactory, as well as uncertain; and the whole train of our pursuits is, in reality, a succession of disappointments. Such objects are not big enough to answer our faculties. The eye is not satisfied with seeing, nor the ear filled with hearing; and much less is the mind in possession of its wishes. Since then we cannot find true and solid satisfaction in this state; since we walk in a vain shew, and disquiet ourselves in vain; we may hence derive just hopes of better success in another. If God created us in order to partake of the overflowings of his felicity, that end neither is, nor ever can be, effectually answered here; where little more is allowed us than a bare glimpse of happiness, and that at a distance. And who can imagine, after we have acted, or endeavoured to act, a short part in the theatre of the world, that the great business of life should then be finished, and the scene shuts up for ever?

Fourthly: Another indication appearing in the nature and frame of our minds, is that earnest desire of immortality, which so uniformly and universally prevails. A future state, and that a perpetual one, is the object of every man's wish; his only excepted, who is so obstinately and desperately guilty, as to dread the vengeance of Heaven; and upon that account, and that only, to wish himself out of being. And even in this case, the desire of existence is far from being extinguished. It still operates, however over-ruled by the terrors of his prospect. But to proceed: I am not supposing that the desire here spoken of was, like many others, actually planted in our minds by the Author of nature, a supposition as needless, as it seems to be groundless;

for the love of natural good being necessary and unavoidable, in order to obtain that good, the desire of existence must consequently be so too. I mean, that it must take place, whenever there is happiness in expectation : for in this case, the desire of existence necessarily results from the frame and constitution of nature. How then, or which way, does it amount to an argument of a future state? Had the Creator implanted this desire in our minds, it might readily have been concluded that he would not fail to gratify it; but how can such a consequence be drawn from a desire confessedly necessary? I answer, that it is as full and forcible a proof in this case, as in the other; for to frame our minds, and fix the nature and constitution of things, in such a manner, as must necessarily produce this desire, is, in effect, the same thing as if he had actually and directly formed the desire itself. And therefore it is not to be supposed, in either case, that he should subject us to inevitable delusion and disappointment. Had he intended us nothing beyond this life, he would never have drawn us irresistibly into such false hopes, and fallacious desires. Besides; were the necessity of this desire to be considered as absolute, and every way independent of the divine will, still the argument would hold good: for whatever is absolutely necessary, must be just and right in itself; and, by consequence, an object of God's approbation. But,

Fifthly, That the soul of man will survive this present life, may be further argued from the strength of those benevolent affections which God has planted in it, affections that knit mankind together, and produce all the sacred ties of affinity, consanguinity, and friendship. These affections improved and heightened in virtuous characters, by a continual exchange of good offices, by real worth, mutual complacency, and reciprocal esteem, form that union of minds, that sacred tie of friendship, which adorns and dignifies our species, and contributes so highly to the honour and the happiness of human life. The root of it lies deep in our nature, and the strongest principles within us concur to lead us into it. What mean then such propensions and dispositions? And whence comes it to pass, that we are so many ways prompted to strengthen these bands, and draw them as close as possible? If this present state, where our days are only as an handbreadth, and our life vanisheth as a vapour, be the whole of our existence, it must seem extremely hard to account for the principles and provisions we are speaking of. Can men be required by the impulses of nature, and the precepts of virtue, to form such close and cordial confederacies; to build up the fairest and firmest friendships, whose foundations are in the dust? When death divides the nearest relations, and the dearest friends, what is it that renders such a separation tolerable, and administers real support and consolation? Is it not the expectation of meeting again in another and a better world? But if this life was our all, and death our utter destruction, how dreadful, how insupportable would it be? How would it rack men's hearts to see before their eyes a total dissolution both of friends and friendship; and to find themselves just parting, never to meet more? Had therefore our Maker designed us for this life only, he would, in all probability, have given us cooler affections, and weaker attachments; and thereby have prevented the terrible anxieties above-mentioned. And indeed such strong ligaments can never be fit for creatures of so short a duration. Again: We find in our minds a powerful principle of gratitude towards benefactors; more especially our Supreme, the author and giver of all good. Him we are bound, by all the ties of nature, and reason, and religion, to reverence and love with all our hearts, and with all our souls. We are every way excited, by a due contemplation of his infinite perfections, to frame the most amiable ideas of him, and to work up our minds to the highest pitch of esteem and veneration; to consider the greatness of his power, the excellence of his majesty, the depth of his wisdom, and the glory of his goodness; how many and various his benefits, how diffusive and constant his bounty; till our thoughts are filled, and our hearts enflamed, with the lustre and beauty, and grandeur, of the object; and all our faculties conspire to engage and fix us in the admiration of it. And to what end these mighty obligations and powerful attractions? Why must we exert our faculties, and raise our affections, to the highest pitch, in meditating on the Supreme Being, and admiring and adoring his boundless perfections, if, after a very imperfect acquaintance, all our hopes are at an end, and the holy flame is soon to expire, and be extinguished for ever? Could so great and important a preparation be required for any purposes of this short state? Or would our bountiful Creator bring us into being, fit us for a participation of the sovereign good, and when we had just begun to taste it, snatch us away, and reduce us to our original nothing? Had he intended us for this life only, he would rather have concealed from us as much as possible, this glorious object, than set it before us, and draw us to it, to so very little purpose. We may safely, therefore, conclude, that such natural propensions and tendencies plainly point out another state, and can never end in frustration and disappointment. Were it otherwise, an acquaintance with God would be so far from yielding us peace and comfort, that it would afflict us beyond measure, and drive us into utter despair.

Sixthly, and lastly, Another proof, and that a very obvious one, arises from the suggestions of conscience; which is continually foreboding a future state, and urging it powerfully on the minds of men. It speaks so clearly and constantly in behalf thereof, and is so plain and peremptory in its declarations, that its testimony ought not to be rejected; and indeed cannot, without great violence done to the frame and constitution of our own minds. The soul of man is not only apt to smart under a sense of guilt, but is also liable to secret misgivings, and painful apprehensions of what is to follow. When a man has notoriously violated the laws of Heaven, or the dictates of right reason, his conscience not only rebukes him for it, but is frequently spreading before his eyes the terrors of futurity, and the sad apprehensions of a miserable doom. On the other hand, when a man has maintained his innocence, and held fast his integrity; when he has carefully discharged his duty, and lived up to the dignity of his nature; his conscience not only applauds him for it, but cheers his heart with assurances of a future recompense, and pleasing expectations of a happy hereafter. Now, if there be no real foundation for these things; if this man's hopes, and the other man's fears, are altogether groundless and chimerical; what account is to be given of either? How came they to spread so wide, and be so deeply rooted in human nature? This argument seems equally conclusive, whether we mean by conscience merely the operation of our intellectual faculty, or an instinctive principle superadded thereto: for, upon either supposition, we are manifestly so framed, as naturally and unavoidably to fall into such a persuasion, and fix in it. Nay, when sin and wickedness have made it men's interest to shake it off, and to wish and strive against it as much as possible, they can seldom or never accomplish it. The expectation of a future state sticks fast in their minds; haunting and terrifying them, in spite of all their arts and endeavours to the contrary. Whatever means may be used, conscience is never to be quite silenced; and very often it speaks so loudly and awfully, as to startle the sinner, and makes him tremble in the midst of his vicious pursuits and criminal enjoyments. What then can be the meaning of these natural anticipations? If there be nothing to come hereafter, how strangely is man amused, and how unaccountably misled? All appearances without him, and every principle within him, conspire to deceive him. If the grave was his utmost limit, why should he find himself under a necessity of looking beyond it? to what end were such clear prospects opened, and such strong expectations kindled? by what strange fate is he compelled to walk in a vain show, and disquiet himself in vain? But the truth is, such a supposition is destitute of all manner of foundation; as being directly repugnant both to the nature of God and man; as will further appear hereafter. Whatever conscience presages, whatever uncorrupted reason suggests, may securely be relied on, and considered as the voice of him, who can never disappoint his creatures, or falsify those expectations which he has given them. And indeed it is impiety to suppose, that Infinite Wisdom cannot govern the world without the help of fallacy and fiction.

• This argument, drawn from natural conscience, will appear yet stronger, if we consider the extent and universality of it. It is not a notion or an impulse that prevails here and there; at some certain times, and some particular parts of the world; the voice of it has been heard in all ages, and in all nations, and its convictions spread over the face of the whole earth: scarce an exception to be found even among the most uncivilized and barbarous people. There is, indeed, and has been all along, a great difference in men's ideas of a future state, according to the lights received among them, and the degrees of their improvement; but the doctrine itself, in some dress or other, has universally prevailed. Which plainly shews it to be, in the strictest sense of the word, natural; as arising from the frame and constitution of our minds, and the genuine principles of humanity. Was it not founded on nature, and perfectly agreeable to unprejudiced reason, how should it ever be so deeply rooted in the minds of men? even of the best and wisest men, in a more peculiar manner; and those too destitute of supernatural light, and the benefit of revelation. This consideration may be justly accounted a strong presumption in behalf of the doctrine before us. For certainly it would be very strange, if men's minds were so framed and turned, that even the wisest and worthiest of them should naturally run into such sentiments concerning this matter, as had no foundation in truth or nature. What should give mankind such an invincible bias to error, such an universal tendency to delusion? The more we consider these things, the more we shall be at a loss to give any account of them, but what either supposes, or must terminate in, the truth and reality of a future state.

ECCL.ES. xii. part of the 7th verse.

And the spirit shall return unto God who gave it.

In a former discourse on these words, I proposed to consider briefly the proofs and evidences of a future state, arising from natural reason; and began with those arguments which are plainly deducible from the frame and constitution of our own minds. This head being then dispatched, what now remains to be inquired into, is the present condition and circumstances of mankind, considered relatively and in connection with the known attributes and perfections of the Deity. I shall give a short account of each, as far as our subject is concerned; and, having laid down the facts, produce the argument, and point out the conclusion, which naturally flows from them.

As to the present condition and circumstances of mankind, the fact is plainly as follows: We find from daily experience, and general observation, that there is no regular distribution of good and evil in this life: in many respects, all things come alike to all, and there is one event to the righteous and to the wicked. Though virtue naturally tends to happiness, and vice is naturally productive of misery, yet in this world neither of these effects constantly happens: many things concurring to hinder both the one and the other. We see that good men are exposed to various hardships and misfortunes; which, on numberless occasions, they are forced to undergo. So far they oftentimes are from being happy, as might be hoped and expected, that they are deeply distressed and greatly miserable; so far from reaping the proper fruits of their virtue, as to suffer like evil-doers, and be compassed about with a sad variety of wretchedness. Nay, it has too often happened, that their very virtue has been the occasion of their sufferings, and the accidental cause of all their calamities. On the other hand, wicked men often prosper and flourish in the midst of their iniquities; not only escaping the forementioned hardships, but abounding in all the pleasures and enjoyments of life. Nay, their very wickedness is sometimes the occasion of their prosperity; and a great part of their lives is perhaps a continued scene of successful vice and triumphant villainy. All ages and countries abound in instances of both these kinds, and the observation is familiar and common among men—so promiscuously and irregularly are good and evil dispensed here below! And indeed this has been at all times so remarkable, that many ill-advised men have rashly taken occasion from hence to call in question either Divine Providence, or the Divine Perfections: but on very weak grounds, as will be seen afterwards.

In the mean time, however difficult it may have been to account for the providential dispensations of this life, most certain it is, that God's moral character is, and must be, perfectly clear and unspotted; he necessarily approves virtue, and disapproves vice, because the one is essentially amiable, and the other absolutely odious in its own nature. Conformably hereto, he is perpetually directed by the sacred rule of truth and moral fitness in all his proceedings, and in all his dealings with his creatures. A Being of infinite wisdom must, at all times, infallibly act according to the reasons of things, and the right of every case, because there is always a motive, a powerful motive, for so doing, arising from the intrinsic worth and excellence of such actions; and because, on the other hand, there can be no possible motive to induce God, on any occasion, to deviate from this divine rule.—Frail man indeed is very much governed by affections and passions, and those, alas! often irregular: but his Maker, being entirely void of all affection, can only be influenced by reason and rectitude; from which there is nothing to withdraw him, and to which he is therefore immovably attached. The consequence of which is, the perfect righteousness of his government, and the inviolable equity of all his dispensations. Two other particulars relating to our subject I shall only just mention, as being universally acknowledged and understood: the one is, that God is privy to our whole conduct, and intimately acquainted with all our thoughts, words, and actions; and the other, that the lot and condition of every creature is altogether dependent on him; good and evil being lodged in his hands, and his power of dispensing them absolute and uncontrollable.—These truths being premised, I shall now endeavour to shew how we are to argue from them, in order to a clear and satisfactory proof of the great point before us: and here we shall find, that, supposing our souls to perish with our bodies, the whole scene of things here below is utterly unaccountable, and indeed directly repugnant to the moral perfection of the Deity.

If then virtue be in itself really better and more deserving than vice, it undeniably follows, that good men have a better title to favour than wicked men; their conduct being intrinsically more amiable and meritorious. And that virtue is really thus preferable, is, to all intelligent beings, as evident as the difference between light and darkness: and if to all intelligent beings, much more to the Supreme, whose eye is perfectly pure, and his judgment unprejudiced and infallible. Virtue therefore is secure of his approbation; and, by consequence, virtuous men of his favour: for goodness in the action is desert in the agent; and desert in the agent is a title that can never possibly be rejected by an all-righteous Governor. There can be no better or stronger reason given, why God should favour one man, and discountenance another, than that the one is virtuous, and the other vicious. Nay, if our ideas may be trusted, it is the only one that can finally have any weight with so perfect a judge. Most certain therefore it is, that God will treat men accordingly? judging them according to their works, and distinguishing the righteous from the wicked in a most signal manner; conformably to moral truth, and the eternal reasons of things. This, I say, will most assuredly be done at some time or other. But it is not done in this life, as we have already observed and acknowledged; and therefore there will certainly be another. Since at present the wicked frequently prosper, and the righteous fall into distress, contrary to the deserts of the one, and the demerits of the other; it plainly follows, that there must and will be a future state, to adjust this irregularity, and rectify the disorders occasioned by it. Without question, God has wise reasons for dispensing good and evil promiscuously in this world; and some of them we know; but without a future state, he could have none at all. Nay, such a proceeding would, in that case, be directly repugnant to all the reason in the world: Was there to be no life hereafter, every man would undoubtedly be happy or unhappy here, in proportion to his virtues or vices. All the events and dispensations of Providence, would turn upon this hinge, and the blessings of Heaven be distributed by this rule. But since we find it in fact very much otherwise, the doctrine before us seems as clear and certain, as that God loveth righteousness and hateth iniquity.

Here perhaps it may be alleged, that the best men, notwithstanding their virtues, have transgressed more or less, and are therefore sinners in the sight of God: that upon this account they have no right to complain of their present hardships and sufferings, supposing these sufferings not to exceed the proportion of their demerits. To this I answer, that however this allegation may serve to stop the mouths, and silence the murmurs, of unhappy men, it no way affects the argument before us; which is drawn from the moral perfection of the Deity, and that rule of righteousness by which he must necessarily be supposed to proceed in all his dispensations. The best men, we are told, have failed and fallen short of their duty, and are therefore justly punishable at any time. Be it so. But have not wicked men failed and offended much more; and therefore deserved much greater punishment? Supposing then no future state, how comes it to pass, that they are not punished; constantly punished, in this world, in proportion to their demerits? If the former be just and fit, do we not plainly see that the latter is much more so? To execute sentence speedily on good men, because they have sometimes erred and done amiss, and at the same time quite overlook the crimes of notorious sinners, is impossible to be reconciled with any idea of moral truth. Whatever reason be assigned for the immediate punishment of those delinquents who are least guilty, must needs hold much stronger in respect of those who are most guilty: and therefore, excluding a life to come, no wicked man would ever have prospered in this. And the reason is, because a righteous and perfect Governor can never act arbitrarily, or capriciously; but will always follow the rule of equity, and the right of the case.

It must indeed be confessed, that in very many cases, we cannot presume to judge of the grounds and reasons of the Divine conduct; but in the present case, they are so plain, and clear, and cogent, that if there be any truth in our faculties, and virtue and vice be real things, there is no room for doubt, or the least suspicion of error. God will assuredly manifest his righteousness in the most public manner, and redress the confusions of this present life.

Should it be further urged, that the sufferings of the righteous are compensated by that serenity of mind, and self-satisfaction which their virtues affords them; and that therefore there is no occasion for a future state to make them amends; the answer is as follows: It is indeed readily granted, that virtue is always amiable, always beneficial, in its own nature; and would be greatly so in favourable conditions and circumstances. But in the case we are speaking of, its principal comforts vanish, and the enjoyment of it dwindles to almost nothing. Supposing a man both virtuous and prosperous, he could not be accounted happy, had he no prospect beyond the grave. Neither outward advantages, nor inward improvements, could avail him much, if he stood so near the brink of destruction, and expected so soon a total dissolution both of soul and body. But this is not the case before us; we are speaking of a good man very unhappy in this world, and deeply distressed; surrounded with griefs and calamities, and perhaps his whole life a continued scene of sorrow and tribulation. Here then the question is, whether, without a future state, his virtue be able to make him ample amends for all his sufferings; to heal the wounds of misfortune, and support him sinking under a load of adversity? Alas! this is so far from being the truth of his case, that he is almost entirely disqualified to receive any enjoyment, or any comfort from his virtue. Extremity of pain and grief will admit of no comfort but what beams from above. And if the windows of Heaven were quite shut, what could a good man, in such a condition, do more, than sit down disconsolate, and abandoned to sorrow and despair? But is not virtue, in itself, fair, and lovely, and full of charms? True; but he is not at leisure, not in a condition, to attend to them; and if he was, the more lovely he found it, the more it would grieve him to think, that he had no hopes of living to enjoy it; excepting the poor remainder of a short and precarious life. Can then a righteous God leave virtuous men thus destitute, or bring them into the world for such a purpose as this? Impossible. Such a proceeding appears quite inconsistent even with human goodness; much more with divine.

But further: It may deserve to be considered, that part of our species are cut off before they are capable of either contracting guilt, or even knowing the difference between vice and virtue. Among these, doubtless there are some whose portion of evil exceeds their good; whose little lives are almost filled up with pain, and suffering, and lamentation. Now if these hardships are to be made up abundantly in another life, there is no difficulty at all in the case. But, supposing no future state, it seems not only difficult, but utterly impossible, to be accounted for; since, on this supposition, their very existence is a calamity, an injury, a curse. It is not conceivable, that the all-wise and all-perfect Creator should produce any beings in vain; much less, that he should produce them for such an end as is worse than none at all. I will not presume to say, than the communication of good is the sole end of the creation; but one end, one chief end, we plainly perceive it must have been: and therefore we may be assured, that no creatures can be sent into the world with a quite contrary view; neither can any be treated, without any demerit of their own, so hardly and rigorously, as to give just cause for doubting of such a conclusion. If then the foregoing case be really fact, as cannot I think be denied, or disputed, it affords, of itself, an unanswerable proof of a future state: and, if among the adult part of mankind, there are, or have been, any so innocent and good, and yet so unhappy and wretched, that their sufferings have exceeded the proportion of their demerits; the same consequence will follow, and every such instance will yield an irresistible argument for the truth of that doctrine which we have been considering. For most certain it is, that God can never ordain any man to suffer more than he has deserved, without making him full reparation either here, or hereafter.

Thus then we may safely and justly argue from the present condition and circumstances of mankind; which, without a future state, are plainly repugnant to the Divine attributes; though, with a future state, as plainly and perfectly agreeable thereto: for, admitting such a state, the unequal and irregular distributions of this life are easily solved, and readily accounted for. Nay, they become not only intelligible, but manifestly convenient, suitable, and fit; as directly conducing to prepare mankind for such a state, by a fuller exercise and improvement of every virtue. For a life to come, it may be, and is, highly fitting, that we be trained and tutored here in a state of discipline and probation. Human virtue may require, in order to its perfection and our happiness, that it be thus tried, prepared, and purified: and different minds may require different trials, and various dispensations. On which account we have no reason to wonder, when we find good men in great distress; this being perhaps no more than what is necessary to form an exalted character; to produce more illustrious virtue, and triumphant merit. To strangers and pilgrims, seeking a better country, and travelling to their appointed home, no difficulties or distresses on the road can seem either unnatural, or intolerable; especially, when they have the pleasure and the encouragement to know that their own final advantage will be thereby promoted. Since then our condition and circumstances here below, are no other than what might be expected, supposing a future state, this may be looked on as a further presumption of the reality of such a state. And thus our present life will be considered, what it really is, a nursery for the next; where we are to be properly educated, and carefully disciplined, for a more durable and blissful state. But, on the other hand, if we exclude futurity, and give up all our hopes and pretensions beyond the grave; this present life becomes, in the eyes of thinking men, all darkness, discomfort, and perplexity; a sad scene of desperate disorder, and inextricable confusion. This, I have shewn, can never be the case of mankind, while they are under the government of Infinite Wisdom and Goodness. Upon the whole, whether we consider the nature and condition of man, or the nature and perfections of his Maker, we find plain indications, and solid proofs, of the important doctrine now before us.

What remains to be considered is, whether or no the future state here treated of will be of perpetual duration. It does not indeed necessarily follow, that because the soul survives the body, therefore it must exist for ever. For doubtless it must always be in the Creator's power to put a period to its existence; and therefore its immortality entirely depends on his good will and pleasure: and if this will has been revealed, as God be thanked it has, it must needs be peculiarly fitting to have recourse to that revelation, as will be observed afterwards. However, at present, let us go on with the evidence of natural reason; which, even as to this point, deserves our attention. Since then God is pleased to prolong the soul's existence after death, and provide for it another state, as appears from a great variety of proofs: it follows from thence, with high degrees of probability, that he will always continue its being, and suffer it to enjoy that immortality which seems to be the privilege of its nature. The force of that argument which we have just examined, concerning the sufferings of the innocent, and the adversities of the righteous, does not indeed extend thus far; because another life of a limited duration may undoubtedly be sufficient to compensate both. Nevertheless, we have, even from reason, good grounds to hope that our next life will be unlimited and endless. I shall content myself at present, with mentioning these two things: First, that as far as our ideas reach, no good reason can be assigned, why God should interpose to prevent the immortality of the soul; nothing of this sort having ever been urged, or produced, with the least appearance or colour of probability. And, secondly, good reasons may be assigned for the contrary supposition.

The ends of the creation, as far as we know them, are confessedly the glory of God, and the good and happiness of his creatures. Now the longer good men are suffered to exist in an happy state, the more they must needs be blessed, and God be glorified: and by the perpetuation of such a state, we plainly perceive that the same great ends will be promoted for ever. But, further: These reasons against annihilation will not only eternally hold good, but be continually gathering new force and strength. The longer virtuous men live, in such a state, the fitter they must be for life; and therefore we may presume, the less will be the danger of extinction. Their faculties must grow, their capacities enlarge, and all their improvements increase, through every part of duration. Great advances must be ever made in knowledge, and virtue, and happiness. They must be continually more and more capable of contemplating, admiring and enjoying the Author of all good, and the Fountain of all perfection. To imagine, after this progress, and these exaltations of their nature, that God should cut the thread of their existence, and put an end to their beings, is to suppose him acting, as far as we can judge, quite contrary to the reasons of things, and the chief ends of the creation: for it seems very evident to our understandings, that much more happiness is producible by a grant of immortality, than by any succession of spirits temporary and mortal: forasmuch as the happiness of the blessed must naturally rise in a very high proportion to the length of their existence. Again: By parity of reason, it might as well be concluded, that God will some time or other annihilate the angels, and destroy the whole host of heaven, as that he should take away the existence of just men made perfect. There will be, both for men and angels, an employment adequate to the eternity we are speaking of. They may search for ever into the divine perfections, and divine workmanship, without being able tohaust the subjects, or even comprehend them. They may copy after God's excellence, striving to approach and nearer through all that ever remain at an infinite distance from him. In short, nothing lity, nothing less than an endless duration, can suit that transcendent object, for the study, adoration, and enjoyment, of which they were, both of them, originally created. These considerations, together with the arguments before produced from the frame and constitution of our minds, appear fully sufficient for the conviction of unprejudiced men. Yet, after all, though the doctrines of a future state, and the immortality of the soul, are supported by a great variety of clear and convincing proofs, arising from the mere light of natural reason: yet it is well and happy for us, that those proofs are enforced and confirmed by revelation; that we have assurances from Heaven of our perpetual existence, and that life and immortality are fully brought to light in the gospel. This gives a powerful sanction to the dictates of our consciences, and the decisions of our understandings. As the evidences of reason strengthen our faith, so the evidences of faith establish the doctrines of reason; thereby leaving us doubly without excuse, if we reject the truth, or suffer our minds to be drawn into a disbelief of this most important article.

The time will only permit me to point out very briefly what use we ought to make of the foregoing doctrine. Are we then designed for immortality, and fitted with suitable faculties for an endless duration? How grateful a sense ought we to have of the Creator's goodness and bounty! What tributes of praise and thanksgiving are due for such mighty blessings, such inestimable privileges! What returns of pious adoration, and religious reverence, in will, word, and deed! But more especially ought we to take care, as the best and most acceptable expression of our gratitude, that we make a wise and proper use of these blessings, that we walk worthy of the high expectations, and the glorious prospect which he has set before us; that we demean ourselves in such manner as becomes those are made little lower than the angels, like destined for immortality; that, diligent application to wisdom and improve our minds as much as possible, and prepare them for eternity. On our conduct here depends all our success hereafter. If, by evil practices, and vicious habits, we lay the foundations of a miserable futurity, our joy will be turned into grief and terror, and the greatest of blessings into the deepest calamity, and the direst curse. In the next life, vice and virtue will each produce its own natural effects, however external causes may co-operate with them. Every vice, every evil habit, that we carry with us into another world, will, like an evil spirit, haunt us for ever, and persecute us to all eternity. No fiends, no furies, will be able to torment men hereafter like sin and guilt; the rage and remorse of which no words can represent, no thoughts conceive. On the other hand, every grace, every virtue, every good habit, will enlarge our capacities for happiness, and be a further preparation for it. They will not only preserve the soul in perpetual health and ease, but prove inexhaustible sources of joy and gladness. They will likewise make it meet to partake of those unspeakable felicities which God has prepared for the righteous. And how blessed must that immortality be, where every thing within and every thing without, administer delight, and conspire to augment and establish their happiness. Lastly: since there will be another life, and that an eternal one, it must be very absurd to engage our affections deeply in this; or to be immoderately solicitous about any of its vain and transitory enjoyments. To set our hearts on the mean and perishing objects of this world, is, in effect, to forget the privileges of our nature, and the joys and glories of a blessed immortality. What are hours, or days, or years; nay, what is time itself, in comparison of an eternal duration! This life can bear no proportion to the next; and yet we suffer it almost to engross our thoughts, and run away with our affections. We regard this very short span of time, as if it was eternity; and we regard eternity, as if it were nothing. Our reason plainer informs us, that, supposing a future state dubious and uncertain, still we ought to be provided for the important chance, and become adventurers for another world. But since we have all the evidence and assurance that can be reason, be expected, or even desired, what words are able to express the folly, frenzy, or those, who slight God, and neglect so great salvation conclude: if the greatest and most desirable happiness that we are capable of wishing, be allowed to merit our attention and concern, then have we just cause to bend our thoughts this way, and devote our best endeavours to the attainment of it. Our true interest prompts us to withdraw our affections from the fleeting shadows of this life; continually exhorting us to moderate our pursuit of things temporal, that we finally lose not the things which are eternal.

SERMON XXIX.

By the Rev. WILLIAM PALEY, D.D.

Seriousness in Religion indispensable above all other Dispositions.

1 PETER, iv. 7.

—Be ye, therefore, sober, and watch unto Prayer.

THE first requisite in religion is seriousness. No impression can be made without it. An orderly life, so far as others are able to observe us, is now and then produced by prudential motives, or by dint of habit; but without seriousness there can be no religious principle at the bottom, no course of conduct flowing from religious motives; in a word, there can be no religion. This cannot exist without seriousness upon the subject. Perhaps a teacher of religion has more difficulty in producing seriousness amongst his hearers, than in any other part of his office. Until he succeed in this, he loses his labour; and when once, from any cause whatever, a spirit of levity has taken hold of a mind, it is next to impossible to plant serious considerations in that mind. It is seldom to be done except by some great shock or alarm, sufficient to make a radical change in the disposition; and which is God's own way of bringing about the business.

One might have expected that events so awful and tremendous, as death and judgment, that a question so deeply interesting, as whether we shall go to heaven or to hell, could in no possible case, and in no constitution of mind whatever, fail of exciting the most serious apprehension and concern. But this is not so. In a thoughtless, a careless, a sensual world, many are always found who can resist, and who do resist, the force and importance of all these reflections, that is to say, they suffer nothing of the kind to enter into their thoughts. There are grown men and women, nay, even middle-aged persons, who have not thought seriously about religion an hour, nor a quarter of an hour, in the whole course of their lives. This great object of human solicitude affects not them in any manner whatever.

It cannot be without its use to enquire into the causes of a levity of temper, which so effectually obstructs the admission of every religious influence, and which I should almost call unnatural.

Now there is a numerous class of mankind, who are wrought upon by nothing but what applies immediately to their senses; by what they see, or by what they feel; by pleasures or pains, or by the near prospect of pleasures and pains which they actually experience or actually observe. But it is the characteristic of religion to hold out to our consideration consequences which we do not perceive at the time. That is its very office and province. Therefore if men will restrict and confine all their regards and all their cares to things which they perceive with their outward senses; if they will yield up their understandings to their senses, both in what these senses are fitted to apprehend, and in what they are not fitted to apprehend, it is utterly impossible for religion to settle in their hearts, or for them to entertain any serious concern about the matter. But surely this conduct is completely irrational, and can lead to nothing but ruin. It proceeds upon the supposition, that there is nothing above us, about us, or future, by which we can be affected, but the things which we see with our eyes or feel by our touch. All which is untrue. "The invisible things of God from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are seen; even his eternal Power and Godhead;" which means, that the order, contrivance, and design, displayed in the creation, prove with certainty, that there is more in nature than what we really see; and that amongst the invisible things of the universe, there is a Being, the author and origin of all this contrivance and design, and, by consequence, a being of stupendous power, and of wisdom and knowledge, incomparably exalted above any wisdom or knowledge which we see in man; and that he stands in the same relation to us as the maker does to the thing made. The things which are seen are not made of the things which do appear. This is plain: and this argument is independent of Scripture and revelation. What further moral or religious consequences properly follow from it, is another question; but the proposition itself shows, that they who cannot, and they who will not, raise their minds above the mere information of their senses, are in a state of gross error as to the real truth of things, and are also in a state to which the faculties of man ought not to be degraded. A person of this sort may, with respect to religion, remain a child all his life. A child naturally has no concern but about the things which directly meet its senses: and the person we describe is in the same condition.

Again; there is a race of giddy thoughtless men and women, of young men and young women more especially, who look no further than the next day, the next week, the next month; seldom or ever so far as the next year. Present pleasure is every thing with them. The sports of the day, the amusements of the evening, entertainments, and diversions, occupy all their concern; and so long as these can be supplied in succession, so long as they can go from one diversion to another, their minds remain in a state of perfect indifference to every thing except their pleasures. Now what chance has religion with such dispositions as these? Yet these dispositions begun in early life, and favoured by circumstances, that is, by affluence, and health, cleave to a man's character much beyond the period of life in which they might seem to be excusable. Excusable did I say? I ought rather to have said that they are contrary to reason and duty, in every condition and at every period of life. Even in youth they are built upon falsehood and folly. Young persons, as well as old, find that things do actually come to pass. Evils and mischiefs, which they regarded as distant, as out of their view, on beyond the line and reach of their preparation for their concern, come, they find, to be actually felt. They find that nothing is done by slighting them beforehand; for, however neglected or despised, perhaps ridiculed and derided, they come not only to be things present, but the very things, and the only things, about which their anxiety is employed; become serious things indeed, as being the things which now make them wretched and miserable. Therefore a man must learn to be affected by events which appeared to lie at some distance, before he will be seriously affected by religion.

Again; the general course of education is much against religious seriousness, even without those who conduct education foreseeing or intending any such effect. Many of us are brought up with this world set before us and nothing else. Whatever promotes this world's prosperity is praised; whatever hurts and obstructs and prejudices this world's prosperity is blamed: and there all praise and censure end. We see mankind about us in motion and action, but all these motions and actions, are directed to worldly objects. We hear their conversation, but it is all the same way. And this is what we see and hear from the first. The views which are continually placed before our eyes regard this life alone and its interests. Can it then be wondered at that an early worldly-mindedness is bred in our hearts, so strong as to shut out heavenly-mindedness entirely? In the contest which is always carrying on between this world and the next, it is no difficult thing to see what advantage this world has. One of the greatest of these advantages is, that it pre-occupies the mind: it gets the first hold and the first possession. Childhood and youth, left to themselves, are necessarily guided by sense: and sense is all on the side of this world. Meditation brings us to look towards a future life; but then meditation comes afterwards; it only comes when the mind is already filled and engaged and occupied, may often crowded and surcharged with worldly ideas. It is not only, therefore, far and right, but it is absolutely necessary.

to give to religion the advantage we can give it by dint of education; for all that can be done is too little to set religion upon an equality with its rival: which rival is the world. A creature which is to pass a small portion of its existence in one state, and that state to be preparatory to another, ought, no doubt, to have its attention constantly fixed upon its ulterior and permanent destination. And this would be so, if the question between them came fairly before the mind. We should listen to the Scriptures, we should embrace religion, we should enter into every thing which had relation to the subject, with a concern and impression, even far more than the pursuits of this world, eager and ardent as they are, excite. But the question between religion and the world does not come fairly before us. What surrounds us is this world; what addresses our senses and our passions is this world; what is at hand, what is in contact with us, what acts upon us, what we act upon, is this world. Reason, faith, and hope, are the only principles to which religion applies, or possibly can apply: and it is reason, faith, and hope, striving with sense, striving with temptation, striving for things absent against things which are present. That religion, therefore, may not be quite excluded and overborne, may not quite sink under these powerful causes, every support ought to be given to it, which can be given by education, by instruction, and, above all, by the example of those, to whom young persons look up, acting with a view to a future life themselves.

Again; it is the nature of worldly business of all kinds, especially of much hurry or over-employment, or over-anxiety in business, to shut out and keep out religion from the mind. The question is, whether the state of mind which this cause produces, ought to be called a want of seriousness in religion. It becomes coldness and indifference towards religion; but is it properly a want of seriousness upon the subject? I think it is; and in this way. We are never serious upon any matter which we regard as trifling. This is impossible. And we are led to regard a thing as trifling, which engages no portion of our habitual thoughts, in comparison with what other things do.

But further: the world, even in its innocent pursuits and pleasures, has a tendency unfavourable to the religious sentiment. But were these all it had to contend with, the strong application which religion makes to the thoughts whenever we think of it at all, the strong interest which it presents to us, might enable it to overcome and prevail in the contest. But there is another adversary to oppose much more formidable; and that is sensuality; an addiction to sensual pleasures. It is the flesh which lusteth against the spirit; that is the war which is waged within us. So it is, no matter what may be the cause, that sensual indulgences, over and above their proper criminality, as sins, as offences against God's commands, have a specific effect upon the heart of man in destroying the religious principle within him; or still more surely in preventing the formation of that principle. It either induces an open profaneness of conversation and behaviour, which scorns and contemns religion; a kind of profligacy, which rejects and sets at nought the whole thing; or it brings upon the heart an averseness to the subject, a fixed dislike and reluctance to enter upon its concerns in any way whatever. That a resolved sinner should set himself against a religion which tolerates no sin, is not to be wondered at. He is against religion, because religion is against the course of life upon which he has entered, and which he does not feel himself willing to give up. But this it not the whole, nor is it the bottom of the matter. The effect we allude to is not so reasoning or argumentative as this. It is a specific effect upon the mind. The heart is rendered unsusceptible of religious impressions, incapable of a serious regard to religion. And this effect belongs to sins of sensuality more than to other sins. It is a consequence which almost universally follows from them.

We measure the importance of things, not by what, or according to what they are in truth, but by and according to the space and room which they occupy in our minds. Now our business, our trade, our schemes, our pursuits, our gains, our losses, our fortunes, possessing so much of our minds, whether we regard the hours we expend in meditating upon them, or the earnestness with which we think about them; and religion possessing so little share of our thought either in time or earnestness; the consequence is, that worldly interest comes to be the serious thing with us, religion comparatively the trifle. Men of business are naturally serious; but all their seriousness is absorbed by their business. In religion they are no more serious than the most giddy characters are; than those characters are which betray a levity in all things.

Again; the want of due seriousness in religion is almost sure to be the consequence of the absence or disuse of religious ordinances and exercises. I use two terms; absence and disuse. Some have never attended upon any religious ordinance, or practised any religious exercises, since the time they were born; some a very few times in their lives. With these it is the absence of religious ordinances and exercises. There are others (and many we fear of this description), who, whilst under the guidance of their parents, have frequented religious ordinances, and been trained up to religious exercises, but who, when they came into more public life, and to be their own masters, and to mix in the pleasures of the world, or engage themselves in its business and pursuits, have forsaken these duties in whole or in a great degree. With these it is the disuse of religious ordinances and exercises. But I must also explain what I mean by religious ordinances and exercises. By religious ordinances I mean the being instructed in our catechism in our youth; attending upon public worship at church; the keeping holy the Lord's day regularly and most particularly, together with a few other days in the year, by which some very principal events and passages of the Christian history are commemorated; and at its proper season the more solemn office of receiving the Lord's supper. These are so many rites and ordinances of Christianity; concerning all which it may be said, that with the greatest part of mankind which must, or does, give much of its time and care to worldly concerns, they are little less than absolutely necessary; if we judge it to be necessary to maintain and uphold any sentiment, any impression, any seriousness, about religion in the mind at all. They are necessary to preserve in the thoughts a place for the subject; they are necessary that the train of our thoughts may not even be closed up against it. Were all days of the week alike, and employed alike; was there no difference or distinction between Sunday and work day; was there not a church in the nation; were we never from one year's end to another called together to participate in public worship; were there no set forms of public worship; no particular persons appointed to minister and officiate, indeed no assemblies for public worship at all; no joint prayers, no preaching; still religion, in itself, in its reality and importance, in its end and event, would be the same thing as what it is: we should still have to account for our conduct; there would still be heaven and hell; salvation and perdition; there would still be the laws of God, both natural and revealed; all the obligation which the authority of Creator can impose upon a creature; all the gratitude which is due from a rational being to the Author and giver of every blessing which he enjoys; lastly, there would still be the redemption of the world by Jesus Christ. All these things would, with or without religious ordinances, be equally real, and existing, and valid; but men would not think equally about them. Many would entirely and totally neglect them. Some there would always be of a more devout, or serious, or contemplative disposition, who would retain a lively sense of these things under all circumstances and all disadvantages, who would never lose their veneration for them, never forget them. But from others, from the careless, the busy, the followers of pleasure, the pursuers of wealth or advancement, these things would slip away from the thoughts entirely.

Together with religious ordinances we mentioned religious exercises. By the term religious exercises, I in particular mean private prayer; whether it be at set times, as in the morning and evening of each day; or whether it be called forth by occasions, as when we are to form some momentous decision, or enter upon some great undertaking: or when we are under some pressing difficulty, or deep distress, some excruciating bodily pain, or heavy affliction; or, on the other hand, and no less properly, when we have lately been receiving some signal benefit, experiencing some signal mercy; such as preservation from danger, relief from difficulty or distress, abatement of pain, recovery from sickness: for by prayer, let it be observed, we mean devotion in general; and thanksgiving is devotion as much as prayer itself. * I mean private prayer, as here described; and I also mean, what is perhaps the most natural form of private prayer, short ejaculatory extemporaneous addresses to God, as often as either the reflections which rise up in our minds, let them come from what quarter they may, or the objects and incidents which seize our attention, prompt us to utter them; which, in a religiously disposed mind will be the case, I may say, every hour, and which ejaculation may be offered up to God in any posture, in any place, or in any situation. Amongst religious exercises I also reckon family prayer, which unites many of the uses both of public worship and private prayer. The reading of religious books is likewise to be accounted a religious exercise. Religious meditation still more so: and more so for this reason, that it implies and includes that most important duty, self-examination; for I hold it to be next to impossible for a man to meditate upon religion, without meditating at the same time upon his own present condition with respect to the tremendous alternative which is to take place upon him after his death. *

These are what we understand by religious exercises; and they are all so far of the same nature with religious ordinances that they are aids and helps of religion itself; and I think that religious seriousness cannot be maintained in the soul without them.

But again; a cause which has a strong tendency to destroy religious seriousness, and which almost infallibly prevents its formation and growth in young minds, is levity in conversation upon religious subjects; or upon subjects connected with religion. Whether we regard the practice with respect to those who use it, or to those who hear it, it is highly to be blamed, and is productive of great mischief. In those who use it, it amounts almost to a proof that they are destitute of religious seriousness. The principle itself is destroyed in them, or was never formed in them. Upon those who hear, its effect is this. If they have concern about religion, and the disposition towards religion which they ought to have, and which we signify by this word seriousness, they will be inwardly shocked and offended by the levity with which they hear it treated. They will, as it were, resent such treatment of a subject, which by them has always been thought upon with awe and dread and veneration. But the pain with which they were at first affected goes off by hearing frequently the same sort of language; and then they will be almost sure, if they examine the state of their minds as to religion, to feel a change in themselves for the worse. This is the danger to which those are exposed, who had before imbibed serious impressions. Those who had not, will be prevented, by such sort of conversation, from ever imbibing them at all; so that its influence is in all cases pernicious.

The turn which this levity usually takes, is in jests and raillery upon the opinions, or the peculiarities, or the persons of men of particular sects, or who bear particular names; especially if they happen to be more serious than ourselves. And of late this loose, and I can hardly help calling it profane humour, has been directed chiefly against the followers of methodism. But against whomsoever it happens to be pointed, it has all the bad effects both upon the speaker and the hearer which we have noticed: and as in other instances, so in this, give me leave to say that it is very much misplaced. In the first place, were the doctrines and sentiments of those who bear this name ever so foolish and extravagant (I do not say that they are either) this proposition I shall always maintain to be true, viz. that the wildest opinion that ever was entertained in matters of religion, is more rational than unconcern about these matters. Upon this subject nothing is so absurd as indifference; no folly so contemptible as thoughtlessness and levity. In the next place, do methodists deserve this treatment? Be their particular doctrines what they may, the professors of these doctrines appear to be in earnest about them; and a man who is in earnest in religion cannot be a bad man, still less a fit subject for derision. I am no methodist myself. In their leading doctrines I differ from them. But I contend, that sincere men are not, for these, or indeed, any doctrines, to be made laughing stocks to others. I do not bring in the case of methodists in this part of my discourse, for the purpose of vindicating their tenets, but for the purpose of observing, (and I wish that the observation may weigh with all my readers) that the custom of treating their characters and persons, their preaching or their preachers, their meetings or worship, with scorn, has the pernicious consequence of destroying our own seriousness, together with the seriousness of those who hear or join in such sort of conversation; especially if they be young persons: and I am persuaded that much mischief is actually done in this very way.

A phrase much used upon these occasions, and frequent in the mouth of those who speak of such as in religious matters are more serious than themselves, is, "that they are righteous over-much." These, it is true, are scripture words; and it is that circumstance which has given currency to the expression; but in the way and sense in which they are used, I am convinced that they are exceedingly misapplied. The text occurs once in the Bible, and only once. It is in the book of Ecclesiastes, 7th chap. and 16th verse. It is not very easy to determine what is meant by it in the place in which it is found. It is a very obscure passage. It seems to me most probable, that it relates to an external affectation of righteousness, not prompted by internal principle; or rather to the assuming the character of righteousness, merely to vaunt or show our superiority over others: to conceitedness in religion: in like manner as the caution delivered in the same verse, "be not over-wise," respects the ostentation of wisdom, and not the attainment itself. So long as we mean by righteousness, a sincere and anxious desire to seek out the will of God, and to perform it, it is impossible to be righteous over-much. There is no such thing in nature: nor was it, nor could it be, the intention of any passage in the Bible, to say that there is, or to authorize us in casting over-righteousness as a reproach or a censure upon any one.

In like manner it has been objected, that so much regard, or, as the objectors would call it, over-regard for religion, is inconsistent with the interest and welfare

prosperity in our worldly affairs. I believe that there is very little ground for this objection in fact, and even as the world goes; in reason and principle there is none. A good Christian divides his time between the duties of religion, the calls of business, and those quiet relaxations which may be innocently allowed to his circumstances and condition, and which will be chiefly in his family or amongst a few friends. In this plan of life there is no confusion or interference of its parts; and unless a man be given to sloth and laziness, which are what religion condemns, he will find time enough for them all. This calm system may not be sufficient for that increasing eagerness, hurry, and anxiety about worldly affairs, in which some men pass their lives; but it is sufficient for every thing which reasonable prudence requires: and it is perfectly consistent with usefulness in our stations, which is a main point. Indeed, compare the hours which serious persons spend in religious exercises and meditations, with the hours which the thoughtless and irreligious spend in idleness and vice and expensive diversions, and you will perceive on which side of the comparison the advantage lies, even in this view of the subject.

Nor is there any thing in the nature of religion to support the objection. In certain sense it is true, what has been sometimes said, that religion ought to be the rule of life, not the business; by which is meant, that the subject-matter even of religious duties lies in the common affairs and transactions of the world. Diligence in our calling is an example of this; which, however, keeps both a man's head and hands at work upon business merely temporal; yet religion may be governing him here meanwhile. God may be feared in the busiest scenes.

In addition to the above, there exists another prejudice against religious seriousness, arising from a notion very commonly entertained, viz. that religion leads to gloom and melancholy. This notion, I am convinced, is a mistake. Some persons are constitutionally subject to melancholy, which is as much a disease in them, as the ague is a disease; and it may happen that such men's melancholy shall fall upon religious ideas, as it may upon any other subject which seizes their distempered imagination. But this is not religion leading to melancholy. Or it sometimes is the case, that men are brought to a sense of religion by calamity and affliction, which produce at the same time depression of spirits. But neither here is religion the cause of this distress or dejection, or to be blamed for it. These cases being excepted, the very reverse of what is alleged against religion is the truth. No man's spirits were ever hurt by doing his duty. On the contrary, one good action, one temptation resisted and overcome, one sacrifice of desire or interest purely for conscience sake, will prove a cordial for weak and low spirits beyond what either indulgence or diversion or company can do for them. And a succession and course of such actions and self-denials, springing from a religious principle and manfully maintained, is the best possible course that can be followed as a remedy for sinkings and oppressions of this kind. Can it then be true, that religion leads to melancholy? Occasions arise to every man living; to many very severe as well as repeated occasions, in which the hopes of religion are the only stay, that is left him. Godly men have that within them which cheers and comforts them in their saddest hours: ungodly men have that which strikes their heart, like a dagger, in its gayest moments. Godly men discover, what is very true, but what by most men, is found out too late, namely, that a good conscience, and the hope of our Creator's final favour and acceptance, are the only solid happiness to be attained in this world. Experience corresponds with the reason of the thing. I take upon me to say, that religious men are generally cheerful. If this be not observed, as might be expected supposing it to be true, it is because the cheerfulness which religion inspires does not shew itself in noise or in fits and starts of merriment, but is calm and constant. Of this the only true and valuable kind of cheerfulness, for all other kinds are hollow and unsatisfying, religious men possess not less but a greater share than others.

Another destroyer of religious seriousness, and which is the last I shall mention, is a certain fatal turn which some minds take, namely, that when they find difficulties in or concerning religion, or any of the tenets of religion, they forthwith plunge into irreligion; and make these difficulties, or any degree of uncertainty which seems to their apprehension to hang over the subject, a ground and occasion for giving full liberty to their inclinations, and for casting off the restraints of religion entirely. This is the case with men, who, at the best, perhaps, were only balancing between the sanctions of religion and the love of pleasure or of unjust gain, but especially the former. In this precarious state, any objection, or appearance of objection, which diminishes the force of the religious impression, determines the balance against the side of virtue, and gives up the doubter to sensuality, to the world, and to the flesh. Now, of all ways which a man can take, this is the surest way to destruction; and it is completely irrational. I say it is completely irrational; for when we meditate upon the tremendous consequences which form the subject of religion, we cannot avoid this reflection, that any degree of probability whatever, I had almost said any degree of possibility whatever, of religion being true, ought to determine a rational creature so to act as to secure himself from punishment in a future state, and the loss of that happiness which may be attained. Therefore he has no pretence for alleging uncertainty as an excuse for his conduct, because he does not act in conformity with that in which there is no uncertainty at all. In the next place, it is giving to apparent difficulties more weight than they are entitled to. I only request any man to consider, first, the necessary allowances to be made for the short-sightedness and the weakness of the human understanding; secondly, the nature of those subjects, concerning which religion treats, so remote from our senses, so different from our experience, so above and beyond the ordinary train and course of our ideas; and then say whether difficulties, and great difficulties also, were not to be expected; nay further, whether they be not in some measure subservient to the very purpose of religion. The reward of everlasting life, and the punishment of misery of which we know no end, if they were present and immediate, could not be withstood, and would not leave any room for liberty or choice. But this sort of force upon the will is not what God designed; nor is suitable indeed to the nature of free, moral, and accountable agents. The truth is, and it was most likely beforehand that it would be so, that amidst some points which are dark, some which are dubious, there are many which are clear and certain. Now, I apprehend, that, if we act faithfully up to those points concerning which there is no question, most especially if we determine upon and choose our rule and course of life according to those principles of choice which all men whatever allow to be wise and safe principles, and the only principles which are so; and conduct ourselves steadfastly according to the rule thus chosen; the difficulties which remain in religion will not move or disturb us much; and will, as we proceed, become gradually less and fewer. Whereas, if we begin with objections; if all we consider about religion be its difficulties; but, most especially, if we permit the suggestion of difficulties to drive us into a practical rejection of religion itself, and to afford us, which is what we wanted, an excuse to ourselves for casting off its restraints; then the event will be, that its difficulties will multiply upon us; its light grow more and more dim, and we shall settle in the worst and most hopeless of all conditions; the last condition, I will venture to say, in which any man living would wish his son, or any one whom he loved, and for whose happiness he was anxious, to be placed; a life of confirmed vice and dissoluteness; founded in a formal renunciation of religion.

He that has to preach Christianity to persons in this state, has to preach to stones. He must not expect to be heard, either with complacency or seriousness, or patience, or even to escape contempt and derision. Habits of thinking are fixed by habits of acting; and both too solidly fixed to be moved by human persuasion. God in his mercy, and by his providences, as well as by his spirit, can touch and soften the heart of stone. And it is seldom perhaps, that, without some strong, and, it may be, sudden impressions of this kind, and from this source, serious sentiments ever penetrate dispositions hardened in the manner which we have here described.

SERMON XXX.

By WILLIAM PALEY, D. D.

On purity of the Heart and Affections.

1 JOHN, iii. 2, 3.

Beloved, now are we the sons of God; and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is. And every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as he is pure.

WHEN the text tells us, "that every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself," it must be understood, as intending to describe the natural, proper, and genuine effects of this hope, rather, perhaps, than the actual effects, or at least the effects, which, in point of experience, universally follow from it. As hath already been observed, the whole text relates to sincere Christians, and to these alone: the word we, in the preceding part of it, comprises sincere Christians and no others. Therefore the word every man must be limited to the same sort of men, of whom he was speaking before. It is not probable, that in the same sentence he would change the persons and characters concerning whom he discoursed. So that if it had been objected to Saint John, that, in point of fact, every man did not purify himself who had this hope in him, he would have replied, I believe, that these were not the kind of persons he had in his view; that throughout the whole of the text, he had in contemplation the religious condition and character of sincere Christians, and no other. When, in the former part of the text, he talked of us being the sons of God, of us being like Christ, he undoubtedly meant sincere Christians alone: and it would be strange if he meant any other in this latter part of the text, which is in fact a continuation of the same discourse, of the same subject, nay, a portion of the same sentence.

I have said thus much in order to obviate the contrariety which their seems to be betwixt Saint John's assertion and experience. Experience, I acknowledge, proves the inefficacy, in numerous cases, of religious hope and religious motives: and it must be so: for if religious motives operated certainly and necessarily, if they produced their effect by an infallible power over the mind, we should only be machines necessarily actuated; and that certainly is not the thing which a moral agent, a religious agent, was intended to be. It was intended that we should have the power of doing right, and consequently, of doing wrong: for he who cannot do wrong, cannot do right by choice; he is a mere tool and instrument, or rather a machine, whichever he does. Therefore all moral motives, and all religious motives, unless they went to deprive man of his liberty entirely, which they most certainly were not meant to do, must depend for their influence and success upon the himself.

his success, therefore, is various; but when it fails, it is owing to some vice and corruption in the mind itself. Some men are very little affected by religious exhortation of any kind, either by hearing or reading. That is a vice and corruption in the mind itself. Some men, though affected, are not affected sufficiently to influence their lives. That is a vice and corruption in the mind, or rather in the heart; and so it will always be found. But I do not so much wonder at persons being unaffected by what others tell them, be those others who they may, preachers, or teachers, or friends, or parents, as I wonder at seeing men not affected by their own thoughts, their own meditations; yet it is so; and when it is so, it argues a deep corruption of mind indeed. We can think upon the most serious, the most solemn subjects, without any sort of consequence upon our lives. Shall we call this seared insensibility? shall we call it a fatal inefficiency of the rational principle within us? shall we confess, that the mind has lost its government over the man?

These are observations upon the state of morals and religion, as we see them in the world: but whatever these observations be, it is still true, and this is Saint John's assertion, that the proper, natural, and genuine effect of religious hope is to cause us to strive "to purify ourselves, even as he is pure." Saint John strongly fixes our attention, I mean, as he means, such of us as are sincere Christians, upon what we are to be hereafter. This, as to particulars, is veiled from us, as we have observed, by our present nature, but as to generals, as to what is of real importance and concern for us to know (I do not mean but that it might be highly gratifying and satisfactory to know more, but as to what is of the first importance and concern for us to know) we have a glorious assurance; we have an assurance that we shall undergo a change in our nature infinitely for the better; that when he shall appear glorified as he is, we shall be like him. Then the point is, what we are to do, how we are to act, under this expectation, having this hope, with this prospect, placed before our eyes. Saint John tells us, "we are to purify ourselves, even as he is pure."

Now what is the scriptural meaning of purifying ourselves can be made out thus. The contrary of purity is defilement, that is evident; but our Saviour himself hath told us what the things which defile a man are; and this is the enumeration: evil thoughts, adulteries, fornications, murders, thefts, covetousness, wickedness, deceit, lasciviousness, an evil eye, blasphemy, pride, foolishness; and the reason given why these are the real proper defilements of our nature, is, that they proceed from within, out of the heart: these evil things come from within, and defile the man. The seat, therefore, of moral defilement, according to our Saviour, is the heart; by which we know, that he always meant the affections and the disposition. The seat, therefore, of moral purity must necessarily be the same; for purity is the reverse of defilement: consequently, to purify ourselves, is to cleanse our hearts from the presence and pollution of sin; of those sins, particularly, which reside in, and continue in, the heart. This is the purgation intended in our text. This is the task of purgation enjoined upon us.

It is to be noticed, that it goes beyond the mere control of our actions. It adds a further duty, the purifying of our thoughts and affections. Nothing can be more certain, than that it was the design of our Saviour, in the passage here referred to, to direct the attention of his disciples to the heart, to that which is within a man, in contradistinction to that which is external. Now he who only strives to control his outward actions, but lets his thoughts and passions indulge themselves without check or restraint, does not attend to that which is within him, in contradistinction to that which is external. Secondly, the instances which our Saviour has given, though, like all instances in Scripture, and to say the truth, in all ancient writings, they be specimens and illustrations of his meaning, as to the kind and nature of the duties or the vices which he had in view, rather than complete catalogues, including all such duties or vices by name, so that no other but what are thus named and specified were intended; though this qualified way of understanding the enumeration is right, yet even this enumeration itself shows, that our Saviour's lesson went beyond the mere external action. Not only are adulteries and fornications mentioned, but evil thoughts and lasciviousness; not only murders, but an evil eye; not only thefts, but covetousness or covetings. Thus by laying the axe to the root; not by lopping off the branches, but by laying the axe to the root, our Saviour fixed the only rule which can ever produce good morals.

Merely controlling the actions, without governing the thoughts and affections, will not do. In point of fact it is never successful. It is certainly not a compliance with our Saviour's command, nor is it what Saint John meant in the text by purifying ourselves.

"Every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as he," namely, Christ himself, "is pure." It is a doctrine and lesson of the New Testament, not once, but repeatedly inculcated, that if we hope to resemble Christ in his glorified state, we must resemble him in his human state. And it is a part, and most significant part of this doctrine, that the resemblance must consist in purity from sin, especially from those sins which cleave and attach to the heart. It is by Saint Paul usually put thus: "If we be dead with Christ, we believe that we shall also live with him." "Dead with Christ;" what can that mean? for the apostle speaks to those who had not yet undergone natural death. He explains: "Reckon yourselves to be dead unto sin;" that, you hear, is the death he means. "He, that is dead, is freed from sin;" that is Saint Paul's own exposition of his own words; and then, keeping the sense of the words in his thoughts, he adds; "if we be dead with Christ, we believe that we shall also live with him." Again, still keeping the same sense in view, and no other sense: "if we have been planted together in the likeness of his death, we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection." Once more, but still observe in the same sense, "we are buried with him by baptism into water;" our old man is crucified with him. The burthen of the whole passage is, that if we hope to resemble what Christ is in heaven, we must resemble what he is upon earth: and that this resemblance must consist specifically in the radical casting off of our sins. The expressions of the apostle are very strong; "that the body of sin may be destroyed. Let not sin reign in your mortal body; obey it not in the lusts thereof;" not only in its practices, but in its desires. "Sin shall not have dominion over you."

In another epistle, that to the Colossians, Saint Paul speaks of an emancipation from sin, as a virtual rising from the dead, like as Christ rose from the dead. "If ye then be risen with Christ, seek those things that are above, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God: set your affections on things above, not on things of the earth; for ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God. When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory." In this way is the comparison carried on. And what is the practical exhortation which it suggests? "Mortify, therefore, your members which are upon the earth, fornication, uncleanness, evil concupiscence, and covetousness?" which is an equivalent exhortation, and drawn from the same premises as that of the text; "Purify yourselves, even as he is pure."

The Scriptures, then teach that we are to make ourselves like Christ upon earth, that we may become like him in heaven, and this likeness is to consist in purity.

Now there are a class of Christians, and I am ready to allow, real Christians, to whom this admonition of the text is peculiarly necessary.

They are not those who set aside religion; they are not those who disregard the will of their Maker, but they are those who endeavour to obey him partially, and in this way; finding it an easier thing to do good than to expel their sins, especially those which cleave to their hearts, their affections, or their imaginations, they set their endeavours more towards beneficence than purity. You say we ought not to speak disparagingly of doing good, by no means; but we affirm, that it is not the whole of our duty, nor the most difficult part of it; in particular, it is not that part of it which is insisted upon in the text, and in those other Scriptures that have been mentioned. The text, enjoining the imitation of Christ, upon earth, in order that we may become like him in heaven, does not say, do good even as he went about doing good, but it says, "purify yourselves even as he is pure:" saith Saint John, "Mortify the deeds of the body, let not sin reign in you; die with Christ unto sin; be baptised unto Jesus Christ, that is, unto his death; be buried with him by baptism unto death; be planted together in the likeness; crucify the old man, and destroy the body of sin; as death hath no more dominion over him, so let sin no more reign in your mortal bodies:" so Saint Paul. All these strong and significant metaphors are for the purpose of impressing more forcibly upon us this great lesson: that to participate with Christ in his glory, we must participate with him in his humiliation; and that this participation consists in divesting ourselves of those sins, of the heart especially, and affections, whether they break out into action or not, which are inconsistent with that purity, of which he left us an example, and to the attainment and preservation of which purity, we are most solemnly enjoined to direct our first, strongest, and our most sincere endeavours.

SERMON XXXI.

By the Rev. WILLIAM PALEY, D. D.

How virtue produces Belief, and vice Unbelief.

JOHN, vii. 17.

If any man will do His will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God.

It does not, I think, at first sight appear, why our behaviour should influence our belief, or how any particular course of action, good or bad, should affect our assent to any particular propositions which are offered to us: for truth or probability can never depend upon our conduct: the credibility or incredibility of religion is the same, whether we act well or ill, whether we obey its laws or disobey them. Nor is it very manifest, how even our perception of evidence or credibility should be affected by our virtues or vices: because conduct is immediately voluntary, belief is not: one is an act of the will under the power of motives; the other is an act of the understanding, upon which motives do not, primarily at least, operate, nor ought to operate at all. Yet our Lord, in the text, affirms this to be the case, namely, that our behaviour does influence our belief, and to have been the case from the beginning, that is, even during his own ministry upon earth. "If any man will do His will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God." It becomes, therefore, a subject of serious and religious inquiry, how, why, and to what extent, the declaration of the text may be maintained.

Now the first and most striking observation is, that it corresponds with experience. The fact, so far as it can be observed, is as the text represents it to be. I speak of the general course of human conduct, which is the thing to be considered. Good men are generally believers: bad men are generally unbelievers. This is the general state of the case: not without exceptions; for, on the one hand, there may be men of regular external morals, who are yet unbelievers, because though immorality be one cause of unbelief, it is not the only cause: and, on the other hand, there are undoubtedly many, who, although they believe and tremble, yet go on in their sins, because their faith doth not regulate their practice. But, having respect to the ordinary course and state of human conduct, what our Saviour hath declared is verified by experience. He that doeth the will of God, cometh to believe, that Jesus Christ is of God, namely, a messenger from God. A process, some how or other, takes place in the understanding, which brings the mind of him who acts rightly to this conclusion. A conviction is formed, and every day made stronger and stronger. No man ever comprehended the value of Christian precepts, but by conducting his life according to them. When, by so doing, he is brought to know their excellency, their perfection, I had almost said, their divinity, he is necessarily also brought to think well of the religion itself. Hear St. Paul:—"The night is far spent: the day is at hand: let us, therefore, cast off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armour of light; let us walk honestly as in the day, not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness, not in strife and envying; but put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ; and make not provision for the flesh to fulfil the lusts thereof." Rom. xiii. 11. It is recorded of this text, that it was the means of the conversion of a very eminent father of the church, St. Austin; for which reason I quote it as an instance to my present purpose, since I apprehend it must have wrought with him in the manner here represented. I have no doubt but that others have been affected in like manner by this or other particular portions of Scripture; and that still greater numbers have been drawn to Christianity by the general impression which our Lord's discourses, and the speeches and letters of his apostles, have left upon their minds. This is sometimes called the internal evidence of our religion; and it is very strong. But inasmuch as it is a species of evidence which applies itself to the knowledge, love, and practice of virtue, it will operate most powerfully where it finds these qualities, or even these tendencies and dispositions subsisting. If this be the effect of virtuous conduct, and in some proportion, the effect also of each separate act of virtue, the contrary effect must necessarily follow from a contrary course of behaviour. And perhaps it may assist us in unfolding the subject, to take up the inquiry in this order; because if it can be shown why, and in what manner, vice tends to obstruct, impair, and, at length, destroy our faith, it will not be difficult to allow, that virtue must facilitate, support, and confirm it: that, at least, it will deliver us, or keep us free, from that weight of prejudice and resistance which is produced in the mind by vice, and which acts against the reception of religious truth.

Now the case appears to me to be no other than this: A great many persons, before they proceed upon an act of known transgression, do expressly state to themselves the question, whether religion be true or not; and in order to get at the object of their desire (for the real matter to be determined is, whether they shall have their desire gratified or not,) in order, I say, to get at the pleasure in some cases, or in other cases, the point of interest, upon which they have set their hearts, they choose to decide, and they do in fact decide with themselves, that these things are not so certain, as to be a reason for them to give up the pleasure which lies before them, or the advantage, which is now, and which may never be again, in their power to compass. This conclusion does actually take place, and, at various times, must almost necessarily take place, in the minds of men of bad morals. And now remark the effect, which it has upon their thoughts afterwards. When they come at another future time to reflect upon religion, they reflect upon it as upon what they had before adjudged to be unfounded, and too uncertain to be acted upon, or to be depended upon; and reflections, accompanied with this adverse and unfavourable impression, naturally lead to infidelity. Herein, therefore, is seen the fallacious operation of sin: first, in the circumstances under which men form their opinion and their conclusions concerning religion; and, secondly, in the effect, which conclusions, which doubts so formed, have upon their judgment afterwards. First, what is the situation of mind in which they decide concerning religion? and, what can be expected from such a situation? Some magnified and alluring pleasure has stirred their desires and passions. It cannot be enjoyed without sin. Here is religion, denouncing and forbidding it on one side: there is opportunity, drawing and pulling on the other. With this drag and bias upon their thoughts, they pronounce and decide concerning the most important of all subjects, and of all questions. If they should determine for the truth and reality of religion, they must sit down disappointed of a gratification, upon which they had set their hearts, and of using an opportunity, which may never come again. Nevertheless they must determine one way or other. And this process, viz. a similar deliberation and a similar conclusion, is renewed and repeated, as often as occasions of sin offer. The effect, at length, is a settled persuasion against religion. For what is it, in persons who proceed in this manner, which rests and dwells upon their memories? What is it which gives to their judgment its turn and bias? It is these occasional decisions often repeated: which decisions have the same power and influence over the man's after-opinion, as if they had been made ever so impartially, or ever so correctly; whereas, in fact, they are made under circumstances which exclude, almost, the possibility of their being made with fairness, and with sufficient inquiry. Men decide under the power and influence of sinful temptation: but, having decided, the decision is afterwards remembered by them, and grows into a settled and habitual opinion, as much as if they had proceeded in it without any bias or prejudice whatever.

The extent to which this cause acts, that is, the numbers who are included in its influence, will be further known by the following observation. I have said, that sinners oftentimes expressly state to themselves the question, whether religion be true or not; and that they state to themselves this question, at the time when they are about to enter upon some act of sin, which religion condemns: and I believe the case so to be. I believe that this statement is often expressly made, and in the manner which I have represented. But there is also a tacit rejection of religion, which has nearly the same effect. Whenever a man deliberately ventures upon an action which he knows that religion prohibits, he tacitly rejects religion. There may not pass in his thoughts every step which we have described, nor may he come expressly to the conclusion: but he acts upon the conclusion: he practically adopts it. And the doing so will alienate his mind from religion, as surely, almost, as if he had formerly argued himself into an opinion of its untruth. The effect of sin is necessarily, and highly, and in all cases, adverse to the production and existence of religious faith. Real difficulties are doubled and trebled, when they fall in with vicious propensities; imaginary difficulties are readily started. Vice is wonderfully acute in discovering reasons on its own side. This may be said of all kinds of vice; but, I think, it more particularly holds good of what are called licentious vices, that is, of vices of debauchery; for sins of debauchery have a tendency, which other species of sin have not so directly, to unsettle and weaken the powers of the understanding, as well as, in a greater degree, I think, than other vices, to render the heart thoroughly corrupt. In a mind so wholly depraved, the impression of any argument, relating to a moral or religious subject, is faint, and slight, and transitory. To a vitiated palate no meat has its right taste ; with a debauched mind no reasoning has its proper influence.

But secondly : have we not also, from Scripture, reason to believe, that God's holy Spirit will be assisting to those who earnestly pray for it, and who sincerely prepare themselves for its reception ; and that it will be assisting to them in this matter of faith in religion. The language of Scripture is, that God gives his holy Spirit to them that ask it ; and moreover, that to them who use and improve it, as they ought, it is given in more and more abundance. "He that hath, to him shall be given more. He that hath not, from him shall be taken away even that which he hath." Matt. xiii. 12. He who is studious to improve his measure of grace, shall find that measure increased upon him. He who neglects or stifles, neglects through irreligion, carelessness, and heedlessness, buries in sensuality, or stifles by the opposition of sin, the portion of grace and assistance which is vouchsafed to him, he, the Scripture says, will find that portion withdrawn from him. Now, this being the general nature and economy of God's assisting grace, there is no reason why it should not extend to our faith, as well as to our practice ; our perceiving the truth, as well as our obeying the truth, may be helped and succoured by it. God's Spirit can have access to our understandings, as well as our affections. He can render the mind sensible to the impressions of evidence, and the power of truth. If creatures, like us, might take upon themselves to judge what is a proper object of divine help, it should seem to be a serious, devout, humble, and apprehensive mind, anxiously desiring to learn and know the truth : and, in order to know it, keeping the heart and understanding pure and prepared for that purpose ; that is to say, carefully abstaining from the indulgence of passions, and from practices which harden and indispose the mind against religion. I say, a mind, so guarding and qualifying itself, and imploring, with devout earnestness and solicitude, the aid of God's holy Spirit in its meditations and inquiries, seems, so far as we can presume to judge, as meet an object of divine help and favour as any of which we can form an idea : and it is not for us, to narrow the promises of God concerning his assisting grace, so as, without authority, to exclude such an object from it.

From the doctrine, which has been thus concisely proposed, various important rules and reflections arise.

First ; let not men, involved in sinful courses, wonder at the difficulties which they meet with in religion. It is an effect of sin, which is almost sure to follow. Sin never fails, both to magnify real difficulties and to suggest imaginary ones. It rests and dwells upon objections, because they help the sinner, in some measure, to excuse his conduct to himself. They cause him to come to a conclusion, which permits the gratification of his passions, or the compassing of his purpose. Deep and various is the deceitfulness of sin, of licentious sins most particularly ; for they cloud the understanding ; they disqualify men for serious meditation of any kind ; above all, for the meditation of religion.

Secondly ; let them, who ask for more light, first take care to act up to the light which they have. Scripture and experience join their testimony to this point, namely, that they, who faithfully practise what they do know, and live agreeably to the belief which they have, and to the just and rational consequences of that belief, seldom fail to proceed further, and to acquire more and more confidence in the truth of religion ; whereas if they live in opposition to the degree of belief which they have, be it what it may, even it will gradually grow weaker and weaker, and, at length, die away in the soul.

Thirdly ; let them, who are anxious to arrive at just sentiments of religion, keep their minds in a capable state ; that is, free from the bias of former decisions made, or of former doubts conceived, at a time, when the power and influence of sinful temptation was upon them ; suggested, in fact, lest they should find themselves obliged to give up some gratification upon which they had set their hearts ; and which decisions, nevertheless, and doubts have the same operation upon their judgments, as if they had been the result of the most pure and impartial reasoning. It is not peculiar to religion ; it is true of all subjects, that the mind is sure almost to be misled, which lies under a load of prejudice contracted from circumstances, in which it is next to impossible to weigh arguments justly, or to see clearly.

Fourthly; let them, let all, especially those who find themselves in a dissatisfied state of mind, fly to prayer. Let them pray earnestly and incessantly for God's assisting grace and influence: assisting, if it be his good pleasure, as well our minds and understandings in searching after truth, as our hearts and affections in obeying it. I say again, let us pray unceasingly for grace and help from the Spirit of God. When we pray for any worldly object, we may pray mistakenly. We may be ignorant of our own good; we may err egregiously concerning it. But when we pray for spiritual aid and grace, we are sure that we pray for what we want; for what, if granted, will be the greatest of all blessings. And we pray with hope, because we have this gracious assurance given us by the Lord himself of grace and mercy; "if ye, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him." Matt. vii. 11.

The Efficacy of the Death of Christ.

HEBREWS, ix. 26. •

Now once in the end of the world hath he appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself.

THE salvation of mankind, and most particularly in so far as the death and passion of our Lord Jesus Christ are concerned in it; and whereby he comes to be called our Saviour and our Redeemer, ever has been, and ever must be, a most interesting subject to all serious minds.

Now there is one thing in which there is no division or difference of opinion at all; which is, that the death of Jesus Christ is spoken of, in reference to human salvation, in terms and in a manner, in which the death of no person whatever is spoken of besides. Others have died martyrs as well as our Lord. Others have suffered in a righteous cause, as well as he; but that is said of him, and of his death and sufferings, which is not said of any one else. An efficacy and a concern are ascribed to them, in the business of human salvation, which are not ascribed to any other.

What may be called the first Gospel declaration upon this subject, is the exclamation of John the Baptist, when he saw Jesus coming unto him: "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sins of the world." I think it plain, that when John called our Lord the Lamb of God, he spoke with a relation to his being sacrificed, and to the effect of that sacrifice upon the pardon of human sin; and this, you will observe, was said of him, even before he entered upon his office. If any doubt could be made of the meaning of the Baptist's expression, it is settled by other places, in which the like allusion to a Lamb is adopted; and where the allusion is specifically applied to his death, considered as a sacrifice.

In the Acts of the Apostles, the following words of Isaiah are, by Philip the evangelist, distinctly applied to our Lord, and to our Lord's death. "He was led as a sheep to the slaughter; and like a Lamb dumb before his shearers: so opened he not his mouth; in his humiliation his judgment was taken away, and who shall declare his generation? for his life is taken from the earth:" therefore it was to his death, you see, that the description relates. Now, I say, that this is applied to Christ most distinctly; for the pious eunuch, who was reading the passage in his chariot, was at a loss to know to whom it should be applied. "I pray thee," saith he to Philip, "of whom speaketh the prophet this? of himself or of some other man?" And Philip, you read, taught him that it was spoken of Christ. And I say, secondly, that this particular part and expression of the prophecy being applied to Christ's death, carries the whole prophecy to the same subject: for it is undoubtedly one entire prophecy: therefore the other expressions, which are still stronger, are applicable as well as this. "He was wounded for our transgressions; he was bruised for our iniquities: the chastisement of

of our peace was upon him; and with his stripes we are healed: the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all." There is a strong and very apposite text of St. Peter's, in which the application of the term "Lamb" to our Lord, and the sense, in which it is applied, can admit of no question at all. It is in the 1st chapter of the 1st epistle, the 18th and 19th verses: "Forasmuch as ye know, that ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, but with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot." All the use I make of these passages is to show, that the prophet Isaiah, six hundred years before his birth; St. John the Baptist, upon the commencement of his ministry; St. Peter his friend, companion, and apostle, after the transaction was over, speak of Christ's death, under the figure of a Lamb being sacrificed: that is, as having the effect of a sacrifice, the effect in kind, though infinitely higher in degree, upon the pardon of sins, and the procurement of salvation; and that this is spoken of the death of no other person whatever.

Other plain and distinct passages, declaring the efficacy of Christ's death, are the following; Hebrews, ix. 26. "Now once in the end of the world hath he appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself. Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many: and unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation." And in the xth chap. 12th ver. "This man, after he had offered one sacrifice for sin, for ever sat down at the right hand of God, for by one offering he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified." I observe again, that nothing of this sort is said of the death of any other person; no such efficacy is imputed to any other martyrdom. So likewise, in the following text, from the Epistle to the Romans: While we were yet sinners Christ died for us; much more then being now justified by his blood we shall be saved from wrath through him: for if, when we were enemies, we were reconciled to God by the death of his Son, much more being reconciled we shall be saved by his life." "Reconciled to God by the death of his Son; therefore that death had an efficacy in our reconciliation; but reconciliation is preparatory to salvation. The same thing is said by the same apostle in his Epistle to the Colossians: "He has reconciled us to his Father in his cross, and in the body of his flesh through death." What is said of reconciliation in these texts, it is said in other texts of sanctification, which also is preparatory to salvation. Thus, Hebrews, x. 10. "we are sanctified:" how? namely, "by the offering of the body of Christ once for all:" so again in the same epistle, "the blood of Jesus is called the blood of the covenant by which we are sanctified."

In these and many more passages, that lie spread in different parts of the New Testament, it appears to be asserted, that the death of Christ had an efficacy in the procurement of human salvation. Now these expressions mean something: mean something substantial: they are used concerning no other person, nor the death of any other person whatever. Therefore Christ's death was something more than a confirmation of his preaching; something more than a pattern of a holy and patient, and perhaps voluntary, martyrdom; something more than necessarily antecedent to his resurrection, by which he gave a grand and clear proof of human resurrection. Christ's death was all these, but it was something more; because none of these ends, nor all of them, satisfy the text you have heard; come up to the assertions and declarations which are delivered concerning it.

Now allowing the subject to stop here; allowing that we know nothing, nor can know any thing concerning it, but what is written; and that nothing more is written, than that the death of Christ had a real and essential effect upon human salvation: we have certainly before us a doctrine of a very peculiar, perhaps I may say, of a very unexpected kind, in some measure hidden in the counsels of the divine nature, but still so far revealed to us, as to excite two great religious sentiments, admiration and gratitude.

That a person of a nature different from all other men; nay superior, for so he is distinctly described to be, to all created beings, whether men or angels:

united with the Deity as no other person is united; that such a person should come down from heaven, and suffer upon earth the pains of an excruciating death, and that these his submissions and sufferings should avail and produce a great effect in the procurement of the future salvation of mankind, cannot but excite wonder. But it is by no means improbable on that account; on the contrary it might be reasonably supposed beforehand, that if any thing was disclosed to us touching a future life, and touching the dispensations of God to men, it would be something of a nature to excite admiration. In the world in which we live, we may be said to have some knowledge of its laws and constitution, and nature: we have long experienced them: as also of the beings with whom we converse, or amongst whom we are conversant, we may be said to understand something: at least they are familiar to us: we are not surprised with appearances which every day occur. But of the world and the life to which we are destined, and of the beings amongst whom we may be brought, the case is altogether different. Here is no experience to explain things; no use or familiarity to take off surprise, to reconcile us to difficulties, to assist our apprehension. In the new order of things, according to the new laws of nature, every thing will be suitable; suitable to the beings who are to occupy the future world; but that suitability cannot, as it seems to me, be possibly perceived by us, until we are acquainted with that order, and with those beings. So that it arises, as it were from the necessity of things, that what is told us by a divine messenger of heavenly affairs, of affairs purely spiritual, that is, relating purely to another world, must be so comprehended by us, as to excite admiration.

But secondly; partially as we may, or perhaps must, comprehend this subject, in common with all subjects which relate strictly and solely to the nature of our future life, we may comprehend it quite sufficiently for one purpose; and that is gratitude. It was only for a moral purpose that the thing was revealed at all: and that purpose is a sense of gratitude and obligation. This was the use which the apostles of our Lord, who knew the most, made of their knowledge. This was the turn they gave to their meditations upon the subject; the impression it left upon their hearts. That a great and happy Being should voluntarily enter the world in a mean and low condition, and humble himself to a death upon the cross, that is, to be executed as a malefactor, in order, by whatever means it was done, to promote the attainment of salvation to mankind, and to each and every one of themselves, was a theme they dwelt upon with feelings of the warmest thankfulness; because they were feelings proportioned to the magnitude of the benefit. Earthly benefits are nothing compared with those which are heavenly. That they felt from the bottom of their souls. That, in my opinion, we do not feel as we ought. But feeling this, they never ceased to testify, to acknowledge, to express the deepest obligation, the most devout consciousness of that obligation, to their Lord and Master; to him whom, for what he had done and suffered, they regarded as the finisher of their faith, and the author of their salvation.

SERMON XXXIII.

By the Rev. WILLIAM PALEY, D.D.

Pure Religion.

JAMES, i. 27.

Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this, To visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world.

NOTHING can be more useful than summary views of our duty, if they be well drawn and rightly understood. It is a great advantage to have our business laid before us altogether; to see at one comprehensive glance, as it were, what we are to do, and what we are not to do. It would be a great ease and satisfaction to both, if it were possible, for a master to give his servant directions for his conduct in a single sentence, which he, the servant had only to apply and draw out into practice, as occasions offer themselves, in order to discharge every thing which was required or expected from him. This, which is not practicable in civil life, is in a good degree so in a religious life; because a religious life proceeds more upon principle, leaving the exercise and manifestation of that principle more to the judgment of the individual, than it can be left where, from the nature of the case, one man is to act precisely according to another man's direction.

But then, as I have said, it is essentially necessary, that these summaries be well drawn up, and rightly understood; because if they profess to state the whole of men's duty, yet, in fact, state it partially and imperfectly, all who read them are misled, and dangerously misled. In religion, as in other things, we are too apt of ourselves to substitute a part for the whole. Substituting a part for the whole is the grand tendency of human corruption, in matters both of morality and religion; which propensity, therefore, will be encouraged, when that, which professes to exhibit the whole of religion, does not, in truth, exhibit the whole. What is there omitted, we shall omit; glad of the occasion and excuse. What is not set down as our duty, we shall not think ourselves obliged to perform, not caring to increase the weight of our own burthen. This is the case whenever we use summaries of religion, which, in truth, are imperfect and ill drawn. But there is another case more common, and productive of the same effect, and that is, when we misconstrue these summary accounts of our duty: principally when we conceive of them as intending to express more than they were really intended to express. For then it comes to pass, that, although they be right and perfect as to what they were intended for, yet they are wrong and imperfect as to what we construe and conceive them for. This observation is particularly applicable to the text. St. James is here describing religion not in its principle, but in its effects: and these effects are truly and justly and fully displayed. They are by the apostle made to consist of two large articles; in succouring the distress of others, and maintaining our own innocency. And these two articles do comprehend the whole of the effects of true religion; which were exactly what the apostle meant to describe. Had St. James intended to have set forth the motives and principles of religion, as they ought to subsist in the heart of a Christian, I doubt not but he would have mentioned love to God, and faith in Jesus Christ; for from these must spring every thing good and acceptable in our actions. In natural objects it is one thing to describe the root of a plant, and another its fruits and flowers; and if we think a writer is describing the roots and fibres, when, in truth, he is describing the fruit or flowers, we shall mistake his meaning, and our mistake must produce great confusion. So in spiritual affairs it is one thing to set before us the principle of religion, and another the effects of it. These are not to be confounded. And if we apply a description to one which was intended for the other, we deal unfairly by the writer of the description, and erroneously by ourselves. Therefore, first, let no one suppose the love of God, the thinking of him, the being grateful to him, the fearing to disobey him, not to be necessary parts of true religion, because they are not mentioned in St. James's account of true religion. The answer is, that these compose the principles of true religion; St. James's account relates to the effects. In like manner concerning faith in Jesus Christ. St. James has recorded his opinion upon that subject. His doctrine is, that the tree which bears no fruit cannot be sound at the root; that the faith which is unproductive is not the right faith: but then this is allowing (and not denying,) that a right faith is the source and spring of true virtue: and had our apostle been asked to state the principle of religion, I am persuaded he would have referred us to a true faith. But that was not the inquiry: on the contrary, having marked strongly the futility of a faith, which produced no good effects upon life and action, he proceeds in the text to tell us what the effects are which it ought to produce; and these he disposes into two comprehensive classes (but still meaning to describe the effects of religion, and not its root or principle,) positive virtue and personal innocency.

Now, I say, that, for the purpose for which it was intended, the account given by St. James is full and complete. And it carries with it this peculiar advantage, that it very specially guards against an error natural, I believe, and common in all ages of the world; which is, the making beneficence an apology for licentiousness; the thinking that doing good occasionally may excuse us from strictness in regulating our passions and desires. The text expressly cuts up this excuse, because it expressly asserts both things to be necessary to compose true religion. Where two things are necessary, one cannot excuse the want of the other. Now, what does the text teach? it teaches us what pure and undefiled religion is in its effects and in its practice: and what is it? "to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world." Not simply to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction: that is not all; that is not sufficient; but likewise "to keep himself unspotted from the world."

To visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, is describing a class, or species, or kind of virtue, by singling out one eminent example of it. I consider the apostle as meaning to represent the value, and to enforce the obligation of active charity, of positive beneficence, and that he has done it by mentioning a particular instance. A stronger or properer instance could not have been selected: but still it is to be regarded as an instance, not as exclusive of other and similar instances, but as a specimen of these exertions. The case before us, as an instance, is heightened by every circumstance which could give to it weight and priority. The apostle exhibits the most forlorn and destitute of the human species, suffering under the severest of human losses; helpless children deprived of a parent, a wife bereaved of her husband, both sunk in affliction, under the sharpest anguish of their misfortunes. To visit, by which is meant to console, to comfort, to succour, to relieve, to assist such as these, is undoubtedly a high exercise of religion and benevolence, and well selected: but still it is to be regarded as an example, and the whole class of beneficent virtues as intended to be included. This is not only a just and fair, but a necessary construction: because, although the exercise of beneficence be a duty upon every man, yet the kind, the examples of it, must be guided in a great degree by each man's faculties, opportunities, and by the occasions which present themselves. If such an occasion, as that which the text describes, present itself, it cannot be overlooked without an abandonment of religion: but if other and different occasions of doing good present themselves, they also, according to the spirit of our apostle's declaration, must be attended to, or we are wanting in the fruit of the same faith.

The second principal expression of the text, "to keep himself unspotted from the world," signifies the being clean and clear from the licentious practices to which the world is addicted. So that "pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father," consists in two things; beneficence and purity; doing good and keeping clear from sin. Not in one thing, but in two things: not in one without the other, but in both. And this, in my opinion, is a great lesson and a most important doctrine.

I shall not, at present, consider the case of those who are anxious, and effectually so, to maintain their personal innocence without endeavouring to do good to others; because I really believe it is not a common case. I think that the religious principle which is able to make men confine their passions and desires within the bounds of virtue, is, with very few exceptions, strong enough, at the same time, to prompt and put them upon active exertions.

Therefore I would rather apply myself to that part of the case which is more common, active exertions of benevolence accompanied with looseness of private morals. It is a very common character; but I say, in the first place, it is an inconsistent character: it is doing and undoing; killing and curing; doing good by our charity, and mischief by our licentiousness; voluntarily relieving misery with one hand, and voluntarily producing and spreading it with the other. No real advance is made in human happiness by this contradiction; no real betterness or improvement promoted.

But then, may not the harm a man does by his personal vices be much less than the good he does by his active virtues? This is a point, in which there is large room for delusion and mistake. Positive charity and acts of humanity are often of a conspicuous nature, naturally and deservedly engaging the praises of mankind, which are followed by our own. No one does, no one ought to speak against them, or attempt to disparage them: but the effect of vice and licentiousness, not only in its immediate consequences, but in its remote and ultimate tendencies, which ought all to be included in the account—the mischief which is done by the example, as well as by the act—is seldom honestly computed by the sinner himself. But I do not dwell further upon this comparison, because I insist, that no man has a right to make it; no man has a right, whilst he is doing occasional good, and yet indulging his vices and his passions, to strike a balance, as it were, between the good and the harm. This is not Christianity; this is not pure and undefiled religion before God and the Father, let the balance lie on which side it will. For our text declares (and our text declares no more than what the Scriptures testify from one end to the other,) that religion demands both. It demands active virtue, and it demands innocence of life. I mean it demands sincere and vigorous endeavours in the pursuit of active virtue, and endeavours equally sincere and firm in the preservation of personal innocence. It makes no calculation which is better; but it requires both.

Shall it be extraordinary, that there should be men, forward in active charity and in positive beneficence, who yet put little or no constraint upon their personal vices? I have said that the character is common, and I will tell you why it is common. The reason is (and there is no other reason,) that it is usually an easier thing to perform acts of beneficence, even of expensive and troublesome beneficence, than it is to command and controul our passions; to give up and discard our vices; to burst the bonds of the habits which enslave us. This is the very truth of the case: so that the matter comes precisely to this point. Men of active benevolence, but of loose morals, are men who are performing the duties which are easy to them, and omitting those which are hard. They may place their own character to themselves in what view they please: but this is the truth of the case, and let any one say, whether this be religion; whether this be sufficient. The truly religious man, when he has once decided a thing to be a duty, has no farther question to ask; whether it be easy to be done, or whether it be hard to be done, it is equally a duty. It then becomes a question of fortitude, of resolution, of firmness, of self-command, and self-government; but not of duty or obligation; these are already decided upon.

But least of all (and this is the inference from the text, which I wish most to press upon your attention,) least of all does he conceive the hope of reaching heaven by that sort of compromise, which would make easy, nay perhaps pleasant duties, an excuse for duties which are irksome and severe. To recur, for the last time, to the instance mentioned in the text, I can very well believe, that a man of humane temper shall have pleasure in visiting, when by visiting he can succour, the fatherless and widow in their affliction: but if he believes St. James, he will find that this must be joined to and accompanied with another thing, which is neither easy nor pleasant, nay, must always almost be effected with pain and struggle, and mortification and difficulty,—the “keeping himself unspotted from the world.”

SERMON XXXIV.

By the Rev. WILLIAM PALEY, D. D.

The agency of Jesus Christ since his ascension.

HEBREWS, iii. 8.

Jesus Christ the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever.

THE assertion of the text might be supported by the consideration, that the mission and preaching of Christ have lost nothing of their truth and importance by the lapse of ages, which has taken place since his appearance in the world. If they seem of less magnitude, reality, and concern to us at this present day, than they did to those who lived in the days in which they were carried on; it is only in the same manner as a mountain or a tower appears to be less, when seen at a distance. It is a delusion in both cases. In natural objects we have commonly strength enough of judgment to prevent our being imposed upon by these false appearances; and it is not so much a want or defect of, as it is a neglecting to exert and use, our judgment, if we suffer ourselves to be deceived by them in religion. Distance of space in one case, and distance of time in the other, make no difference in the real nature of the object; and it is a great weakness to allow them to make any difference in our estimate and apprehension. The death of Jesus Christ is, in truth, as interesting to us, as it was to those who stood by his cross; his resurrection from the grave is a pledge and assurance of our future resurrection, no less than it was of theirs who conversed, who eat and drank with him, after his return to life.

But there is another sense, in which it is still more materially true, that "Jesus Christ is the same, yesterday, to-day, and for ever." He is personally living, and acting in the same manner; has been so all along, and will be so to the end of the world. He is the same in his person, in his power, in his office.

First, I say, that he is the same individual person, and is at this present time existing, living, acting. He is up on high. The clouds, at his ascension, received him out of human sight. But whither did he go? to sit for ever at the right hand of God. This is expressly declared concerning him. It is also declared of him, that death hath no more dominion over him; that he is no more to return to corruption. So that, since his ascension, he hath continued in heaven to live and act. His human body, we are likewise given to believe was changed upon his ascension, that is, was glorified, whereby it became fitted for heaven, and fitted for immortality: no longer liable to decay or age, but thenceforward remaining literally and strictly the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. This change in the human person of Christ is in effect asserted, or rather is referred to, as a thing already known, in that text of Saint Paul's Epistle to the Philippians, wherein we are assured, that hereafter Christ shall change our vile body, that it may be like his glorious body. Now, the natural body of Christ, before his resurrection at least, was like the natural body of other men; was not a glorious body. At this time, therefore, when Saint Paul calls it his glorious body (for it was after his ascension that Saint Paul wrote these words), it must have undergone a great change. In this exalted and glorified state our Lord was seen by Saint Stephen, in the moment of his martyrdom. Being full, you read, of the Holy Ghost, Stephen looked up steadfastly unto heaven, and saw the glory of God*, and Jesus standing on the right hand of God. At that seemingly dreadful moment, even when the martyr was surrounded by a band of assassins, with stones ready in their hands to stone him to death, the spectacle, nevertheless, filled his soul with rapture. He cried out in ecstasy, "Behold I see the heavens opened, and the Son of Man standing on the right hand of God." The same glorious vision was vouchsafed to Saint Paul, at his conversion; and to Saint John, at the delivery of the revelations. This change of our Lord's body was a change, we have reason to believe, of nature and substance so as to be thenceforward incapable of decay or dissolution. It might be susceptible of any external form, which the particular purpose of his appearance should require. So when he appeared to Stephen and Paul, or to any of his saints, it was necessary he should assume the form which he had borne in the flesh, that he might be known to them. But it is not necessary to suppose that he was confined to that form. The contrary rather appears in the revelation of Saint John, in which, after once showing himself to the apostle, our Lord was afterwards represented to his eyes under different forms. All, however, that is of importance to us to know, all that belongs to our present subject to observe, is, that Christ's glorified person was incapable of dying any more: that it continues at this day; that it hath all along continued the same real, identical being, as that which went up into heaven in the sight of his apostles; the same essential nature, the same glorified substance, the same proper person.

But, secondly, He is the same also in power. The Scripture doctrine concerning our Lord seems to be this; that, when his appointed commission and his sufferings were closed upon earth, he was advanced in heaven to a still higher state than what he possessed before he came into the world*. This point, as well as the glory of his nature, both before and after his appearance in the flesh, is attested by Saint Paul, in the second chapter of his Epistle to the Philippians. "Being in the form of God, he thought it not robbery to be equal with God." He did not affect to be equal with God, or to appear with divine honours (for such is the sense, which the words in the original will bear), "but made himself of no reputation, and took upon him the form of a servant, and was made in the likeness of man, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross." "Wherefore," i. e. for this his obedience even to the last extremity, even unto death, "God also hath highly exalted him;" or, as it is distinctly and perspicuously expressed in the original, "God also hath more highly exalted him," that is, to a higher state than what he even before possessed; insomuch that he hath "given him a name which is above every name; that at," or, more properly, in, "the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; and that every tongue should confess, that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father:" exactly agreeable to what our Lord himself declared to his disciples after his resurrection,—"All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth:" (Matt. xxviii. 18.) You will observe in this passage of Saint Paul, not only the magnificent terms in which Christ's exaltation is described, viz. "that every knee should thenceforward bow in his name, and that every tongue should confess him to be Lord;" but you will observe also, the comprehension and extent of his dominion,— "of things in heaven, of things on earth, of things under the earth." And that we are specifically comprised under this authority and this agency, either of the two following texts may be brought as a sufficient proof: "Where two or three are gathered together, there am I in the midst of you;" (Matt. xviii. 20.) which words of our Lord imply a knowledge of, an observation of, an attention to, and an interference with, what passes amongst his disciples upon earth. Or take his final words to his followers, as recorded by Saint Matthew: "Lo, I am with you always, to the end of the world,"—and they carry the same implication. And, lastly, that, in the most awful scene and event of our existence, the day of judgment, we shall not only become the objects, but the immediate objects, of Christ's power and agency, is set forth in two clear and positive texts; "The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God," (John, v. 25.) not the voice of God, but the voice of the Son of God. And then, pursuing the description of what will afterwards take place, our Lord adds, in the next verse but one,— "that the Father hath given him authority to execute judgment also, because he is the Son of Man;" which is in perfect conformity with what Saint Paul announced to the Athenians, as a great and new doctrine, namely, "that God hath appointed a day, in which he will judge the world in righteousness by that man, whom he hath ordained; whereof he hath given assurance unto all men, in that he hath raised him from the dead."

Having shown that the power of Jesus Christ is a subsisting power at this time, the next question is, as to its duration. Now, so far as it respects mankind in this present world, we are assured that it shall continue until the end of the world. Some of the texts, which have been adduced, prove this point, as well as that for which they were quoted; and they are confirmed by Saint Paul's declaration, (1 Cor. xv. 24.) "Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom to God, even the Father:" therefore he shall retain and exercise it until then. But farther, this power is not only perpetual, but progressive; advancing and proceeding by different steps and degrees, until it shall become supreme and complete, and shall prevail against every enemy and every opposition. That our Lord's dominion will not only remain unto the end of the world, but that its effects in the world will be greatly enlarged and increased, is signified very expressly in the second chapter of the Epistle to the Hebrews. The apostle in this passage applies to our Lord a quotation from the Psalms: "Thou hast put all things in subjection under his feet:" and then draws from it a strict inference: "for in that he put all things in subjection under him, he left nothing that he did not put under him." And then he remarks, as a fact, "but now we see not yet all things put under him:" that complete entire subjection, which is here promised, hath not yet taken place. The promise must, therefore, refer to a still future order of things. This doctrine of the progressive increase and final completeness, of our Lord's kingdom is also virtually laid down in the passage from the Corinthians already cited: "He must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet." For that this subjugation of his several enemies will be successive, one after another, is strongly intimated by the expression, "the last enemy that shall be destroyed is death."

Now, to apprehend the probability of these things coming to pass, or rather to remove any opinion of their improbability, we ought constantly to bear in our mind this momentous truth, that in the hands of the Deity time is nothing, that he has eternity to act in. The Christian dispensation, nay, the world itself may be in its infancy. A more perfect display of the power of Christ, and of his religion, may be in reserve: and the ages which it may endure, after the obstacles and impediments to its reception are removed, may be, beyond comparison, longer than those which we have seen, in which it has been struggling with great difficulties, most especially with ignorance and prejudice. We ought not to be moved, any more than the apostles were moved, with the reflection which was cast upon their mission, that since the "fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were." We ought to return the answer which one of them returned: that what we call tardiness in the Deity, is not so; that our so thinking it, arises from not allowing for the different importance, nay, probably, for the different apprehension of time, in the divine mind and in ours; that with him a thousand years are as one day; words which confound and astonish human understanding, yet strictly and metaphysically true.

Again; we should remember, that the apostles, the very persons, who asserted that God would put all things under him, themselves, as we have seen, acknowledged that it was not yet done. In the mean time from the whole of their declarations and of this discussion we collect, that Jesus Christ, ascended into the heavens, is at this day, a great efficient Being in the universe, invested by his Father with a high authority, which he exercises, and will continue to exercise, until the end of the world.

Thirdly, he is the same in his office. The principal offices, assigned by the Scriptures to our Lord in his glorified state, that is, since his ascension into heaven, are those of a mediator and intercessor. Of the mediation of our Lord the Scripture speaks in this wise: "There is one God, and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus:" (1 Tim. ii. 5.) It was after our Lord's ascension that this was spoken of him: and it is plain, from the form and turn of the expression, that his mediatorial character and office was meant to be represented as a perpetual character and office, because it is described in conjunction with the existence of God and men, so long as men exist: "there is one mediator between God and men, the man Jesus Christ." "Hitherto ye have asked nothing in my name:" "At that day ye shall ask in my name:" (John, xvi. 24, 26.) These words form part of our Lord's memorable conversation with his select disciples, not many hours before his death; and clearly intimate the mediatorial office, which he was to discharge after his ascension.

Concerning his intercession, not that which he occasionally exercised upon earth, when he prayed, as he did most fervently for his disciples, but that which he now, at this present time, exercises, we have the following text, explicit, satisfactory, and full. "But this man, because he continueth ever, hath an unchangeable priesthood:" by priesthood is here meant the office of praying for others. "Wherefore he is able to save them to the uttermost, that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for us." No words can more plainly declare, than these words do, the perpetuity of our Lord's agency: that it did not cease with his presence upon earth, but continues. "He continueth ever: he ever liveth: he hath an unchangeable priesthood." Surely this justifies what our text saith of him; that he is "the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever;" and that not in a figurative or metaphorical sense, but literally, effectually, and really. Moreover, in this same passage, not only the constancy and perpetuity, but the power and efficacy of our Lord's intercession are asserted: "He is able to save them to the uttermost, that come unto God by him." They must come unto God: they must come by him: and then he is able to save them completely.

These three heads of observation, namely, upon his person, his power, and his office, comprise the relation, in which our Lord Jesus Christ stands to us, whilst we remain in this mortal life. There is another consideration of great solemnity and interest, namely, the relation, which we shall bear to him in our future state. Now the economy, which appears to be destined for the human creation, I mean, for that part of it which shall be received to future happiness, is that they shall live in a state of local society with one another, and under Jesus Christ as their head: experiencing a sensible connexion amongst themselves, as well as the operation of his authority, as their Lord and governor. I think it likely that our Saviour had this state of things in view, when, in his final discourse with his apostles, he tells them: "I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also:"

(John, xiv. 2, 3.) And again, in the same discourse, and referring to the same economy. "Father," says he, "I will that they also, whom thou hast given me, be with me where I am; that they may behold my glory, which thou hast given me:" for that this was spoken, not merely of the twelve, who were then sitting with Jesus, and to whom his discourse was addressed, but of his disciples in future ages of the world, is fairly collected from his words, (xvii. 20.) "Neither pray I for these alone, but for them also which shall believe on me, through their word." Since the prayer here stated was part of the discourse, it is reasonable to infer, that the discourse, in its object, extended as far as the prayer, which we have seen to include believers, as well of succeeding ages as of that then present.

Now concerning this future dispensation, supposing it to consist, as here represented, of accepted spirits, participating of happiness in a state of sensible society with one another, and with Jesus Christ himself at their head, one train of reflection naturally arises; namely, first, that it is highly probable there should be many expressions of Scripture which have relation to it; secondly, that such expressions must, by their nature, appear to us, at present, under a considerable degree of obscurity; which we may be apt to call a defect: thirdly, that the credit due to such expressions must depend upon their authority as portions of the written word of God, and not upon the probability, much less upon the clearness of what they contain; so that our comprehension of what they mean must stop at very general notions; and our belief in them rest in the deference to which they are entitled, as Scripture declarations. Of this kind are many, if not all, of those expressions, which speak so strongly of the value, and benefit, and efficacy of the death of Christ; of its sacrificial, expiatory, and atoning nature. We may be assured, that these expressions mean something real; refer to something real; though it be something, which is to take place in that future dispensation, of which we have been speaking. It is reasonable to expect, that, when we come to experience what that state is, the same experience will open to us the distinct propriety of these expressions, their truth, and the substantial truth which they contain; and likewise show us, that, however strong and exalted the terms are which we see made use of, they are not stronger nor higher than the subject called for. But for the present we must be, what I own it is difficult to be, content to take up with very general notions, humbly hoping, that a disposition to receive and to acquiesce in what appears to us to be revealed, be it more or be it less, will be regarded as the duty which belongs to our subsisting condition, and the measure of information with which it is favoured: and will stand in the place of what, from our deep interest in the matter, we are sometimes tempted to desire, but which, nevertheless, might be unfit for us, a knowledge, which not only was, but which we perceived to be, fully adequate to the subject.

There is another class of expressions, which, since they professedly refer to circumstances that are to take place in this new state, and not before, will, it is likely, be rendered quite intelligible by our experience in that state; but must necessarily convey very imperfect information until they be so explained. Of this kind are many of the passages of Scripture, which we have already noticed, as referring to the changes which will be wrought in our mortal nature; and the agency of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the intervention of his power, in producing those changes; and the nearer similitude which our changed natures, and the bodies with which we shall then be clothed, will bear to his. We read, "that he shall change our vile body, that it may be like his glorious body." A momentous assurance, no doubt: yet, in its particular signification, waiting to be cleared up by our experience of the event. So likewise are some other particular expressions relating to the same event, such as being "unclothed," "clothed upon," "the dead in Christ rising first;" "meeting the Lord in the air;" "they that are alive not preventing those that are asleep," and the like. These are all most interesting intimations; yet to a certain degree obscure. They answer the purpose of ministering to our hopes, and comfort, and admonition, which they do without conveying any clear ideas; and this, and not the satisfaction of our curiosity, may be the grand purpose, for the sake of which intimations of these things were given at all. But then, in so far as they describe a change in the order of nature, of which change we are to be the objects, it seems to follow, that we shall be furnished with experience, which will discover to us the full sense of this language. The same remark may be repeated concerning the first and second death, which are expressly spoken of in the Revelations, and, as I think, alluded to and supposed in other passages of Scripture, in which they are not named.

The lesson, inculcated by the observation here pointed out, is this, that, in the difficulties which we meet with in interpreting Scripture, instead of being too uneasy under them, by reason of the obscurity of certain passages, or the degree of darkness which hangs over certain subjects, we ought first to take to ourselves this safe and consoling rule, namely, to make up for the deficiency of our knowledge by the sincerity of our practice; in other words, to act up to what we do know, or, at least, earnestly strive so to do. So far as a man holds fast to this rule, he has a strong ground of comfort under every degree of ignorance, or even of error. And it is a rule applicable to the rich and to the poor, to the educated and the uneducated, to every state and station of life; and to all the differences, which arise from different opportunities of acquiring knowledge. Different obligations may result from different means of obtaining information; but this rule comprises all differences.

The next reflection is, that in meeting with difficulties, nay, very great difficulties, we meet with nothing strange, nothing but what in truth might reasonably have been expected beforehand. It was to be expected, that a revelation, which was to have its completion in another state of existence, would contain many expressions which referred to that state of our which, on account of such reference, this would be made clear and perfectly intelligible only to those who had experienced that state, and to us after we suffer attained to that experience; whilst, as of ever, in the meantime, they may convey to us enough of information, to admonish us in our conduct, to support our hopes, and to incite our endeavours. Therefore the meeting with difficulties, owing to this cause, ought not to surprise us, nor to trouble us over much. Seriousness, nay, even anxiety, touching every thing, which concerns our salvation, no thoughtful man can help; but it is possible we may be distressed by doubts and difficulties more than there is any occasion to be distressed.

Lastly, under all our perplexities, under all the misgivings of mind, to which even good men (such is the infirmity of human nature) are subject, there is this important assurance to resort to, that we have a protection over our heads, which is constant and abiding: that God, blessed be his name, is for evermore: that Jesus Christ our Lord is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever: that, like as a traveller by land or sea, go where he will, always sees, when he looks up, the same sun; so in our journey through a varied existence, whether it be in our present state, or in our next state, or in the awful passage from one to the other; in the world in which we live, or in the country which we seek; in the hour of death, no less than in the midst of health, we are in the same upholding hands, under the same sufficient and unfailing support.

SERMON XXXV

By the Rev. WILLIAM PALEY, D. D.

Neglect of Warnings.

DEUT. xxxii. 29.

Oh that they were wise, that they understood this, that they would consider their latter end!

THERE is one great sin, which, nevertheless, may not be amongst the number of which we are sensible, and of our Consciences accuse us: and it is the neglect of warnings.

our duty to consider this life not as a probationary state: nor ever think truly or act rightly, but so long as we have this consideration fully before our eyes. Now one character of a state, suited to qualify and prepare rational and improvable creatures for a better state, consists in the warnings which it is constantly giving them; and the providence of God, by placing us in such a state, becomes the author of these warnings. It is his paternal care which admonishes us by and through the events of life and death that pass before us. Therefore it is a sin against Providence to neglect them. It is hardness and determination in sin; or it is blindness, which in whole or in part is wilful; or it is giddiness, and levity, and contemptuousness in a subject which admits not of these dispositions towards it, without great offence to God.

A serious man hardly ever passes a day, never a week, without meeting with some warning to his conscience; without something to call to his mind his situation with respect to his future life. And these warnings, as perhaps was proper, come the thicker upon us, the farther we advance in life. The dropping into the grave of our acquaintance, and friends, and relations, what can be better calculated, not to prove (for we do not want the point to be proved), but to possess our hearts with a complete sense and perception of the extreme peril and hourly precariousness of our condition; namely, to teach this momentous lesson, that when we preach to you concerning heaven and hell, we are not preaching concerning things at a distance, things remote; things long before they come to pass; but concerning things near, soon to be decided, in a very short time to be fixed one way or the other? This is a truth of which we are warned by the course of mortality; yet, with this truth confessed, with these warnings before us, we venture upon sin. But it will be said, that the events which ought to warn us are out of our mind at the time. But this is not so. Were it that these things came to pass in the wide world only at large, it might be that we should seldom hear of them, or soon forget them. But the events take place where we ourselves are; within our own doors; in our own families; amongst those with whom we have the most constant correspondence; the closest inter-

the strictest connection? It is impossible that such events can be out of our mind: nor is it the fact. The fact is, that, knowing them, we act in defiance of them: which is neglecting warnings in the worst sense possible. It aggravates the dangerousness; it aggravates the desperateness of sin: but it is so nevertheless. Supposing these warnings to be sent by Providence, or that we believe, and have reason to believe, and ought to believe that they are so sent, then the aggravation is very great.

We have warnings of every kind. Even youth itself is continually warned, that there is no reliance to be placed, either on strength or constitution or early age: that, if they count upon life as a thing to be reckoned secure for a considerable number of years, they calculate most falsely: and if they act upon this calculation, by allowing themselves in the vices which are incidental to their years, under a notion that it will be long before they shall have to answer for them, and before that time come they shall have abundant reason for repenting and amending: if they suffer such arguments to enter into their minds, and act upon them, then are they guilty of neglecting God in his warnings. They not only err in point of just reasoning, but they neglect the warnings which God has expressly set before them. Or, if they take upon themselves to consider religion as a thing not made or calculated for them; as much too serious for their years; as made and intended for the old and the dying; at least as what is unnecessary to be entered upon at present, as what may be postponed to a more suitable time of life: whenever they think thus, they think very presumptuously. They are justly chargeable with neglecting warnings. And what is the event? These postponers never enter upon religion at all, in earnest or effectually. That is the end and event of the matter. To account for this, shall we say, that they have so offended God by neglecting his warnings, as to have forfeited his grace? Certainly we may say that this is not the method of obtaining his grace; and that his grace is necessary to our conversion. Neglecting warnings is not the way to obtain God's grace; and God's grace is necessary to conversion. The young, I repeat again, want not warnings. Is it new? is it unheard of? is it not, on the contrary, the intelligence of every week, the experience of every neighbourhood, that young men and young women are cut off? Man is, in every sense, a flower of the field. The flower is liable to be cut down in its bloom and perfection, as well as in its withering and its decays. So is man: and one probable cause of this ordination of Providence is, that no one of any age may be so confident of life as to allow himself to transgress God's laws; that all of every age may live in constant awe of their Maker.

I do admit, that warnings come the thicker upon us as we grow old. We have more admonitions both in our remembrances, and in our observations, and of more kinds. A man, who has passed a long life, has to remember preservations from danger, which ought to inspire him both with thankfulness and caution. Yet I fear we are very deficient in both these qualities. We call our preservations escapes, not preservations, and so we feel no thankfulness for them: nor do we turn them into religious cautions. When God preserved us, he meant to warn us. When such instances, therefore have no effect upon our minds, we are guilty before God of neglecting his warnings. Most especially if we have occasion to add to all other reasons for gratitude this momentous question, What would have become of us, what have been our condition, if we had risked in the danger by which our lives were threatened? The parable of the fig-tree (Luke, xiii. verse 6.) is a most apt Scripture for persons under the circumstances we have described. When the Lord had said, "cut it down: why cumbereth it the ground?" he was entreated to try it one year longer; and then if it proved not fruitful, to cut it down. Christ himself there makes the application twice over (verses 3d and 5th), "except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish." If the present, or if the then, state of our conscience and of our souls call up this reflection, then are we very guilty indeed, if such preservations leave no religious impression upon us: or if we suffer the temporary impression to pass off without producing in us a change for the better.

Infirmities, whether they be of health, or of age, decay, and weakness, are warnings. And it has been asked, with some degree of wonder, why they make so little impression as they do? One chief reason is this: they who have waited for warnings of this kind before they would be converted, have generally waited until they are become hardened in sin. Their habits are fixed. Their character has taken its shape and form. Their disposition is thoroughly infected and invested with sin. When it is come to this case, it is difficult for any call to be heard; for any warning to operate. It is difficult; but "with God all things are possible." If there be the will and the sincere endeavour to reform, the grace of God can give the power. Although, therefore, they who wait for the advances of age, the perception of decay, the probable approach of death, before they turn themselves seriously to religion, have waited much too long, have neglected, and despised, and defied many solemn warnings in the course of their lives; have waited indeed till it be next to impossible that they turn at all from their former ways: yet this is not a reason why they should continue in neglect of the warnings which now press upon them; and which at length they begin to perceive; but just the contrary. The effort is greater, but the necessity is greater. It is their last hope and their last trial. I put the case of a man grown old in sin. If the warnings of old age bring him round to religion, happy is that man in his old age, above any thing he was in any other part of his life. But if these warnings do not affect him, there is nothing left in this world which will. We are not to set limits to God's grace, operating according to his good pleasure; but we say there is nothing in this world; there is nothing in the course of nature, and the order of human affairs, which will affect him, if the feelings of age do not. I put the case of a man grown old in sin, and, though old, continuing the practice of sin: that, it is said, in the full latitude of the expression, describes a worse case than is commonly met with. Would to God that the case was more rare than it is! But allowing it to be unusual in the utmost extent of the terms; in a certain considerable degree the description applies to many old persons. Many feel in their hearts, that the words "grown old in sin," belong to them in some sense which is very formidable. They feel some grossness and defilement to be yet purged away; some deep corruption to be yet eradicated, some virtue or other to be yet even learnt, yet acquired, or yet, however, to be brought nearer to what it ought to be, than it has hitherto been brought. Now, if the warnings of age taught us nothing else, they might teach us this: that if these things are to be done, they must be done soon; they must be set about forthwith, in good earnest, and with strong resolution. The work is most momentous; the time is short. The day is far spent; the evening is come on; the night is at hand.

Lastly; I conceive that this discourse points out the true and only way of making old age comfortable; and that is, by making it the means of religious improvement. Let a man be beset by ever so many bodily complaints, bowed down by ever so many infirmities; if he find his soul grown and growing better, his seriousness increased, his obedience more regular and more exact, his inward principles and dispositions improved from what they were formerly, and continuing to improve; that man hath a fountain of comfort and consolation springing up within him. Infirmities, which have this effect, are infinitely better than strength and health themselves: though these, considered independently of their consequences, be justly esteemed the greatest of all blessings, and of all gifts. The old age of a virtuous man admits of a different and of a most consoling description.

It is this property of old age, namely, that its proper and most rational comfort consists in the consciousness of spiritual amendment. A very pious writer gives the following representation of this term of human life, when employed and occupied as it ought to be, and when life has been drawn to its close by a course of virtue and religion; "To the intelligent and virtuous," says our author, "old age presents a scene of tranquil enjoyment, of obedient appetites, of well regulated lections, of maturity in knowledge, and of calm preparation for immortality. In this serene and dignified state, placed, as it were, on the confines of two worlds, the mind of a good man reviews what is past with the complacency of an approving conscience, and looks forward with humble confidence in the mercy of God, and with devout aspirations towards his eternal and ever increasing favour."

SERMON XXXVI.

By the Rev. WILLIAM PALEY, D.D.

Preservation and Recovery from Sin.

TITUS, ii. 11, 12.

For the grace of God, that bringeth salvation, hath appeared unto all men, teaching us, that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world.

THERE are certain particular texts of Scripture which are of inestimable use; for that in a few, short, clear words, they show us the sum of our duty. Such texts ought to be deeply fixed and imprinted upon our memories; to be written, indeed, upon our hearts. The text, which I have read to you, is entitled to this distinction. No single sentence that ever was written down for the direction of mankind, comprises more important truth in less room. The text gives us a rule of life and conduct; and tells us, that to lay down for mankind this rule, and enforce it by the promise of salvation, was a great object of the Gospel being published in the world. The Gospel might include other objects, and answer other purposes; but as far as related to the regulation of life and conduct, this was its object and its purpose. The rule, you hear, is, that, "denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world." We must begin "by denying ungodliness and worldly lusts:" which means, that we must resist or break off all sins of licentiousness, debauchery, and intemperance; for these are specifically meant by worldly lusts. And these must be denied; that is, they must either be withstood in the first instance, or the evil courses into which they have drawn us must be broken off.

When a rule of morals is plain and positive, it is seldom that there is any advantage in enlarging upon the rule itself. We only weaken it by dilating it. I shall employ, therefore, my present discourse in offering such heads of advice as may be likely, by God's blessing, to assist us in rendering obedience to the rule laid down for us; an obedience upon which salvation depends.

First, then, I observe concerning licentious practices, that it is most practicable to be entirely innocent; that it is a more easy thing to withstand them altogether, than it is to set bounds to their indulgence. This is a point not sufficiently understood; though true it is, not believed. Men know not what they are doing when they enter upon vicious courses: what a struggle, what a contest, what misery, what torment they are preparing for themselves. I trust that there is hardly a man or woman living who enters into a course of sin with the design of remaining in it to the end; who can brave the punishment of hell; who intends to die in that state of sure perdition, to which a course of unrepented sin must bring him or her. No, that is not the plan even of the worst, much less of the generality of mankind. Their plan is to allow themselves to a certain length, and there stop, for a certain time, and then reform; in such and such opportunities and temptations, but in no more. Now, to such persons and to such plans, I say this, that it would not have cost them one-tenth of the mortification, pain and self-denial, to have kept themselves at a distance from sin, that it must and will cost them to break it off: adding the further consideration, that, so long as men preserve their innocence, the consciousness of doing what is right is both the strongest possible support of their resolution, and the most constant source of satisfaction to their thoughts: but that when men once begin to give way to vicious indulgences, another state of things takes place in their breasts. Disturbance at the heart, struggles and defeats, resolutions and relapses, self-reproach and self-condemnation, drive out all quietness and tranquillity of conscience. Peace within is at an end. All is unsettled. Did the young and unexperienced know the truth of this matter; how much easier it is to keep innocency than to return to it; how great and terrible is the danger that they do not return to it at all; surely they would see, and see in a light strong enough to influence their determination, that to adhere inviolably to the rules of temperance, soberness, and chastity, was their safety, their wisdom, their happiness. How many bitter thoughts does the innocent man avoid? Serenity and cheerfulness are his portion. Hope is continually pouring its balm into his soul. His heart is at rest, while others are goaded and tortured by the stings of a wounded conscience, the remonstrances and risings up of principles which they cannot forget; perpetually teased by returning temptations, perpetually lamenting defeated resolutions. "There is no peace unto the wicked, saith my God." There is no comfort in such a life as this, let a man's outward circumstances be what they will. Genuine satisfaction of mind is not attainable under the recurring consciousness of being immersed in a course of sin, and the still remaining prevalence of religious principles. Yet either this must be the state of a sinner till he recover again the virtuous courses, or it must be a state infinitely worse; that is, it must be a state of entire surrender, of himself to a life of sin, which will be followed by a death of despair, by ruin final and eternal; by the wrath of God; by the pains of hell.

But, secondly, in what manner, and by what methods are sins to be broken off? for although the maxim which we have delivered be perfectly and certainly true, namely, that it is ease and happiness to preserve innocence entirely, compared with what it is to recover our innocence, or even to set bounds to guilt, yet it is a truth which all cannot receive. I do not mean that all will not acknowledge it, for I believe that those will be most ready to give their assent to it, who feel themselves bound and entangled by the chain of their sin. But it is not applicable to every man's case; because many having already fallen into vicious courses, have no longer to consider how much better, how much happier it would have been for them, to have adhered closely to the laws of virtue and religion at first, but how to extricate themselves from the bad condition in which they are placed at present. Now to expect to break off sin, in any manner, without pain and difficulty, is a vain expectation. It is to expect a moral impossibility. Such expectations ought not to be held out, because they are sure to deceive; and because they who act under such encouragement, finding themselves deceived, will never persist in their endeavours to any purpose of actual reformation. All mankind feel a reluctance to part with their sins. It must be so. It arises from the very nature of temptation, by which they are drawn into sin. Feeling then this strong reluctance, it is very natural for men to do what great numbers do, namely, propose to themselves to part with their sins by degrees; thinking that they can more easily do it in this way than in any other. It presents to their view a kind of compromise; a temporary hope of enjoyment, for the present, at least, the criminal pleasures to which they have addicted themselves, or the criminal advantages they are making, together with the expectation of a final reform. I believe, as I have already said, that this is a course into which great numbers fall; and therefore it becomes a question of very great importance whether it be a safe and successful course or not. What I am speaking of is the trying to break off our sins by degrees. Now, in the first place, it is contrary to principle. A man is supposed to feel the guilt and danger of the practices which he follows. He must be supposed to perceive this, because he is supposed to resolve to quit them. His resolution is founded upon, springs from, this perfection. Wherefore I say, that it is in contradiction to principle, to allow ourselves even once more to sin, after we have truly become sensible of the guilt, the danger, and the consequences of it. It is, from that time, known and wilful sin. I own I do not see how the plan of gradually diminishing a sinful habit can be consistent with or can proceed from, sincere religious principles: for, as to what remains of the habit, it implies an express allowance of ourselves in sin, which is utterly inconsistent with sincerity. Whoever continues in the practice of any one known sin, in defiance of God's commands, cannot, so continuing, hope to find mercy: but with respect to so much of the habit as is yet allowed by him to remain, he is so continuing, and his continuance is part of his plan. These attempts, therefore, at gradual reformation, do not proceed from a true vital religious principle: which principle, succoured by God's grace, is the only thing that can stand against sin strengthened by habit.

So I should reason upon the case, looking at it in its own nature. The next question is, How is it in fact? Is it in fact better? Is it in experience more successful than from its nature we should expect it to be? Now I am much afraid, that all the proof which can be drawn either from observation, or consciousness; is against it. Of other men we must judge by observation: of ourselves by consciousness. What happens then to gradual reformation? Perpetual relapses, perpetually defeated and weakened resolutions. The principle of resistance is weakened by every relapse. Did the mortification of a defeat incite and quicken men to stronger efforts, it would be well. But it has a contrary effect; it renders every succeeding exertion more feeble. The checked indulgences, which, in the progress of our fancied amendment, we allow ourselves, are more than sufficient to feed desire, to keep up the force and strength of temptation: nay, perhaps the temptation acquires more force from the partial curb which we impose upon it. Then, while the temptation remains with unabated, or perhaps augmented, strength, our resolution is suffering continual relaxation; our endeavours become unsatisfactory even to ourselves. This miserable struggle cannot be maintained long. Although nothing but persevering in it could save us, we do not persevere. Finding not ease, but difficulty, increased and increasing difficulty, men give up the cause: that is, they try to settle themselves into some mode of thinking which may quiet their consciences and their fears. They fall back to their sins: and when they find their consciences easier, they think their guilt less, whereas it is only their conscience that is become more insensible, their reasoning more treacherous and deceitful. The danger is what it was, or greater; the guilt is so too. Would to God we could say, that gradual reforms were frequently successful. They are what men often attempt: they are, alas, what men usually fail in.

It is painful to seem to discourage endeavours of any kind after amendment: but it is necessary to advertise men of their danger. If one method of going about an important work be imposing in expectation, and yet, in truth, likely to end in ruin, can any thing be more necessary than to set forth this danger and this consequence plainly? This is precisely the case with gradual reforms. They do not very much alarm our passions; they soothe our consciences. They do not alarm our passions, because the absolute rupture is not to come yet. We are not yet entirely and totally to bid adieu to our pleasures and indulgences, never to enjoy or return to them any more. We only have in view to wean and withdraw ourselves from them by degrees; and this is not so harsh and formidable a resolution as the other. Yet it soothes our consciences. It presents the semblance and appearance of repenting and reforming. It confesses our sense of sin and danger. It takes up the purpose, it would fain encourage us with the hope, of delivering ourselves from this condition. But what is the result? Feeding in the mean time, and fomenting those passions which are to be controlled and resisted, adding, by every instance of giving way to them, fresh force and strength to habits which are to be broken off, our constancy is subdued before our work is accomplished. We continue yielding to the importunity of temptation. We have gained nothing by our miserable endeavour, but the mortification of defeat. Our sins are still repeated. The state of our salvation is where it was. Oh! it is a laborious, a difficult, a painful work, to shake off sin; to change the course of a sinful life; to quit gratifications to which we have been accustomed, because we perceive them to be unlawful gratifications; and to find satisfaction in others which are innocent and virtuous. If in one thing more than another we stand in need of God's holy succour and assistance, of the aid and influence of his blessed Spirit upon our souls, it is in the work of reformation. But can we reasonably expect it whilst we are not sincere? And I say again, that the plan of gradual reformation is in contradiction to principle, and so far insincere. Is there not reason to believe that this may in some measure account for the failure of these resolutions?

But it will be asked of us, what better plan have we to offer? We answer, to break off our sins at once. This is properly to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts. This is truly to do, what, according to the apostle, the Grace of God teaches us to do. Acting thus, we may pray, we may humbly hope for the assistance of God's spirit in the work and struggle through which we have to go. And I take upon me to say, that all experience is in favour of this plan, in preference to that of a gradual reform; in favour of it, both with respect to ease and happiness. We do not pretend but that a conflict with desire must be supported, but that great resolution is necessary: yet we teach, that the pain of the effort is lessened by this method, as far as it can be lessened at all. Passions yielded, firmly denied and resisted, and not kept up by occasional indulgences, lose their power of tormenting. Habits, absolutely and totally disused, lose their hold. It is the nature of man. They then leave us at liberty to seek and to find happiness elsewhere, in better things: to enjoy, as well as to practise, virtue; to draw comfort from religion; to dwell upon its hopes; to pursue its duties; to acquire a love, a taste, and relish for its exercises and meditations.

One very general cause of entanglement in habits of sin, is the connexion which they have with our way of life, with our business, with the objects that are continually thrown in our way, with the practices and usages which prevail in the company we keep. Every condition of life has its particular temptation. And not only so, but when we have fallen into evil habits, these habits so mix themselves with our method of life, return so upon us at their usual times, and places, and occurrence of objects, that it becomes very difficult to break the habit without a general change of our whole system. Now I say, whenever this is a man's case, that he cannot shake off his sins without giving up his way of life, he must give up that also, let it cost what it will. For it is, in truth, no other sacrifice than what our Saviour himself in the strongest terms enjoins, when he bids his disciples to pluck out a right eye, or cut off a right hand (that is, surrender whatever is most dear or valuable to them), that they be not cast with all their members into hell fire. If a trade or business cannot be followed without giving into practices which conscience does not approve, we must relinquish the trade or business itself. If it cannot be followed without bringing us into the way of temptation to intemperance, more than we can withstand, or in fact do withstand, we must also relinquish it, and turn ourselves to some safer course. If the company we keep, the conversation we hear, the objects that surround us, tend to draw us, and do in fact draw us, into debauchery and licentiousness, we must fly from the place, the company, and the objects, no matter with what reluctance we do so, or what loss and inconvenience we suffer by doing it. This may appear to be a hard lesson; it is, nevertheless, what right reason dictates, and what, as hath already been observed, our Saviour himself enjoins, in terms made as strong and forcible as he could make them.

Sometimes men are led by prudential motives, or by motives of mere inclination, to change their employment, their habitation, or their station of life. These occasions, afford excellent and invaluable opportunities for correcting and breaking off any vicious habits which we may have contracted. It is when many associations, which give strength to a sinful habit, are interrupted and dissolved by the change which has taken place, that we can best resolve to conquer the sin, and set out upon a new course and a new life. The man who does not take advantage of such opportunities when they arise, has not the salvation of his soul at heart: nevertheless, they are not to be waited for.

But to those sudden changes which we recommend, will it be objected that they are seldom lasting? Is this the fact? Are they more liable to fail, than attempts to change gradually? I think not. And there is always this difference between them. A sudden change is sincere at the time: a gradual change never is such truly and properly: and this is a momentous distinction. In every view and in every allowance, and in every plea of human frailty, we must distinguish between what is consistent with sincerity, and what is not. And in these two methods of setting about a reformation, by reason of their different character in this respect, the first may, though with fear and humility, expect the help of God's aiding Spirit, the other hardly can. For whilst not by surprise and unpremeditatedly we fall into casual sins, but whilst by plan and upon system we allow ourselves in licences, which, though not so many or so great as before, are still, whenever they are indulged, so many known sins; whilst, in a word, though we imagine ourselves to be in a progress of amendment, we yet deliberately continue to sin, our endeavours are so corrupted, I will not say by imperfection, but by insincerity, that we can hardly hope to call down upon them the blessing of Almighty God.

Reformation is never impossible; nor, in a strict sense, can it be said to be doubtful. Nothing is, properly speaking, doubtful, which it is in a man's power to accomplish; nothing is doubtful to us, but what is placed out of the reach of our will, or depends upon causes which we cannot influence; and this is not the case with reformation from sin. On the other hand, if we look to experience, we are compelled, though with grief of heart, to confess, that the danger is very great of a man, who is engaged in a course of sin, never reforming from his sin at all. Oh, let this danger be known! Let it stand, like a flaming sword, to turn us aside from the road to vice. Let it offer itself in its full magnitude. Let it strike, as it ought, the souls of those who are upon the brink, perhaps, of their whole future fate; who are tempted; and who are deliberating about entering some course of sin.

Let also the perception and conviction of this danger sink deep into the hearts of all who are in such a situation, as that they must either reform or perish. They have it in their power, and it must be now their only hope, by strong and firm exertion, to make themselves an exception to the general lot of habitual sinners. It must be an exception. If they leave things to their course, they will share the fate in which they see others, involved in guilt like themselves, and their lives. It is only by a most strenuous effort they can rescue themselves from it. We apprise them, that their best hope is in a sudden and complete change, sincerely begun, faithfully persisted in; broken, it is possible, by human frailty, but never changed into a different plan, never declining into a compromised, partial, gradual reform; on the contrary, resumed with the same sincerity as that with which it set out, and with a force of resolution, and an earnestness of prayer, increased in proportion to the clearer view they have acquired of their danger and of their want.

SERMON XXXVII.

By the Rev. Dr. ISAAC BARROW.

Of the Excellency of the Christian Religion.

1 Cor. ii. 6.

We shall speak wisdom to those which are perfect.

THE meaning of these words I take to be this: "That however some parts of the Christian doctrine, which St. Paul discovered unto those whom he instructed therein, without the advantages of subtle reasoning or elegant language, might seem to persons really ignorant, or be thought foolish and unreasonable by men prepossessed with contrary notions and corrupt affections: yet that the whole doctrine when entirely disclosed unto perfect men, such as are of adult and improved understandings, void of prejudice and free from vicious dispositions, would appear wisdom: that is, not only exactly true, but highly important and well adapted to attain the best ends, even such as are manifestly the most excellent, namely, the glorifying of God, and the salvation of men." This seems to be the meaning of St. Paul's assertion; and from hence I will endeavour briefly to represent some of the peculiar excellencies and perfections of the Christian religion, whereby the truth and wisdom thereof will be fully evinced.

The first excellency peculiar to the Christian doctrine, is, that it gives us a true, proper, and complete character or notion of God; such as perfectly agrees with what the best reason dictates, the works of nature declare, ancient tradition doth attest, and common experience testify: such a character as tends to produce in us love and reverence towards God, and to engage us to the strictest duty and obedience. It ascribes unto him the highest and greatest perfections of nature. In his essence it represents him one, eternal, perfectly simple and pure, omnipresent, omniscient, omnipotent, independent, impassible, and immutable; also as to his will and manner of acting, most absolute and free, good and benign, holy and just, true and faithful. It acknowledges him the maker and preserver of all beings, both material and immaterial, visible and invisible. It attributes to him supreme majesty and authority over all: it informs us, that he framed this visible world for our use and benefit, preserving it, and governing us, with a particular care and providence. It discovers to us, that he deals very tenderly with rational creatures, being exceedingly careful of their good, most beneficent and merciful towards them; that he compassionates their suffering, is inclinable and ready to help them in their need, and to pardon their offences, if they earnestly desire and apply to him for it; and yet not so, as to indulge them in any wicked practices; he being impartially just, and inflexibly severe, towards all who obstinately persist in their iniquities. In short, it describes him most amiable in his goodness, most terrible in his justice, most glorious and righteous in all his ways of providence. In the Christian doctrine, there is nothing intermixed unworthy of, or misbecoming God, nothing added which is repugnant to what natural light discus and approves; though it discovers something which that could not, concerning God's incomprehensible nature and manner of existence, his unsearchable counsels of wisdom, his admirable methods of providence, whereby he displays his goodness and glorifies his justice. And as it became God to reveal these truths which were not in the power of man to comprehend, so they wonderfully conspiring with those perfections of God, which are otherwise discernible by us, do most evidently confirm the divinity of them. For as the gospel relates nothing of divine things contradictory to reason, though it informs us of many particulars which no man's understanding could ever conceive and penetrate; we may therefore justly presume it came from a superior wisdom, and to be worthy of God. That God should send down his eternal Son to partake of our nature, and appear in our flesh, that he might thereby with the utmost advantage discover God's merciful intention towards us, and set before us an exact pattern of good life; that by his obedience and patience he might expiate our sins and reconcile us to God, also raise in us a hope of, and lead us in the way to, eternal happiness; this is, indeed, a mystery, a depth of wisdom, far exceeding our thought or contrivance, and which, though not contrary to reason, yet is what we may better admire, than we can understand. O let us on the occasion say with Job and the Psalmist, Lord, what is man that thou shouldst thus magnify and set thy heart upon him; or the son of man, that thou makest such account of him?

And thus to instil into the minds of men a right and worthy notion of God, is most evidently a great excellency of any doctrine or religion; for according to men's conceptions of God, their practice whether religious or moral will be very much regulated. If men conceive well of God, that will induce them to render him such worship and obedience, as is worthy of, and acceptable to him; if they are ignorant of, or mistaken about him, they will perform such services, as will neither become nor please him.

A second great excellency, peculiar to the Christian religion, is, that it gives us a faithful account of ourselves, concerning our nature, original, and end; of our state, past, present, and to come; points about which no reason, history or experience could ever otherwise resolve or satisfy us in. It teaches us that we consist of a frail and mortal body, fashioned by God out of the earth, and of an immortal spirit derived from heaven, whereby we understand the dignity of our nature, the great obligations we lie under to God, and how we ought to behave both towards him and ourselves, answerable to and worthy of such a high birth and quality. It informs us that we were originally designed by a voluntary obedience to glorify our Maker, and by so doing to partake of his eternal joy and felicity; and that we were accordingly created in a state agreeable to those purposes, fit to serve God, and capable thereby to continue for ever happy; but that by our wilful disobedience we lapsed from thence, into a wretched state of blindness, disorder, frailty, sorrow, and trouble. It further acquaints us, how being thus alienated from God, and exposed to the effects of his just displeasure, we are yet again by his exceeding mercy and favour put into a capacity of being far more happy than we were before, if we will return unto God, and comply with his revealed will; or if we obstinately continue in our degeneracy and disobedience, that we shall most assuredly plunge ourselves deeper into an abyss of endless misery. It fully represents to us, what shall be our future state and final doom, according to our demeanor and deserts in this life; what a strict trial, a severe judgment all our actions, even our passant words and most secret thoughts, must hereafter undergo, and how we shall be either exceedingly happy or extremely miserable for ever. It is this doctrine only which fully resolves us, wherein the final end and happiness of man consisteth, and what is the way of attaining it; assuring us it consists, not in a confluence of temporal things, but in the favour and enjoyment of God; and that this happiness is only to be obtained by a sincere and constant obedience to God's holy laws, by the practice of such piety and virtue as this doctrine prescribes. These important truths, so useful to satisfy our minds and direct our lives, are in the gospel very clearly revealed; namely, that man was at first made in a happy state, and fell from thence by his misbehaviour; that he afterwards became prone to vice and subject to pain; that our souls survive the body; and that after this life there shall be a day of reckoning and judgment, according to which good men, who are here often much afflicted, shall be then rewarded with joy and glory; and bad men, who commonly prosper here, shall be severely punished; these are points that the wisest men have always surmised, yet could not be certain of; but whose rational conjectures our religion doth positively and expressly assert and establish.

Another peculiar excellency of our religion is, that it prescribes an accurate rule of life, most agreeable to reason and to our nature, most conducive to our welfare and content, tending to procure each man's private good, and to promote the public benefit of all, by the strict observance whereof we bring our human nature to a resemblance of the divine; and we shall also thereby obtain God's favour, oblige and benefit men, and procure to ourselves the conveniences of a sober life, and the pleasure of a good conscience. For if we examine the precepts which respect our duty to God, what can be more just, pleasant or beneficial to us, than are those duties of piety which our religion enjoins? What is more fit and reasonable, than that we should most highly esteem and honour him, who is most excellent? that we should bear the sincerest affection for him, who is perfect goodness himself, and most beneficial to us? that we should have the most awful dread of him, that is infinitely powerful, holy and just? that we should be very grateful to him, from whom we received our being, with all the comforts and conveniences of it? that we should entirely trust and hope in him, who can and will do whatever we may in reason expect from his goodness, nor can he ever fail to perform his promises? that we should render all due obedience to him, whose children, servants, and subjects we are? Can there be a higher privilege than to have liberty of access to him, who will favourably hear, and is fully able to supply our wants? Can we desire to receive benefits on easier terms than the asking for them? Can a more gentle satisfaction for our offences be required, than confessing of them, repentance, and strong resolutions to amend them? The practice of such a piety, of a service so reasonable, cannot but be of vast advantage to us, as it procures peace of conscience, a comfortable hope, a freedom from all terrors and scruples of mind, from all tormenting cares and anxieties.

And if we consider the precepts by which our religion regulates our carriage and behaviour towards our neighbours and brethren, what can be imagined so good and useful, as those which the gospel affords? It enjoins us sincerely and tenderly to love one another; earnestly to desire and delight in each other's good; heartily to sympathize with all the evils and sorrows of our brethren; readily affording them all the help and comfort we are able; willingly to part with our substance, ease, and pleasure for their benefit and relief; not confining this our charity to particular friends and relations; but, in conformity to the boundless goodness of Almighty God, extending it to all. It requires us mutually to bear with one another's infirmities, mildly to resent and freely remit all injuries; retaining no grudge, nor executing no revenge, but requiting our enemies with good wishes and good deeds. It commands us to be quiet in our stations, diligent in our callings, true in our words, upright in our dealings, observant of our relations, obedient and respectful to our superiors, meek and gentle to our inferiors, modest and lowly, ingenuous and condescending in our conversation, candid in our censures; and innocent, inoffensive, and obliging in our behaviour towards all persons. It enjoins us to root out of our hearts all envy and malice, all pride and haughtiness; to restrain our tongues from all slander, detraction, reviling, bitter and harsh language; not to injure, hurt, or needlessly trouble our neighbour. It engages us to prefer the public good before our own opinion, humour, advantage, or convenience. And would men observe and practise what this excellent doctrine teaches; how sociable, secure, and pleasant a life we might lead! what a paradise would this world then become, in comparison to what it now is?

If we further survey the laws and directions of our religion, with regard to the management of our souls and bodies, we shall also find that nothing could be devised more worthy of us, more agreeable to reason, or more productive of our welfare. It obliges us to preserve unto our reason its natural prerogative and due empire; not to suffer the brutish part to usurp and domineer over us; not to be enslaved to bodily temper, or deluded by vain fancy, to commit that which is unworthy or, or mischievous to us. It enjoins us to have sober and moderate thoughts concerning ourselves, suitable to our total dependance on God, to our natural meanness, weakness, and sinful inclinations; and that we should not be puffed up with self-conceit, or vain confidence in our wealth, honour, and prosperity. It directs us to compose our minds into a calm, serene, and cheerful state; that we should not easily be moved with anger, distracted with care or trouble, nor disturbed with any accident; but that we should learn to be content in every condition, and patiently bear all events that may happen to us. It commands us to restrain our appetites, to be temperate in our enjoyments; to abstain from all irregular pleasures, which may corrupt our minds, impair our health, lessen our estate, stain our good name, or prejudice our repose. It doth not prohibit us the use of any creature, that is innocent, convenient, or delightful; but indulgeth us a prudent and sober use of them, so as we are thankful to God, whose goodness bestows them. It orders us to sequester our minds from the fading glories, unstable possessions, and vanishing delights of this world; things which are unworthy the attention and affection of an immortal spirit; and that we should fix our thoughts, desires, and endeavours on heavenly and spiritual objects, which are infinitely pure, stable, and durable: not to love the world and the things therein, but to cast all our care on God's providence; not to trust in uncertain riches, but to have our treasure, our heart, hope, and conversation in heaven. And as our religion delivers a most excellent and perfect rule of life, so it chiefly requires from us a rational and spiritual service. The ritual observances it enjoins are in number few, in nature easy to perform, also very reasonable, decent, and useful; apt to instruct us in, and excite us to the practice of our duty. And our religion hath this farther peculiar advantage, that it sets before us a living copy of good practice. Example yields the most compendious instruction, the most efficacious incitement to action; and never was there any example so perfect in itself, so fit for our imitation, as that of our blessed Saviour; intended by him to conduct us through all the parts of duty, especially in those most high and difficult ones, that of charity, self-denial, humility, and patience. His practice was suited to all degrees and capacities of men, and so tempered, that persons of all callings might easily follow him in the paths of righteousness, in the performance of all substantial duties towards God and man. It is also an example attended with the greatest obligations and inducements to follow it, whether we consider the great excellency and dignity of the person, (who was the most holy son of God,) or our manifold relations to him, being our lord and master, our best friend and most gracious redeemer; or the inestimable benefits we have received from him, even redemption from extreme misery, and being put into a capacity of the most perfect happiness; all which are so many potent arguments engaging us to imitate him.

Again, our religion doth not only fully acquaint us with our duty, but, which is another peculiar virtue thereof, it builds the same on the most solid foundation. Indeed, ancient philosophers have highly commended virtue, and earnestly recommended the practice of it; but the grounds on which they laid its praise, and the arguments used to enforce its practice, were very weak; also the principles from whence it was deduced, and the ends they proposed, were poor and mean, if compared with ours. But the christian doctrine recommends goodness to us, not only as agreeable to man's imperfect and fallible reason, but as conformable to the perfect goodness, infallible wisdom, and most holy will of God; and which is enjoined us by this unquestionable authority, as our indispensable duty, and the only way to happiness. The principles from whence it directs our actions, are love, reverence, and gratitude to God; good-will to men, and a due regard to our own welfare. The ends which it prescribes are God's honour and the salvation of men; it excites us to the practice of virtue, by reminding us that we shall thereby resemble the supreme goodness, express our gratitude to our great benefactor, discharge our duty to our almighty lord and king; that we shall thereby avoid the wrath and displeasure of God, and certainly obtain his favour, mercy, and every blessing necessary for us; that we shall escape not only the terrors of conscience here, but future endless misery and torment; that we shall procure not only present comfort and peace of mind, but acquire crowns of everlasting glory and bliss. These are the firmest grounds on which virtue can subsist, and the most effectual motives to the embracing of it.

Another peculiar advantage of Christianity, and which no other law or doctrine could ever pretend to, is, that as it clearly teaches and strongly persuades us to so excellent a way of life, so it sufficiently enables us to practise it; without which, such is the frailty of our nature, that all instruction, exhortation, and encouragement would little avail. The Christian law is no dead letter, but hath a quickening spirit attending it. It sounds the ear and strikes the heart of him who sincerely embraces it. To all good men it is a sure guide, and safety from all evil. If our minds are dark or doubtful, it directs us to a faithful oracle, where we may receive counsel and information; if our passions and appetites are unruly and outrageous; if temptations are violent and threaten to overbear us, it leads us to a full magazine, where we may supply ourselves with all proper arms to withstand and subdue them. If our condition is disconsolate or desperate, here we may apply for relief and assistance: for on our earnest seeking and asking, it offers us the wisdom and power of God himself to direct, assist, support, and comfort us in all exigencies. To them, who with due fervency and constancy ask it, God hath promised in the gospel, to grant his holy spirit, to direct them in their ways, to admonish them of their duty, to strengthen them in obedience, to secure them from temptations, to support them in affliction. As this is peculiar to our religion, so it is of considerable advantage. For what would the more perfect rule signify, without power to observe, and knowledge to discern it? and how can a creature so ignorant, impotent, and inconstant as man; who is so easily deluded by false appearances, and transported with disorderly passions; know how to conduct himself, without some guide and assistance; or how to prosecute what is good for him, especially in cases of intricacy and difficulty? how can such an one continue in a good state, or recover himself from a bad one, or attain any virtuous habit, did he not apprehend such a friendly power ready on all occasions to guard and defend him? It is this consideration only that can nourish our hope, excite our courage, and quicken our endeavours in religious practice; as it assures us that there is no duty so hard, which by God's grace we may not perform, and no enemy so mighty, which, by his help, we cannot conquer; for though we are not able to do any thing of ourselves, yet we can do all things by Christ that strengthens us.

Our religion doth farther declare, that God is not only reconcileable, but desirous to be our friend, making overtures of grace to us, and offering a full pardon for all crimes we have committed. It assures us, that if we are careful to amend, God will not be extreme to mark what is done amiss; that by our infirmity we often fall, yet by our repentance we may rise again; that our endeavours to please God, though imperfect and defective, yet if serious and sincere, will be accepted by him. This is the tenor of that great covenant between heaven and earth, which the Son of God procured by his intercession, purchased by his wonderful patience and meritorious obedience, ratified and sealed by his blood, published to mankind, and confirmed the truth thereof by many wonderful miracles. Thus is our religion an inestimable benefit, and unspeakable comfort to all who sincerely embrace and firmly adhere to it; because it gives ease to their conscience, and encourages them in the practice of their duty.

The last advantage I shall mention, peculiar to the Christian doctrine, is the style and manner of its speech, which is properly accommodated to the capacity of all persons, and worthy the majesty and sincerity of divine truth. It expresseth itself plainly and simply, without any affectation or artifice, ostentation of wit or eloquence. It speaks with an imperious awful confidence, in the strain of a king; its words carrying with them authority and power divine, commanding attention, assent, and obedience: as this you are to believe, this you are to do, on pain of our high displeasure, and at your utmost peril; for even your life and salvation depend thereon. Such is the style and tenor of the scripture, such as plainly becomes the sovereign Lord of all to use, when he is pleased to proclaim his mind and will to us his creatures.

As God is in himself invisible, and that we could not bear the lustre and glory of his immediate presence, if ever he would convincingly signify his will and pleasure to us, it must be by effects of his incommunicable power, by works extraordinary and supernatural; and innumerable such hath God afforded in favour and countenance of our religion: as his clearly predicting the future revelation of his doctrine, by express voices and manifest apparitions from heaven; by frequently suspending the course of natural causes; by remarkable instances of providence; by internal attestations on the minds and consciences of men; by such wonderful means doth God demonstrate that the Christian religion came from him; an advantage peculiar to it, and such as no other institution, except that of the Jews, which was a prelude to it, could ever reasonably pretend to. I hope these considerations will be sufficient to vindicate our religion from all aspersions cast on it, by inconsiderate, vain, and dissolute persons, as also to confirm us in the esteem and excite us to the practice thereof.

And if men of wit would lay aside

their prejudices, reason would compel them to confess, that the heavenly doctrines and laws of Christ, established by innumerable miracles; his completely holy and pure life, his meekness, charity, and entire submission to the will of God, in his death, and his wonderful resurrection from the state of the dead, are most unquestionable evidences of the divinity of his person, of the truth of his gospel, and of the obligation that lies upon us, thankfully to accept him for our redeemer and saviour, on the gracious terms he has proposed. To love God with all our souls, who is the maker of our beings, and to love our neighbours as ourselves, who bear his image; as they are the sum and substance of the Christian religion, so are they duties fitted to our nature, and most agreeable to our reason. And therefore as the obtaining the love, favour, and kindness of God, should be the chief and ruling principle in our hearts, the first thing in our consideration, as what ought to govern all the purposes and actions of our lives; so we cannot possibly have more powerful motives to goodness, righteousness, justice, equity, meekness, humility, temperance, and chastity, or greater dissuaves and discouragement from all kinds of sin, than what the holy scriptures afford us. If we will fear and reverence God, love our enemies who spitefully use us, and do good in all our capacities, we are promised that our reward shall be very great; that we shall be the children of the Most High, that we shall be inhabitants of the everlasting kingdom of heaven, where there is laid up for us a crown of righteousness, of life and glory.

To conclude: let us strive to walk worthy of our holy profession and high calling in Christ Jesus, and answer the great ends of his incarnation, and dwelling among us. Let us diligently imitate the virtues of his life, and abhor the committing those sins, for the expiation of which he submitted to a bloody and ignominious death. Let the consideration of his resurrection from the grave, and ascension into heaven, strengthen our faith and hope of immortality, mortify and destroy in us all evil concupiscence and fleshly lusts, and raise our affections to things above, that in God's fit time we may inherit everlasting life. May the God of patience enable us to resist the most alluring temptations, and quietly bear the greatest afflictions, rather than wound our consciences, and make shipwreck of the faith. May the God of consolation give us will and strength to endure all labours and weariness in running to the end of our Christian race, that having preserved our innocence and purity through the stage of our lives, at Christ's second coming we may obtain everlasting bliss and glory; which God of his infinite mercy grant, &c.

SERMON XXXVIII.

By BISHOP HOPKINS.

The First Commandment.

Exod. xx. 1, 2, 3.

God spake these words, and said, I am the Lord thy God; thou shalt have none other Gods but me.

THERE are two things in general that perfects a Christian, the one a clear and distinct knowledge of his duty; the other a conscientious practice of it; and both these are equally necessary. For as we can have no solid well grounded hopes of eternal salvation without obedience, so we can have no sure, certain rule of duty without knowledge. It hath therefore pleased God, who is the great governor, and will be the righteous judge of all the world, to prescribe us laws for the regulating of our actions, that we might be informed what we ought to do, and what to avoid. And that we may not be ignorant of those laws, he hath openly declared them in his word. For when mankind had miserably defaced the law of nature, originally written in their hearts, it seemed good to God's infinite wisdom and mercy, to transcribe and copy out that law in the second table of the Scriptures.

The Bible is the statute book of God's kingdom; therein is comprised the whole body of the heavenly laws the perfect rules of an holy life, and the sure promises of a glorious one. And the Decalogue or Ten Commandments, is a summary of brief epitome of those laws, written by the immediate finger of God, and contracted into a short abridgment, both to ease our memories and gain our veneration. And if we consider how few the expressions are, and yet regard the copiousness and variety of the matters contained in them, we must acknowledge not only their authority to be divine, but also the wisdom of their great author, in reducing the whole duty of man, to so brief a compendium. The words are but few, therefore called the ten words; but the matter contained in them, is vast and infinite, and the rest of the Scripture, for the chief part is but a commentary upon them; either exhorting us to obedience by arguments, alluring us to it by promises, terrifying us from transgressing by threats, or exciting us to the one, and restraining us from the other, by examples recorded in the historical parts.

The time when the Commandments were delivered was about 2460 years after the creation of the world; the manner of its delivery was very terrible and astonishing: the wisdom of God designing it so, on purpose to possess the people with the greater reverence of it, and to revive in their minds a due respect to those old despised dictates of their natures, by their seeing the same laws invigorated with so much dread and terror. For the Decalogue is not so much the enacting of new laws, as reviving the old by a more solemn proclamation.

The manner in which God appeared to pronounce his laws, was very terrible; for thunder and lightning, earthquakes, fire, and darkness, were the prologue and introduction to it; and so dreadful was it, as to make not only the people to remove and stand afar off, but even so affrighted Moses himself, the messenger of God, as that he did exceedingly fear and quake. And this dreadful appearance of God in delivering the law, was no doubt intended to affect them with a reverent esteem of those commands, and to put them and us in mind, that if he was thus terrible only in delivering the law, he will appear much more so, when shall come to judge us for transgressing it.

But some will say, is not the law abrogated by the coming of Christ? doth not the Scripture frequently testify that we are not now under the law, but under grace, Christ being made under the law to free those who were under the law? To which I answer, so far from its being abolished by the coming of Christ; that he himself expressly tell us, he came not to destroy, but to fulfil the law.

It should be observed, that the laws which God delivered by Moses, were of three sorts, the ceremonial, judicial, and moral law. The ceremonial law concerned those observances of sacrifices and offerings, purifications and cleansings, which were typical of Christ, and that sacrifice of his, which alone was able to take away sin. The judicial law consisted of those constitutions which God prescribed the Jews for their civil government; for their state was a theocracy, that is, the laws for their religion and civil government were both divine, being immediately from God; so that their judicial law was given them to be the standing law of their nation, by which all actions and suits were to be tried and determined. The moral law is a system or a body of those precepts which carry an universal and natural equity in them, being so consonant to the light of reason, and the dictates of every man's conscience, that as soon as ever they are declared and understood, we must subscribe to the justice and righteousness of them. These are the three sorts of laws, which commonly go under the name of the law of Moses; all of which had respect either to those things which prefigured the Messiah to come, or to those which concerned their political and civil government, or to those natural virtues and duties of piety to God, and righteousness to men, that were common to them with the rest of mankind.

As for the ceremonial law, we Christians say, it is abrogated and repealed even unto the Jews themselves. For this law was given to be only a faint representation of Christ. Indeed, the Jews saw some glimmering light of him in their ceremonies and observances; but now the Gospel appears, and that light which before was but blooming, is fully spread; those dimmer lights are quite extinguished thereby, and an utter end is put to all those rites and ceremonies, which intimated and supplied the want of the substance: so that to maintain now a necessity of legal sacrifices, purifying and sprinklings, is no less than to evacuate the death of Christ, and deny the shedding of that blood, which alone can purify us from all pollutions. It is the abrogation and disannulling of this ceremonial law, that the Apostle Paul so often mentions in his Epistles. As to us, the posterity and descendants of the Gentiles, the ceremonial law was never in force, being national to the Jews only, and peculiar to them; nor indeed is the judicial law in force to us, it not extending, nor never was intended to oblige us. However, the judicial law is not abrogated to the Jews, for though now in their dispersed state, the law ceases to be in force, because they are not a body politic; yet were they to be collected into a republic, most probably the same national laws would again bind them, as in former times.

As to the moral law, of which I am now treating, that is abrogated in part, as to some of its circumstances, but not as to any thing of its substance, authority, and obligation. The moral law is abrogated to Christians as it was a covenant of works, for God in man's first creation wrote this law in his heart, and added this sanction unto it, if thou dost this, thou shalt live; if not, thou shalt die the death. Now all mankind by the fall of Adam, contracting an utter impotency of obeying this law, that we might not all perish according to the rigorous sentence of it, God was graciously pleased to enter into another covenant with us, promising a Saviour to repair our lapsed condition, and eternal life upon the easier terms of faith and evangelical obedience. The moral law is also abrogated to Christians as to its condemning power, for though it sentenceth every sinner to death, and curseth every one who continueth not in all things that are written therein, to do them; yet through the intervention of Christ's satisfaction and obedience, our sins are graciously pardoned, the venom and malignity of the curse abolished by Christ, who hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us: and therefore we may triumphantly exult with the Apostle, there is now no condemnation to them that are in Christ

Jesus. So that Christians are indeed freed from the moral law, as it hath the obligation of a covenant, and a power of condemnation. But then it remains still in its full vigour and authority, considered as a standing rule for our obedience; it still directs what we ought to do, binds the conscience to the performance of it, brings guilt upon the soul if we transgress it, and reduceth us to the necessity either of bitter repentance, or eternal condemnation; in this sense, heaven and earth shall sooner pass away, than one jot or tittle shall pass from the law. As then the moral law is no other than the law of nature written upon men's hearts, at the first; (some positive ones being only superadded;) for the same reason as we are men, we owe obedience to its dictates. And indeed, we find every part of this law enforced in the gospel, and charged upon us with the same threatenings, recommended to us by the same promises, and all interpreted by our Saviour himself, to the greatest advantage of strictness and severity. We find the same rules for our actions, the same duties required, and sins forbidden, in the gospel as in the law; only in the gospel there are mitigations, which were not in the covenant of works; namely, that God, through Christ, will accept of our repentance and sincere endeavours to amend our lives, instead of that perfect obedience and spotless purity which he required under the law.

Before I particularly treat of the Decalogue or Ten Commandments, I think it necessary to give some general rules, for the right understanding and expounding them, which will be very useful for our better apprehending their full latitude and extent. The Psalmist tells us, that the commandments of God are exceeding broad, i. e. they are exceeding strait, as to any indulgence allowed to the unruly lusts and appetites of men; but exceeding broad, in comprehensiveness of their injunctions, extending their authority over all the actions of our lives. These following rules are therefore necessary for us to observe concerning the Ten Commandments. As there is no duty required, nor sin forbidden by God, but it falls under one or more of these ten words; so to the right and genuine interpretation of this law, we must take in whatsoever the Prophets, Apostles, or Christ himself hath delivered as comments or expositions thereon. For the Decalogue is a compendium of all that they have taught concerning moral worship and justice: Nay, our Saviour doth epitomize this very epitome itself, and reduceth those ten words into two, love to God, which comprehends all the duties of the first table; and love to our neighbour, which comprizes all the duties of the second; and tells us, that upon these two hang all the laws and the prophets. And indeed, a due love of God, and of our neighbour, will make us careful to perform all the duties of religion to the one and of justice to the other; and keep us from attempting any violation to God's honour, or violence to our neighbour's right. And therefore the Apostle assures us, that love is the fulfilling of the law; and that the end of the commandment is charity of love; that is, the end, completion, or consummation of the commandment, is love to God and to one another. And since most of the commandments are delivered in negative or prohibiting terms, and only the fourth and fifth in affirmative ones; we ought to observe this rule, that the affirmative commands include in them a prohibition of the contrary sin; and the negative commands include an injunction of the contrary duty: and also the contrary to what is commanded, is always implied to be forbidden. For instance, God, in the third commandment, forbids the taking his name in vain; therefore by consequence, the hallowing and sanctifying his name is therein commanded. The fourth requires the sanctifying of the sabbath-day; therefore it follows, that the profanation of it, is thereby prohibited. The fifth, commands us to honour our parents; therefore it forbids us to be disobedient or injurious to them.

Observe also, that the same precept, which forbids the external and outward acts of sin, forbids likewise the inward desires and motions of sin in the heart; and the same precepts which require the external acts of duty, do also require such holy affections of the soul as are suitable thereto. For instance; the same command that requires us to worship God, exacts from us not only the outward service of the body, but much more the inward reverence and affection of our souls. That we should prostrate not only our body but our very heart at his feet; fearing him as the mighty God, loving him as the greatest good, as our only joy and happiness. So likewise that positive command, honour thy father and mother, demands from us not only the external acts of obedience to all the lawful commands of our parents and magistrates, and those whom God hath set in authority over us; but also an inward love, veneration, and esteem, for them in our hearts. And then, as for negative commands, they not only forbid the external acts of sin, but the inward motions of lust, sinful desires, and evil concupiscence. And thus we find it at large in our Saviour's excellent sermon on the mount; a great part of which is to clear and vindicate the moral law from the corrupt glosses and interpretations of the scribes and pharisees; and to shew that the authority of the law extended, not only to prohibit sinful actions, but sinful affections also. They thought it no crime to have their hearts burn with wrath, malice, and revenge, so long as they concealed it there, and did not suffer it to break forth into murder. But our Saviour assures us, that not only the sin of murder is forbidden by the law, but all the incentives to, and degrees of it, whether conceived in the heart, or expressed in words. And the same as to lustful thoughts and affections, ye have heard, that it was said by them of old time, thou shalt not commit adultery; but I say unto you, that whosoever shall look upon a woman to lust after her, hath committed adultery already with her in his heart. From these few instances, and many more which might be produced, it appears that the same precept which forbids the outward acts of sin, does also prohibit the inward motions of these in the heart; and indeed there is a great deal of reason for it: for God, who is our lawgiver, is a spirit, and there is not the least thought in our mind, nor the least shadow of an imagination raised in our fancy, nor the most silent breathing of a desire in our heart, but God is privy to it; for he knows our thoughts, as the Psalmist says, as far off; he discerns our souls more clearly and distinctly than we can behold each other's faces; and therefore, it is but fit and reasonable, that his laws should reach as far as his knowledge.

Another rule for understanding the Decalogue is, to observe the commands of the second table for the sake of the first. Those duties, which immediately respect the service and worship of God, are contained in the first table; those which concern our demeanour to men, in the second. The worship and service of God is not to be performed out of respect to men; but our duty to men is to be observed in regard to God. The first table commands us not to worship idols, not to swear, not to prophane the sabbath. But if we abstain from these sins, because they will expose us to shame, or suffering among men; if we only worship God, that men may respect and venerate us, all the pomp and ostentation of our religion is but hypocrisy. For God expects to be served, not for man's sake, but for his own. The second table prescribes the right ordering of our conversation towards men; that we should be dutiful and obedient to our superiors; loving and kind to our equals; charitable and beneficial to our inferiors; just and righteous towards all. The duties are not to be done only for man's sake, but for God's; and those who perform them without respecting God in them, will lose their reward and acceptance.

The preface to the Ten Commandments carries an equal respect and reverence to them all, and contains a strong argument to enforce obedience to every one. It is usual with kings and princes on earth, to prefix their names and titles to those laws and edicts which they publish, in order to gain the more attention and greater veneration to them. And the great God, who is King of kings, when he proclaimed a law to his people Israel, that he might affect them with the deeper reverence of his authority, and make them the more afraid to transgress the laws, enacted by so mighty and glorious a majesty: He thus displays his name and stile before them; I am the Lord thy God; that they might learn to fear his glorious name. As all arguments the most prevalent and cogent, are adapted to work upon one of these two passions, our fear or love; so here, God hath accommodated himself to our temper, and proclaims his authority to beget fear; I am the Lord thy God: His goodness and mercy to engage love; that brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage. And what motives can have so strong an influence on our natures, and so readily engage us to obedience, as love and fear? What motives can be urged more enforcing than these, which are drawn both from power and goodness? The one obliging us to subjection, the other to gratitude.

He is the Lord God, the great creator, only proprietor, absolute governor and disposer of all things; and therefore we owe a reverential and awful observance to all his laws and injunctions. It is but just and reasonable, that we should be subject unto him that created us, and who, if we rebel against him, hath infinite power eternally to destroy us. He is the Lord God, whose kingdom is from everlasting to everlasting; whose dominions have no bounds, either of time or place. His voice shakes the heavens, and removes the earth out of its place. His way is in the whirlwind; storms and tempests are his harbingers. The clouds are the dust raised by his feet; the mountains quake at his presence; the hills melt away at his displeasure; the world and all the inhabitants of it shall be dissolved. Who is like unto thee, O Lord, glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders; and therefore who would not fear thee, O king of nations, tremble and be astonished when once thou art angry? Shall we then, who are vile and wretched sinners, despise the authority and majesty of the great God, before whom all the powers of heaven and earth lie prostrate? Dare we infringe his laws, and violate his commands, who is so great and terrible a God, that he can destroy us with the very breath of his nostrils? Are we able to contend with this God, are we equal to the Almighty? Who among us can dwell with devouring fire, and everlasting burnings? Did we frequently affect our hearts with a serious consideration of the dread majesty and supreme authority of the great God, we should not presumptuously provoke him. Fear is a most excellent preservative against sin; a strong fence which God hath set about his law, to keep us from breaking the bounds that he hath prescribed; and therefore, we are advised to fear God and keep his commandments; to stand in awe and sin not.

As the authority of God is here set forth to move us to obedience by working upon our fear; so his goodness and mercies are declared to us, in order to engage us thereto, from a principle of love and gratitude. The Lord thy God, who hath brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage. This, though it be a soft, yet is a most powerful and effectual argument. For hath God surrounded us with blessings, and loaded us every day with his benefits? Have we received our life, our being from him, and so many comforts in which he allows us to take delight? Have we been delivered by his watchful providence from many deaths and dangers, restored from sickness, or preserved in health? Doth he feed us at his table, clothe us out of his wardrobe, and, what is infinitely more, hath he sent his only Son, to lay down his life, and shed his most precious blood for us? Hath he revealed to us his gospel, and therein given us the promise of eternal glory; a glory which hope was not bold enough to expect, nor imagination large enough to conceive? Hath he sent his Spirit to seal and ratify his promises, and crowned us with many rich blessings here, and will reward us with joy and happiness hereafter? I say, hath he done all these wonderful things for us, and can we be so unkind and disingenuous as to deny any thing to that God, who hath bestowed on us such inestimable favours and benefits? Can we despise his precepts, who is ever willing to reward our prayers? Will not we hear him speaking unto us, who hath so often heard, helped, and saved us, when we have cried unto him? Shall we not carefully obey his laws, since he requirith obedience from us, as the evidence and expression of our love to him?—He that hath my commandments and keepeth them, he is that loveth me. And what doth the Lord thy God require of thee, but to fear the Lord thy God, and to love him, and to keep his commandments, which I command thee this day for thy good? God might have required from us the very same obedience he now doth, without promising any reward for it. We owe him all that we possibly can do, as the author of our being; and every power and faculty of our souls ought to be employed for him, who gave them to us. Thus we see how God hath enforced the observation of his laws upon us, both by his authority and his mercy; the one to work on our fear, the other on our love, and both to engage us to obedience.

I proceed to consider the precepts themselves, whereof the first and chiefest is, Thou shalt have no other Gods but me; which requires, That we have a God and worship him: That we have the true God for our God: That we have no other beside him.

It would be tedious and endless to insist particularly on all the duties included in the true and sincere worship of God. I shall therefore speak only of the three most remarkable ones which are, to love God, to fear and praise him. In this command is required the most supreme love of God; the love of him, being not only the sum of this, but all the commands of the first table; therefore our Saviour, when he gave an abridgment of the law, comprized all the ten under two great commands, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God, with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind; this is the first and great commandment; and the second is like unto it, thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. From whence the Apostle infers, that love is the fulfilling of the law. We should have a great and earnest desire after God, our souls shall pant after him as the hart panteth after the water brooks, and even thirst for the living God. Again, this command requires us to fear God; and certainly we cannot have the Lord for our God, unless we fear and reverence him: for as the love, so the fear of God, is the sum of all the commandments, and indeed the substance of all religion; and generally the character of a true worshipper and obedient servant of God is, that he is a man fearing God. If we acknowledge there is a God, it is but reasonable that we should fear his essential greatness and glory. For take away the fear of a deity, and a supreme power that can reward and punish the actions of men, and there is a flood-gate opened for all villainy and wickedness.

Another principal part of worship required in this first precept is, the invocation of the name of God in our prayers and praises. Love and fear respect the inward worship of God in our hearts, but this appertains to his outward worship, and by it we give express testimonies that we love and fear him. Prayer and praises are the tribute and homage of religion; by the one we acknowledge our dependence upon God; by the other we confess that all our blessings and comforts are from him. Such then, as neither pray unto God nor praise him, cannot be said to have a God, for they acknowledge none, but are Gods unto themselves. and as the love and fear of God are often used in scripture for his whole worship and service, so is this invocation of his name, Pour out thy fury upon the heathen that know thee not, and upon the families that call not upon thy name; that is, those who do not worship or serve him. And, as this first command requires, in the general, that the true God should be truly worshipped; so the three next following commands, prescribe the means and branches of his worship, and how he would have it performed. The second commandment requires us to worship God who is a spirit, without any visible image or representation of the deity. For as it is impossible there should be any true resemblance made of a spirit, so it is most impious to give any part of divine honour and reverence unto dumb idols. The third commandment requires, that we should never mention the name of the great God slightly and impertinently, but with the utmost veneration and serious affection. The fourth prescribes us the time which God hath set apart and sanctified for his solemn worship; so that each command of the first table is relative to divine worship, but the first is the foundation of the other three. This brings me to shew, that

We are to have the true God for our God. The ground-work of all religion, and the foundation of all our hopes, consist in owning and believing the true God: He of whom Moses affirms, that he made heaven and earth. He who made a covenant with Abraham, and miraculously delivered the Israelites out of the house of bondage, is here made the object of our adoration: He it is that is to have our prayers and praises, and all divine honours; in a word, it is he that must be loved, feared, and trusted above all things. Nor should we have any other God beside him; meaning that we should make the true God, or the God of Israel, the sole object of divine worship, and give no divine honours to any else; and which is, in effect, the same with our Saviour's precept, thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve. This was indeed the principal thing intended in this commandment; for the Israelites were too prone to forget God, to fall into idolatry, and worship the gods of the Egyptians. And therefore, to prevent this, the first commandment begins with this strict precept, thou shalt have no other Gods before me.—Thus much for the duties required in the first commandment: I now proceed to observe what is forbidden. And, in general,

Atheism, or the disbelief of a God, is prohibited and condemned by this command. For if there be no God, what difference is there whether we pray or blasphemous; whether we lead holy and pious the reins to manner of lewdness and riot; to all impure delights that vice and sensuality can recommend to our corrupt appetites? For if there be no God, there can be no rewards nor punishments: and therefore it will be necessary to shew the folly and unreasonableness of atheism, and to convince men there is a God, without which all religion and worship is but folly and madness. I shall therefore briefly confirm this great and primary truth, by such convincing and demonstrative arguments as the subject will permit

The universal consent of all nations strongly proves the being of a deity. And what all agree in must needs be accounted a dictate of nature, a maxim of truth. Though mankind have strangely differed about other things, concerning their laws, government, customs, and manner of worshipping God, yet all agree in the belief of a deity. Never was there any nation so wild and barbarous that did not acknowledge a God; their great fault and folly was to acknowledge too many. How could the world be so easily drawn into such several shapes and forms of religion, as among the Heathen were almost infinite, and among others too various and different, was there not a natural inclination in the souls of men, to embrace some religion or other, and an indelible character of a deity imprinted on their minds. Insomuch, that in the times of darkness, rather than be without a deity, some would dig gods out of their gardens, and consecrate dogs and serpents. Some few indeed may have been found, who have not believed a deity; but there is no reason from thence to conclude it no dictate of nature; for how many are there that violate the laws of nature, and do those things which the innate light and reason of a man abhor and abominate? Yet none will from thence infer, that there are no such things as natural laws. So neither though some may have razed out of their minds any notion of God, yet it does not follow that the belief of a supreme being is not an impression of nature. Another demonstration of the existence of a deity is the frame and order of the universe, in which there are as many wonders as creatures. Let us cast but our eyes upwards, and contemplate the vast expansion of the heavens, which are the canopy of the world, the roof of this great house the universe. How gloriously is this canopy studded! How many glittering lights appear to illuminate our inferior world, to discover to our eyes all visible objects, and to our minds the invisible God! Who hath gilded the rays of the sun, or silvered the face of the moon? Who hath marshalled the mighty host of heaven, and set the stars in such array, that not one of them breaks its rank, nor strays from its order? Whose hand is it that turns the great wheels of heaven, and makes them spin out days, months and years, time and life unto us? Who hath ordered the vicissitudes of day and night, summer and winter, that these run not into one another, and blind the world in confusion; but with a perpetual variety observe their just seasons and interchanges? Do not all these wonderful works proclaim aloud, that certainly there is a great and glorious God, who sits enthroned on high, who hath thus paved the bottom of heaven with stars, and adorned the inner parts of it with glories yet to us unknown? Let us descend lower through the vast ocean of liquid air. How comes it to pass, and whose wisdom and providence did so order, that there should not fall whole clouds of rain, but only drops and showers? An effect so wonderful, that scarce any other work of nature is more frequently in scripture ascribed unto God, as a demonstration of his power and goodness, than that he sendeth rain upon the earth. And let the atheist tell, how it comes to pass, that the same cloud should be both a fountain of water, and yet a furnace of fire. This the prophet particularly ascribes to the Almighty God; he maketh lightnings with the rain. If we descend into the lowest story of this great building the earth; what a variety of wonder shall we there find? That the whole mass and globe of it should hang pendulous in the air, without any thing to support it: that this great and ponderous body should be fixed for ever in its place; having no foundation to support it, but that air which every mote and fly doth easily cut through: that this round ball of earth should be inhabited on every part: these, and many other things, are such unaccountable mysteries to our comprehension, and yet by experience known to be true, that he must be an atheist out of mere obstinacy, who seriously considers them, and does not adore the infinite power and wisdom of their author.

But what makes some proud spirits backward to acknowledge God in the works of nature is, that they think by their reason to give a plausible account of those effects and phenomena which we see in the world, by deducing them from second and natural causes. Hence some have thought, that reason and philosophy are great enemies to religion, and patrons of atheism; but in truth, the atheist hath not a more smart and keen adversary than true reason and profound philosophy. I dare challenge the most learned men in the world, to give a satisfactory account of the most vulgar and common appearances in nature, without resolving them at last into the will and disposal of the God of nature. If I should ask them what makes the grass green, a stone to fall downwards, the fire to aspire upwards, or the sun to enlighten and warm the earth ; what answers can they give, but that it is the property of their natures ? If I farther enquire how their natures came to be distinguished with such properties, they must either be silent, or confess a first cause, which endowed their natures with such properties and actions : so that all must at last be resolved into, and terminate in God. And,

Unless the being of a God be presupposed, there can no tolerable account be given of the being of any thing. We see innumerable different beings in the world ; and what rational account can the atheist give how they came into being ? Why, says Epicurus, the world had once a beginning, but it was by chance ; and Aristotle, that the world is from eternity, and never had any beginning. --- In answer to the first, I say with Cicero, that they will as soon persuade me, that an innumerable parcel of loose and disordered letters, being often shaken together, and afterwards thrown out upon the ground, shall fall into such an exquisite order, as to frame a most ingenious heroic poem ; as that atoms straying to and fro at random, should casually meet to make a world consisting of heaven and air, sea and earth, and so many sorts and species of living creatures ; in the frame and composition of which we see such wonderful and inimitable skill. — And if those atoms could thus fortuitously frame a world, why had not they built houses and cities, and woven us garments, that so, by very good chance, we might have found these necessities ready provided to our hands, and saved us the trouble and labour of making them ? Again, if we look on the most contemptible worm that crawls, we shall find it a far more excellent piece of mechanism, a far more curious engine, than any the art or wit of man could frame ; and shall chance be able to make these ?

As to the eternity of the world, it is very unreasonable that such should deny a God, who yet grant the very thing for which alone they deny him. The reason that tempts atheists to deny a deity is, because they cannot conceive a being infinite and eternal ; and yet, by owning the world to be so, they run into the very inconveniency they would be thought to avoid ; and instead of acknowledging one eternal being, confess there are innumerable. But if the world be eternal, there must of necessity have been past an infinite succession of ages ; and, which is as difficult for us to conceive as an infinite being that should create the world. I could give many more demonstrations to evince, that there is such a supreme and infinite being as a deity, but these are sufficient to convince any atheist, who will be swayed by that reason which he so much desires and adores, that there is a God.

What then remains, but that having proved the folly and unreasonableness of speculative atheism, we proceed to condemn the impiety of practical atheism ; the profaneness and irreligion of those who live as without God in the world ; as if there was no God or devil, no heaven nor hell, no future state of rewards and punishments : indeed, in this sense every wicked man is an atheist, and such as the Apostle describes, they profess that they know God ; but in works they deny him, being abominable and disobedient, and to every good work reprobate. Did they really and cordially believe, that there is a just and holy God, who takes notice of all their actions ; a great and terrible Majesty, who will call them to a strict account for all their thoughts, all their discourses, and all their works ; an Almighty God, who hath prepared wrath and vengeance to inflict on all those who despise his authority and transgress his laws : I say, did they sincerely believe this, would they dare to profane his glorious and reverend name, by impertinently using it in their trifling discourses ? or rend and tear it by oaths and blasphemies, hellish execrations and curses ? Did they believe the horrors and torments, the stench and darkness, the woe and anguish of the damned in hell, which are as far from being uttrable, as they are from being tolerable ? Did they certainly believe these things, surely they would not still presume to venture on treasuring up to themselves wrath against the day of wrath. And, was this really believed, swearing, lying, and steahing, drunkenness and uncleanness, would not so generally reign among us, as now they do. Indeed, we persuade ourselves that we do believe these things ; we profess that there is a God infinitely holy and just; that he will recompense tribulation, anguish, and wrath upon every soul of man that doth evil; but, alas! this is only a verbal belief, contradicted and disowned by a practical atheism. The little influence that the belief of a just God hath upon us, to regulate our actions, and engage us to walk in an holy awe and dread of his divine majesty, clearly evinceth that we may indeed fancy these things, but do not believe them. For did we seriously and heartily believe, that there is a great and jealous God, who hath said, vengeance is mine, I will repay it, what is there in the world, that could persuade us to offend him?

Possibly there are some, who though they believe there is a God, yet are not fully persuaded that he is so holy, nor so just, as his word declares him to be; not so holy in hating our sins, nor so just in punishing them. But this is only to hope in his mercy; in defiance of his truth. He hath sworn that he will take vengeance on all impertinent wretches, and destroy such as wilfully go on in their sins; and God will be true to his threatenings as well as his promises. Indeed if we believe there is a God, and yet think he will spare us, though we go on presumptuously to add iniquity unto sin, we are far worse than any atheist. It is better, to have no opinion of God at all, than such an one as is unworthy of him. Even Plutarch an heathen could say, "it was far less injurious to him, if any should deny there was such a man as Plutarch, than to say that such an one indeed there was, but that he was faithless, incorrupt, cruel, or revengeful." Nor is it so heinous an affront against the divine majesty, to deny there is any such supreme being; as to acknowledge there is indeed a God, but that he is not infinitely holy in hating our sins, infinitely true to his threatenings, nor infinitely just in punishing men's impenitency and disobedience. This is a degree of impiety worse than atheism, and yet all wicked ungodly sinners are guilty thereof. Knew then, O sinner, and tremble, that there is a God who sees and observes all thy actions, who writes them down in the book of his remembrance, and will call thee to a strict account for them, and judge thee out of thy own mouth. But if we believe there is a God, why do we not fear and serve him? If we believe there is an heaven, and hell, and an eternity to come, why do we not live answerably to this belief? Let us either blot it out of our creed, and declare we do not believe in God the Father Almighty, or else live as those should do, who acknowledge so great and terrible, so pure and holy a God. For a speculative atheist to be profane and wicked, is but consonant to his principles; for why should not he gratify all his lusts and sensual desires, whose only hope is in this life, and who thinks not to be accountable for any thing hereafter? but for such as acknowledge a deity, to live as without God in the world, to break his laws, slight his promises, and despise his threatenings, is the greatest and most desperate madness in the world. If therefore we know, and believe in God, let us glorify him as God, paying all holy obedience to his laws, and humble submission to his will; conforming ourselves to his purity, depending upon his power and providence, trusting in his infinite mercy and goodness, until we at last arrive to that state of perfect bliss and felicity, when we shall fully know the ineffable mystery of the deity, see him that is now invisible, and live there as much by sense and sight, as here we do by faith and expectation. Thus much for the first commandment.

SERMON XXXIX.

By Dr. HOLZ.

The Second Commandment.

Exod. xx. 4, 5, 6.

Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or any likeness, &c.

ALMIGHTY God having in the first commandment settled the true object of divine worship, and confined it wholly to himself, in opposition to all manner of idols or false gods; he proceeds in this second commandment to direct us in the right way of performing it; which is not done by any images or visible representations of him, but in a spiritual manner, suited to his nature and will. This is the true design of these words, thou shalt not make to thyself any graven image. This commandment being negative, I shall first consider what is therein forbidden, and then what is commanded. The things forbidden are the making and worshipping of any graven image. Not that all making of images, pictures, or representations of any creature is hereby prohibited; or that the trade of a painter, carver, or engraver, are unlawful; for we find some images made and appointed by the order of God himself, as the cherubims, the brazen serpent, and the like; and Moses ascribes the skill of Aholiab and Bezaleel, in working the work of an engraver, to the holy spirit of God. So that all images or representations of things are not here absolutely forbidden, for that would condemn all pictures, or likeness of any thing, and render our very coin unlawful. But the images here forbidden to be made, are images of God, or representations of the divine nature; which being spiritual and immaterial, may not be represented by any bodily shape, for God being infinite and incomprehensible, cannot be represented by any image, without debasing and disparaging him: and therefore the prophet enquires, to whom will ye liken God, or what likeness will ye compare unto him? And the Apostle bids us, not to think the Godhead to be like unto gold and silver, or stone graven by the art and invention of man; and much less, to change the glory of the incorruptible God, into an image made like to corruptible man, to birds, or four-footed beasts, or creeping things.

There is such a vast disproportion between an image, and the divine nature, that we cannot liken one to the other without affronting and dishonouring God. An image can only be made of corporeal things; and for such as are finite and corruptible, to make an image of God, is to bring down that infinite being to the dimensions of a finite creature; and in effect to deny the spirituality and incorruptibility of his nature. And therefore we find a very strict charge given to the Israelites, against image-making: take heed unto yourselves, for you saw no image in the day when the Lord spake unto you in Horeb, out of the midst of the fire; that you corrupt not yourselves, and make you a graven image. And in this commandment, we have an express prohibition of making any likeness or similitude of God, by any thing either in heaven above, as by the sun, moon, and stars; or in the earth beneath, as by the fowls of the air, the four-footed beasts, or creeping things; or in the water under the earth, by the fish, or any thing in the sea; no, nor yet by the likeness of man, the lord of all these. For though God made man in his own image, yet man is not to make God in his; by reason of the infinite distance and disproportion there is between them. And when God is described in scripture with eyes, hands, and arms, and the like, yet this is done merely in compliance with our infirmities, and is spoken after the manner of men, and to be understood in a way becoming the divine majesty: but cannot justify the making any image of him, or the picturing him in any human shape, which is to prostitute our maker, and to think him such as ourselves. This is to confine omnipresence to a place, circumscribe immensity, and degrade the deity to the properties and infirmities of human nature. We may not then represent God in a bodily shape, or form false apprehensions of him in our mind, by making him like ourselves; much less are we permitted to worship any image or representation of God, thou shalt not bow down to it, or worship it.

In which words there is a two-fold worship implied; the one external, in the outward reverence, and bowing the body; the other internal, consisting in the inward worship and reverence of the mind. And we are here forbidden to give any bodily worship to images, by bowing or falling down to them. The Israelites were strictly charged, not to serve other Gods, or bow themselves unto them. And such were sharply reprov'd, who bowed the knee to Baal, or fell down before any idol. The idolatry of the heathens is frequently set forth by prostrations, bowings, and other visible acts of bodily reverence, used to their false deities; which being tokens of the inward devotion of their minds towards them, were invasions of God's prerogative, and therefore strictly forbidden. But the internal worship and reverence of the heart, is here chiefly forbidden to be given to images; for this is to make them gods, and to give the glory due to God only, to the works of men's hands, which is idolatry to be abhorred by all Christians. And not only the worshipping of images, but of God by them, is here prohibited. The worshipping of false gods, is the idolatry condemned in the first commandment. The worshipping the true God in a false way, is the idolatry forbidden in this. The ruder and more barbarous nations that mistook the object of worship, and paid it to stocks and stones, were guilty of the former; some of the wiser and more knowing among the heathen, who when they knew God, yet glorified him not as God, were guilty of the latter. These two are in scripture stiled idolaters; as we read in the first chapter to the Romans, where these wiser heathens are charged with it, because though they knew God, by the creation of the world, yet they worshipped him in a way unsuitable to his nature, namely, by images and corporeal resemblances of him, changing his glory into the similitude of men, beasts, and birds. And though they did not terminate their worship in the images, but only served God by them, it being impossible for the wiser part of them to take that for a God, or maker of the world, which they either made with their own hands, or saw made with their own eyes; yet their worshipping of God this way, so unworthy of him, is in scripture called idolatry. The papists, who worship God much after the same manner, and have recourse to the same distinctions to screen themselves, ought seriously to consider this. It is most certain, that there is a peculiar and incommunicable piece of homage due to the great Creator of all things, upon the account of his infinite and adorable perfections, and our great obligations to him. This is what we call divine worship, and is challenged by God himself in the Old Testament, and confined to him, by our Saviour, in the New, in those words; thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve: and though those who worship images, and other things, would excuse it, by making these things not the object of worship, but only means and helps to direct it to God himself; yet it is to be feared, that much more goes to the image than to God. To prevent which I shall proceed in the next place, to consider the sanction by which this prohibition is enforced. And that is taken partly from God Almighty's jealousy and tenderness for his honour; I the Lord thy God, am a jealous God; and partly from his just indignation, and severe punishment of those who violate and invade it: visiting the iniquities of the fathers upon the children, unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me.

The jealousy of God ought to be a sufficient argument to deter any from offering him this kind of affront or indignity. For if the jealousy of a man is justly to be dreaded, by all who give occasion for it, because it stirs up his highest resentment, for any violation of his honour, and arms him with a more than ordinary courage to vindicate it; certainly the jealousy of God, who is tender of his honour, and so able to repair it, is much more to be dreaded by all who wilfully invade it.

That God is thus tender and jealous, impatient of any rival, and will admit of none to participate with him in the love and honour he requires from us, we learn from the prophet Isaiah; I am the Lord, this is my name, and my glory will I not give to another, nor my praise to graven images. The jealousy here ascribed to God, must not be taken for such a vexatious, disquieting passion, as is wont to ruffle and discompose mankind, for that is inconsistent with the divine nature; but must be understood by way of accommodation and similitude to our understanding. The Hebrew word in the original signifies a strong, as well as a jealous God; importing that he is able to vindicate his honour, and will certainly punish all injuries offered to it. Jealousy of itself without strength is but an impotent and contemptible passion, but when armed with an almighty power, is justly terrible; and therefore Moses in this very precept about images, tells the Israelites, the Lord thy God is a consuming fire, he is a jealous God; and elsewhere brings in God, thus declaring, they have moved me to jealousy, with that which is not God, they have provoked me to anger with their vanities; a fire is kindled in mine anger, and shall burn to the lowest hell, and shall consume the earth with her increase, and set on fire the foundations of the mountains. Let us then ask of all, whose hearts and affections stray from their maker, do we provoke the Lord to jealousy, are we stronger than he? can our heart bear up, or our hands be strong in the day that he shall visit us? no; it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God. And yet that will be our case, if we forsake God, and follow idols. Which leads me to another part of the sanction of this law, taken from the justice of God, in punishing the breakers of it, in those words; visiting the iniquities of the fathers upon the children, to the third and fourth generation of them that hate me. To visit is sometimes taken in a good sense, for beholding another with an eye of pity and compassion; in which sense David prays, visit me, O Lord, with thy salvation. Sometimes in a bad sense, for looking on with an eye of fury and revenge, and visiting with judgments and calamities; which is the meaning in this place, where God threatens to punish the offenders against this law, both in their persons and posterity. And he visits this iniquity upon the fathers themselves; of this kind the holy scriptures afford many examples, God executing his judgments upon idolatries, and frequently punishing his own people, when they revolted from him, and set up their molten images.

He also visits this iniquity of the fathers upon the children; this we find verified in many of the kings of Israel and Judah, who for their idolatry were punished not only in their own persons, but in their posterity; God recompensing the iniquity of the fathers into the bosom of their children after them, and that to the third and fourth generation; those being generations which a man may live to see. And as the prosperity of children is one of the greatest comforts of human life, and all parents delight to behold such flourishing branches of their own; so to see them in misery and trouble, is a melancholy heart-breaking. And therefore Almighty God, to deter men from transgressing this law, denounces vengeance against the posterity of such as break it, threatening their children to the third and fourth generation, and punishing their idolatries, through the whole line they are capable of seeing. By which it appears that sinners entail a curse upon their offspring, and make the children miserable by their impieties.—But how can it consist, (some will say) with the justice and goodness of God, to punish the children for the sins of their parents? especially he having declared, that the soul that sinneth, shall die; and the son shall not bear the iniquity of the father, nor the father the iniquity of the son; but the righteousness of the righteous shall be upon him, and the wickedness of the wicked upon him. Now to this the answer is easy and obvious. For God's visiting the sins of the fathers upon the children, is always upon supposition of their making their fathers' sins their own; by imitating their ill examples, and treading in the steps of their impieties; for so God himself tells them, if your children forsake my law, and walk not in my statutes, I will visit their transgressions with a rod, and their sins with scourges: but, if the son forsake the iniquities of his father, he shall not die, he shall surely live, saith the Lord. God never visits the sins of the fathers upon penitent and reforming children; but if they imitate their fathers' wickedness, it is but just and righteous, that they suffer for them: in which case, they are punished not for their fathers' sins, but their own. And because idolatrous parents are too apt to corrupt their children by their own evil counsel and example, therefore Almighty God, to deter them from it, threatens to punish the fathers in their children; which he may as well do, as in their houses and estates, or any thing belonging to them: for children are part of the goods and substance of the parents, who are deeply concerned in their welfare or misery: and therefore God may justly visit them, in those dearest pledges, if they mislead them into their impieties. In which case he doth not so much make their children suffer the punishment of their fathers' sin, as the fathers suffer for their own. Almighty God may, and often doth, visit the iniquities of the fathers upon their children with temporal punishments; but then though the calamity be the child's, yet the punishment is properly the father's: he is wounded in one of the nearest and tenderest parts of himself, though it may work together for good to the repenting child. Indeed God never visits the father's sins upon the children with eternal punishment: in which sense every one must bear his own burden; but he justly may and doth with temporal evils, for the correction and amendment of both. But who are the persons against whom this threat is denounced? why them that hate him; that is, those who transgress his laws. For as the loving God is expressed by keeping his commandments, so the breaking them is stiled hating of him. But idolaters and the worshippers of images are more especially called haters of God. For as the adulteress shews her hatred and contempt of her husband, by giving herself to the embraces of another; so they who follow their own inventions, and give that worship to images, which is due only to God, cast off the love of God, and may be truly said to hate him. Having thus considered the negative part of this precept, which forbids the making and worshipping of images, I proceed to the affirmative, as to what is required of us; and that is to worship God, after a due manner, in a way suitable to his nature and will.

This commandment requires us to serve God suitable to his nature; not by images or corporeal resemblances, for he having no bodily parts, cannot be represented in any bodily shape, and which to attempt, is a great debasement to his infinite majesty and glory: but he being a spiritual essence must be served with spiritual worship, and so our Saviour declares, God is a spirit, and they that worship him, must worship him in spirit and truth. For the better understanding whereof, it should be observed, that the worshipping of God in spirit and truth, doth not exclude all bodily worship, nor yet the use of rites and ceremonies; neither of which are inconsistent with spiritual worship. To worship him then in spirit and truth, is to worship him with our spirits, and not with the tongue only; it is to draw nigh to him with our hearts, and not barely with our lips; and to serve him truly and sincerely, in opposition to all feigned, formal, and hypocritical service. In short, to serve him suitably to his nature, is to have our affections raised towards him, by way becoming his several attributes; that is, to love him for his goodness, to fear him for his greatness, to trust on him for his faithfulness, and to honour him for all his divine and amiable perfections. Again,

To worship God rightly, is the doing it agreeable to his will, as well as suitable to his nature; we must serve him according to his own direction and appointment; for divine worship being that homage, which we as creatures owe to our great creator, it is but just that we should worship him after the manner he has commanded; which not to do, is to declaim his authority, and to be governed only by our own will. But may nothing be done in the worship of God, unless expressly commanded by him? To answer this truly, a distinction ought to be made, between the substantial parts of divine worship, and the accidental, or alterable circumstances thereof. As for the substantial part of religion, consisting of all that is necessary to be believed or done in order to salvation, that requires the express precept and revelation of God, without which nothing is to be so esteemed. For he best knows how he will be served; and having declared his mind in the holy scriptures, they ought to be the rule and standard of our duty. Since to add thereto, would be to charge it with imperfection, and to make a new religion of our own. But as for the circumstantial part of divine worship, such as time, place, gesture, and the like, these not being particularly determined by God in the holy scripture, are in a great measure left to every one's discretion in their private worship, and to the prudence and authority of superiors in the public service of the church, whom we ought to obey in such things; so as care be taken, that the rites and ceremonies enjoined, are suitable to those general rules of order, decency, and edification, prescribed by God, and becoming his service; and that they are not enjoined and observed, as essential parts of worship, or necessary to salvation, for that would be to add to the substance of religion, and to teach for doctrine the commandments of men; but only as outward circumstances, for the order and decency of public worship, and as things that may vary, as ~~times~~ places, and other occasions may require.

The worship of God then, recommended in this command, is both internal and external. By the former is meant, the worship of our hearts and souls, whereby we inwardly admire and adore his divine excellencies; esteeming, loving, and fearing him, as our great creator and best benefactor; and this not in pretence and appearance only, but in sincerity: not in words or in tongue, but in deed and in truth. from the very bottom of the heart. By the latter is meant the worship of the body, or when we express the inward reverence of the mind by the outward humble gestures of the body; which God frequently calls for, and David exhorts us to in these words, O come let us worship and fall down and kneel before the Lord our maker. This is what some expositors of this commandment have thought to be here principally intended; making the internal worship of the soul to be required in the first commandment, and the external worship of the body to be commanded in this. And as God forbids the bowing down, or giving any bodily worship to graven images, so he requires this and other gestures of bodily adoration to be given to himself. But because all humble gestures and acts of bodily reverence have been despised by some, and too much neglected by others, it may not be improper to recommend and enforce this external bodily worship. Let it then be considered,

That God claims this external worship as due to himself, and threatens to punish such as give it to others. He here forbids the bowing or falling down to any graven images, as an invasion of his prerogative, and declares that the prostituting of our bodies as well as souls to them, will stir up his jealousy. How sharply are the Israelites reproved for bowing the knee to Baal; and the idolatry of the heathen is frequently expressed in scripture, by their serving other gods, and bowing down unto them. Again, Almighty God created the body as well as the soul, and united them together for his service, and therefore he expects the homage of both. Indeed, the service of the heart is what he principally demands and regards; My son, give me thy heart: that being the best offering we can make to a spiritual immaterial Being, without which all other service is but dead and ineffectual. But yet he expects the humility and adoration of the outward man; he calls for the ear, to hear instruction; for the eyes to be lifted up in prayer; for the tongue to speak the praises of our maker; in a word, he expects that our whole man should bow with the profoundest awe and reverence to him, before he will bow his ear, and be inclined to hear us; and justly too, for it is he that made us, and not we ourselves, and therefore all the members of our bodies ought to be employed and devoted to his service. And as our bodies as well as souls partake of the benefits of Christ's redemption, so should both be dedicated to him, and join together in his service. The apostle tells us, we are not our own, to dispose and order ourselves, as we please; but being bought with a price, we are to glorify God in our bodies, and in our spirits, which are his. Lastly, we hope to be glorified hereafter, in our bodies as well as souls, and therefore both ought to glorify him here. Many and great things are said concerning the future felicity of our bodies, in particular, that they shall be fashioned like unto Christ's glorious body. And if they are to be crowned with such invaluable blessings hereafter, it is not reasonable, by engaging them in his service here, that we should prepare and fit them for the next world.

Thus we see what is required of us in this commandment; namely, to raise our minds above all gross sense and fancy in our adorations of our Maker: not framing any outward images or resemblances to worship him by; nor forming any false notions or misrepresentations of him, by thinking him such a one as ourselves; but we are here commanded to entertain high and worthy thoughts of him, conceiving of him as a Being transcendently perfect, infinitely superior to all, in goodness, justice, wisdom, and power, and as such to be loved, feared, trusted and honoured above all; and to direct all our service to him with such apprehensions. This is to worship him in spirit and truth. And the body as well as the mind is to be employed in these adorations. The negative precept here, thou shalt not bow down to a graven image, includes the contrary positive duty, thou shalt bow down to the Lord thy God; meaning, that we ought to worship God with our body, as well as our mind. This commandment then as much requires us to bow down and kneel, and give bodily worship unto God, as it forbids us to give it to a graven image. And the practice of holy men in all ages hath been agreeable hereto, who have been as forward to do the one, as to refuse the other. In the Old Testament we find the people of God always using a posture of reverence in the worship of God, by standing, kneeling, or prostrating themselves. In the New Testament, we find our blessed Saviour and his disciples, in all their prayers unto God, either bowing, kneeling, or prostrating themselves before him; which is that glorifying of God with their bodies, enjoined and practised by them. Indeed, the inward reverence and devotion of the mind, will always draw after it this outward reverence of the body; and therefore the whole worship of God is represented in scripture by these external visible acts of adoration. Hence bowing and kneeling unto God is generally in scripture used to signify the worshipping him. O come let us worship and fall down, and kneel before the Lord our Maker. Where with shall I come before the Lord, and bow myself before the High God? This therefore is here required to be paid unto God and no other, and that because he is a jealous God, infinitely tender of his honour, and impatient of any competitor in this incommunicable homage, belonging to him. Again, he threatens to visit the iniquities of the fathers upon the children to the fourth generation, who thus invade and defraud him of his honour; that is, their posterity shall fare the worse for it, their children's children shall be capable of less favour, and be more strictly and severely dealt with on this account. The justice whereof has been before vindicated.

Lastly, to encourage the observance of this law, he adds, that he will shew mercy unto thousands of them that love him, and keep his commandments. Not that he will forbear to punish the offending children of disobedient men; no, we find him declaring, if their children forsake his law, and keep not his commandments, he will visit their transgressions with a rod, and their sin with scourges; nevertheless (saith he) my loving kindness will I not utterly take from them. That is, he will deal more favourably with them for their parents' sake. The misdeeds of some shall not interrupt his kindness to the rest of their posterity, or blot out the memory of their goodness. This we find verified in the posterity of Abraham, and the other patriarchs, in whom Almighty God overlooked many and great provocations for their sake, mixing mercy with severity, and setting them at last in the promised land. And here we may observe the vast difference and disproportion, between the proceedings of God in the way of justice and in the way of mercy: he visiteth the iniquities of disobedient parents, to the third and fourth generation; but, he sheweth mercy to a thousand generations, of those who obey him. He soon forgets the wrongs done him, but keeps our good works in everlasting remembrance. Which should teach us not only to imitate him therein, but encourage us to serve and obey so good a master. And lest any should vainly expect these instances of divine goodness, without observing the commands annexed to them, the last words of the commandment confine them wholly to those, that love God and keep his commandments. As the revolvers from God were before stiled haters of him, so they who obey his laws, are here said to love him. He that hath my commandments and keepeth them, (saith our Saviour) he it is that loveth me. And elsewhere, if any man love me, he will keep my word.

To conclude then, we may learn from this commandment the happiness of descending from good parents, who bequeath a blessing, and derive a mercy upon their offspring to many generations. And the unhappiness and sad misfortune of such as are born of disobedient parents, who entail misery and a curse upon their whole posterity: which should teach us, not only for our own, but our children's sake, to be ever mindful of keeping God's laws, and very tender of breaking them.

SERMON XL.

By BISHOP BEVERIDGE.

The Third Commandment.

* EXOD. xx. 7.

Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God, &c.

THE dreadful solemnity, with which the ten commandments were delivered by God to Moses from Mount Sinai, was a sight so terrible, that Moses himself said, I exceedingly fear and quake. And the people, when they saw the fire, black darkness and tempest, and heard the thunder, the trumpet and voice of God, they removed and stood afar off, and said to Moses, speak thou with us, and we will hear; but let not God speak with us, lest we die. Imagine, therefore, that we heard the voice of God proclaiming loud in our ears, from the midst of glorious, and yet dreadful fire, lightnings, thunder, and the sound of trumpets, Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain, for the Lord will not hold him guiltless, that taketh his name in vain. Had we this thought frequently in our minds, who could dare to profane the sacred name of God, by oaths, curses, blasphemies, and dreadful execrations, on every slight and frivolous occasion, as is now the common practice?—To preserve, then, the innocent, and reclaim those who are guilty of this wicked custom, I will first consider the meaning of the words, and then make use of such reasons and arguments, as may be proper to dissuade men from it.

To take the name of God in vain, is, in the literal sense, to use the sacred name of God, lightly and commonly, to name, idle, needless, and insignificant purposes, though we do not swear by it, or call God to witness the truth of what we say. To have that name often in our mouths, on every trifling occasion, shews that we have not an awful respect for him in our hearts. This is the beginning of evil, and generally prepares the way to swearing. We should therefore, at first, hinder children and young persons from using familiarly and commonly the name of God. This will beget reverence to it, and restrain the abuse. They should be checked and punished when they call on God, either at their play, work, or on any occasion, but what is serious. By constantly doing this, we should stop one common inlet to this wicked practice. If we thus discharge our duty to our children and servants, it will put us in mind also of our own neglect and failings; for by reminding them not to take the name of God in vain, we shall be ashamed to be guilty of it ourselves. I fear the frequent practice of abusing the name of God, by parents, masters, and mistresses, gives occasion to children and servants to do the same; and is the reason why they dare not reprove and punish them for so offending. But sad must be the case of those, who are afraid to do their duty to their children and servants, when yet they shall be severely punished by God for not doing it. Let such consider, that though they are exceeding culpable themselves in this point, yet that they ought to reprove and punish those who are under their care for the like offences; because they will thereby do their own duty, prevent a great deal of mischief, and avoid being guilty of the sins of others. But to take the name of God, in vain, is most properly, to swear either rashly, without heed and reverence, on any just and weighty occasion; or falsely, without regard to truth, not knowing whether what we say is true or not.

There are some who think, that if people do not mention the sacred name of God in their asseverations, they are not guilty of taking God's name in vain, though they swear by any thing or creature else. But whoever considers, what our Saviour said to the scribes and pharisees, concerning swearing, will find the relation every thing and creature in the world has to their Great Creator, is so close and dependent, that he who swears by the one, does also swear by the other. He who swears by the altar, offering, or temple, swears by him, to whom that altar is erected, to whom that offering is made, and to whom that temple, with its service, is devoted, that is, to God. He who swears by heaven, swears by him who governs therein. He who swears by the earth, swears by him whose footstool it is, who made and preserves it. He who swears by Jerusalem, does it by the great God whose city it was. He who swears by his head, the fountain of life, swears by him who made it; in whose hands is the power of life and death. So that people may swear, without using the name of God, and consequently may offend against this commandment without literally taking the name of the Lord their God in vain. Let none then satisfy themselves, with any such idle distinction, as to imagine they do not swear, unless they pronounce the sacred name of God, when they do it by other things. Indeed, it is better to swear by any thing that does not immediately relate to God, than by his sacred name; because it creates less horror, gives less offence, and is not so bad an example. For though all oaths are very bad, yet some are much worse and more wicked than others.

The guilt, then, of taking God's name in vain, may be contracted, by swearing by any thing that has relation to God, though his name is not directly used: and therefore all sorts of oaths are comprehended under the third commandment; which contains a prohibition of all light rash oaths in our conversation, as well as false oaths, whether in private company, or public courts of judicature, before the magistrate. I shall now only consider all light and rash oaths, whether true or false, hurtful or idle: for the name of God is despised and profaned, if used on slight occasions, though what we swear be true; because the thing was not worthy so much weight as an oath: usually requires. And that no one is to swear in light trivial concerns, will appear, by considering the nature of an oath.

An oath is a most religious thing; we acknowledge by it God's omniscience and omnipotence, and declare, that he knows the very secrets of our hearts; that he can and will punish us, if what we affirm is not true, or that we intend not to perform what we then promise. An oath is the solemn calling on God to bear witness, that what we utter with our mouths, we in our hearts believe to be exactly true; and entreating him to punish and take vengeance on us, if we intend not what we say and promise. The heart of man lies secret to all the world; that therefore we may know whether a man speaks true or false, an oath was appointed; by which we appeal to God as a witness, that our heart and mouth agree; or if they do not, it implies, that we desire God to take vengeance on us, and punish our impiety to him, and falsehood to man. Can any thing be more serious and religious than a solemn oath? So that every time we take an oath by any thing relating to God, we call God to witness the truth of what we say, and to revenge himself on us, if it be false. Let all then remember the serious nature of an oath, and consider, whether it should be used on such light and frivolous occasions, as is too generally done by men, though what they swear is true. It is an awful thing to call on the great God of heaven and earth, the maker and preserver of us all, on whose will we alone depend for every moment of our lives. How dare we then require him to attest and witness matters of such small concern, as we should be ashamed to desire of any serious neighbour? An oath is to make an end of strife, and for confirmation of truth; but then it ought to be a truth of weight and importance that such strife is about. Every allowable oath should be taken, in truth, judgment, and righteousness; with the heart, with the understanding, and good conscience: in order to discover the truth, that judgment may be righteously administered. Where none of those good ends are answered, the name of God is not to be sworn by. Did men examine their past oaths, they would soon find how few were sworn in truth, judgment, and righteousness; how few tended to discover any truth of importance, or contribute to do justice, or to promote righteousness. It would then appear, that every oath, except those sworn before a magistrate, was taken vainly, lightly, rashly, presumptuously, and wickedly;

so far from doing any good, that they are matter of shame, humiliation, and repentance, before God.

Remember also, that such light, rash, and presumptuous oaths, are not only improper and indecent, but are most solemnly forbidden by God; who says to every one,—thou shalt not take the name of God in vain. Would God himself descend from heaven, with such solemnity, as you have heard, to forbid the taking his name in vain, had it not been of the greatest moment and importance to us? It is only for our advantage here and hereafter, that God instructs us in his will, and tells us what to do, and avoid, in order to his blessing and making us happy. Did we spend every day in oaths, curses, and profaning God's holy name and word, it would not interrupt his happiness; but it will hurt ourselves, and everlastingly destroy both our bodies and souls, not to comply with his will and commands. For these oaths will some time or other be avenged by God, who will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain. If not guiltless, then, to be sure, we shall be held guilty of the violation and breach of God's laws, and liable to the punishment due to such offenders and notorious crimes. What particular punishments such are obnoxious to in this life, is not declared; but their sin is so provoking and presumptuous, and has so little temptation to it, that they have much both to apprehend and fear. The prophet tells us, because of swearing the land mourneth, the land was then afflicted with several plagues and heavy judgments, by reason of the frequent oaths and perjuries among the people. And I dare say, many among us are afflicted, blasted, and undone, by this audacious contempt and profanation of God's name, who little think from whence the curse and secret canker came. And how should it be otherwise? will God bless those who daily take his name in vain, defy his laws, and curse him to his face; who call for vengeance on themselves and others, almost every word they say? Can they expect a blessing, who scarce ever mention God, but in the way of blasphemy; and make few other prayers than for plagues and mischiefs, damnation and eternal wrath?

How merciful is God, that he does not grant what these poor wretches so earnestly ask him? But let such be assured, that without sincere repentance and leaving off their sin, however God may forbear them in this world, he will most certainly, according to their own curses and repeated wishes, condemn and confound them in the world to come. Those prayers that came from hell, which pleased their ears and filled their mouths so often, shall be heard, to send them to accompany those cursed spirits, on whom they have so frequently called. Let them then remember, that it is a dreadful thing, to fall into the hands of the living God: who has declared, he will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain.

If then we reflect on what has been said,—That an oath is a most sacred, serious, and solemn act of religion, intended by God for the confirmation of truth, the doing justice and judgment to all men, and to put an end to strife—That it is a most indecent, unseemly thing, to apply such serious and religious affirmations, as oaths are, to light, trivial words, and matters of no weight and moment—That all such oaths are utterly forbidden by God's express command, and that the breach thereof will as surely be avenged by him, as God is true, who said it. If all these things are duly considered, common swearing can never be so harmless and innocent, as some seem to imagine. And if not, how ought we most seriously to repent of it? These considerations nearly concern us, as people that pretend to believe in God, that acknowledge the divine authority of the scriptures, and profess ourselves Christians. There is no answering any of these arguments; no one pretends to justify their practice of swearing, either from scripture, reason, or the authority of wise and good men. Is it not then, strange, that what is so impossible to be excused, or justified, should yet so generally obtain? That what every one condemns in himself and others, should be suffered to prevail and reign, as it were without controul? Especially if we further ungodly practice. They who are most addicted to swearing, can give no reason why they so often commit this abominable sin; they freely acknowledge, that there is in it neither pleasure nor advantage. Other sins have one, if not both these temptations, to captivate mankind; they either satisfy some sensual appetite, or gratify some covetous desire or profit; at least they hope to find their account in it. But the swearer gives away his soul for nothing. Of all offenders he makes the worst bargain, gives himself up to everlasting pains and sorrows for that which no one advised or tempted him to, nor approved of; and which he himself never liked whilst doing, nor remembered afterwards with any satisfaction or content. Let any one call to mind the many oaths and profanations of God's holy name he has been guilty of, and see if he is either the richer, wiser, or better esteemed. And who would continue in a practice that brings with it neither pleasure nor advantage? Indeed what shall it profit a man to gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? But it is still worse to lose his soul for nothing. In all other offences, men aim at some end, and have some motive and temptation thereto; but in this there is no end or temptation, so that a man is condemned by himself and every other person. Besides, it is a practice that all condemn in their wives and children, their servants and relations. Who would not stand amazed, be angry and ashamed, to hear their wives and children answer them with oaths on all occasions, and mingle blasphemies and curses in their common discourses? And yet the laws of God allow it no more in the one than the other. No sex, no age, nor person of any degree, can pretend to a privilege of offending God.

Neither wife nor children will be excused before God, for following the evil example of husband and father; because all should live by the rule of God's law, and not by any one's example. But yet it is certain, that he shall be punished, who gives such an ill example to wife and children. And what a sort of hell must there be in that house, where every one despises God, and tramples under feet his laws, and longs left to reprove, or intercede with God, for his mercy and forbearance towards a family so wicked and profane. These are some of the most proper arguments which occur, to dissuade all from light and rash swearing. They are such as our own sense and reason may and will suggest. And the condemnation of the guilty will be the greater, as they in their own hearts and consciences know all the reasons and arguments against swearing, as much as the most learned; and therefore want not to be instructed in the duty, so much as to be reminded of what they before knew.

Let then such as have been guilty of this wicked practice, sincerely repent, ask God's forgiveness, and beg the assistance of his grace, to keep them from falling into it for the future. Let us all carefully watch over ourselves, that we speak not hastily and unadvisedly with our lips; remembering God is always present, and hears every word. Let us not on every trifling occasion, give way to anger, which is the parent of many oaths. The least opposition to our judgment, or contradiction to our will, is often a provocation to curse and blaspheme God's holy name; as if that would mend and make things better. Those who are given to swearing should above all things avoid drinking and gaming. If such when they are sober, serious, and in their senses, can hardly forbear swearing, how can it be expected that they should, when they have lost their reason, and are little less than mad? They who abhor an oath when sober, will yet courageously swear if intoxicated with liquor; such therefore should by all means avoid an excess, that so naturally and easily provokes to passion. And as to gaming, there are few that follow it, but what swear excessively; few that lose their money, but also lose their patience and temper. Gaming is one of the most destructive vices men can fall into, and provokes to the greatest anger. It ruins most men at last, and is worse in mean and poor people than the rich; because it excessively wastes that time which they can poorly spare from the care and labour which is necessary to support themselves and families; and spends that small substance which should supply their wives and children with necessaries of life. Lastly, it occasions oaths and curses, blasphemies and dreadful execrations in a most fearful manner; and therefore whoever would avoid swearing, and taking the name of God in vain, must shun gaming, though but for trifles.

And next to the preventing this wicked practice in ourselves, we should endeavour to promote the glory of God, by doing good to others. When our neighbours are apt to swear, we should calmly tell them, we would sooner believe them without an oath; and when they find we deal thus christianly and friendly by them, they will be more on their guard. Those who are more immediately under our care, and depend on us, we may be more free with: even to reprove and punish such as are guilty of dishonouring God. Let us not suffer our children to swear, without our anger and immediate chastisement; nor keep any servant that is guilty of this wicked practice; for God will not bless their labours. Let us employ no workmen who will not do their business without swearing; nor relieve no poor, who thus offend God. Were we to take these courses, we should in a little time, see a great change and reformation of manners. This was formerly the sin of the rich, the easy, and thoughtless great men of the world; but now the poorer sort do by this sin of swearing the most provoke God. Is it not a strange and amazing thing, to hear people swear at the plough, at their horses, and cattle, and any thing that comes in their way? People that depend on the blessing of God for their daily bread, are hourly provoking him, to blast and confound them. Ought not such persons to be made more sensible of their duty, and to pay more honour to their constant heavenly Benefactor? shall they less fear to defy their Maker, and despise their Redeemer, than to speak disrespectfully of their superiors, parents, or masters? Let me then hope, desire, and pray, that the sense of God's honour, the sense of his command, the sense of our duty, and the danger we run, by committing this sin of swearing, may influence us to consideration, repentance, and amendment; that so we may be ever restrained from taking the name of the Lord our God in vain; always remembering, that he will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain.

SERMON XLI.

By BISHOP BURNET.

The Fourth Commandment.

Exod. xx. 8, 9, 10, 11.

Remember the sabbath day to keep it holy. Six days shalt thou labour, and do all thy work; but the seventh day is the sabbath of the Lord, &c.

THIS is one of the ten commandments which God delivered from Mount Sinai, by the hand of Moses to the people of Israel. It is the last of the first table, and is a fence to the observance of the three former; as the last in the second table, thou shalt not covet, is to all that precede it. For if the heart is restrained from inordinate desires and passions, it will be easy to abstain from the sins forbidden in the other commandments. And if we sanctify the Lord's day, by reflecting seriously on the majesty and attributes of that great God, who made the heavens and earth, this will give us such impressions of him, as to preserve us from worshipping any other God, or from worshipping the true God by any image. For to whom can we liken him, that made all things of nothing? This will also preserve in us such an awe of him, as that we shall think and speak of him with reverence and godly fear; and will effectually restrain us from all vain oaths, but most of all from swearing falsely, which is one of the highest indignities that can be offered to his holy and great name.

Religion is, or ought to be, the great and constant business of our whole lives. Indeed as our bodies require so many things of us, that they must have a large share of time and thought, and so they would soon engross all, and the sense of religion would be quite lost in the world, if there were not some set times appropriated for the remembrance of it, and for the solemn worship of God. Public worship is necessary to preserve mankind from falling into atheism on the one hand, and into idolatry on the other. Since if men were only to worship God alone, and apart, it would be more easy for them either to neglect it quite, or to corrupt it according to their various fancies, than when companies and bodies of men assemble and meet together. For the maintaining and advancing the true ends of religion, it is therefore necessary to have times appointed for the service of God; and that on certain days, there should be public assemblies of such numbers of men as can conveniently be brought together in one place. This is also a great means for preserving union, peace and love in the world. But these days should not return so seldom, as to have the sense of religion, which is raised in us one day, to be quite worn off before another returns. Our minds, that are apt to be unsteady and forgetful, must be frequently refreshed, with the remembrance of those things which relate to God, in order to govern our lives and actions; and which will restrain us from sinning against God, and excite us to all the acts of virtue and godliness. Yet, on the other hand, since our bodies have so many necessities that cannot be relieved without much hard labour, it was also necessary that such days for the service of God, should not return too often; lest there should be such frequent interruptions thereby given to our affairs, as to hinder and prevent the business of life. God, therefore, the master of all our time, having made us and all things about us for our use; who is a gentle master, and lays on us no yoke but what is easy, and who knows best what our natures can bear, and what is most fit both for body and mind, has here commanded that the seventh day shall be kept holy, that is, separated from the common business of life, and dedicated to his service. And that God might give this commandment, which is so necessary a means for preserving religion in the world, the more authority, though he could at once have perfected the whole order of the creation, yet he chose rather to do it in a course of six days, than all at once; which being finished, he rested on the seventh day, that by so great an example, the observation of a rest on that day might be recommended with the more authority to all mankind.

There are indeed other words added in the fifth of Deuteronomy, to those in the text; as, Remember thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt, and that the Lord thy God brought thee out thence, through a mighty hand, and by a stretched out arm; therefore the Lord thy God commanded thee to keep the sabbath day. These words indeed related to the Jews only, and so were a more particular enforcement of it on them; but the consideration of the rest after the creation, is universal and regards all mankind; it being a true rule, that all laws are to be extended, as far as the reason of them goes. But there having been some disputes and controversies concerning the sabbath, for the satisfaction of the scrupulous, I will more particularly consider its primitive institution, its morality and perpetual obligation, its change from the last to the first day of the week, and the manner how we ought to sanctify it.

As to the institution of the sabbath, there is a difference between learned men. Some refer its beginning to the promulgation of the law, or at farthest to the sending of manna to the Israelites; grounding their notion upon this, that till then we do not read in all the history of the patriarchs and first ages of the world, of any sabbath observed and sanctified by the fathers of those days, which would not have been neglected had any such command been given. Others, who to me seem nearer the truth, place its origin so high as the creation of the world, from these words, On the seventh day God ended his work which he had made; and God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it. Here God is said to sanctify the day when he rested; which was precisely on the seventh day after the creation. So that the sabbath is one day younger than man, ordained for him in his state of innocence, that his faculties being then holy and excellent, he might employ them, especially on that day, in the spiritual worship of God his creator. And although we find no more mention of the sabbath, until Moses had conducted the children of Israel in the wilderness, which was about 2450 years after the creation, yet it is not to be supposed, that among the people of God, who were very careful in observing the law, and delivering it to their posterity, that the observation thereof in keeping this day, utterly ceased; but rather was continued among those who feared God, till again invigorated with new authority from mount Sinai.

With respect to the morality of the sabbath, it ought to be observed, that those things are said to be moral, and of the law of nature, which are in themselves rational and fit to be done, though there was no express command to enjoin it. So that where there is a great equity in the thing itself, enough to sway a rational and honest man to the doing it; this is to be esteemed moral, and authorized by the law of nature. That is, of positive institution, which is observed only because it is commanded, and hath no intrinsic goodness, or reason in itself to recommend it to our practice, but obligeth only upon the injunction and authority of another: as for instance, it is naturally good to obey our parents, to abstain from murder, theft, adultery; and to do unto others, as we would like to have done unto us. These things we are obliged unto by the very light of reason and principle of nature, though there had been no written law of God to impose them. But then there were other things to which God obliged some of his people, that had nothing to recommend them besides the authority of his commands; such were the various ceremonies under the law. The first are therefore most properly called moral and natural commands, the last positive and instituted. The former are commanded because good, the latter are good because commanded. However, certain it is, that a convenient portion of our time is due unto the service and worship of God, by natural and moral right. For surely it is but fit and reasonable that God should have some part of our life and time, who created us on purpose that we might serve and glorify him. And could we ourselves, had it been left to us, have set apart less time for his service, than God hath done? Inced the law of nature doth not dictate to us any particular day, one more than another, for the worship of God; so that without the positive command of God, one day is not better than another. And therefore there is a memento prefixed to this command, remember that thou keep holy the sabbath day, which is not added to any other precept; intimating to us, that the observation of a particular day is not a dictate of nature, but a positive law imposed by God; and which, had it not been revealed, we should not have been obliged to observe it. Hence this command may be called moral-positive; moral, in that it requires a due portion of our time to be dedicated to the service and worship of God; positive, in that it prescribes the seventh day for that purpose, which the light of nature did not prefix.

We are then evidently as much bound to keep a sabbath as the Jews were, though not to the exact circumstances of the day. Nay, this command was obligatory, even in paradise itself, in the state of innocency, and therefore contains nothing in it unworthy the state of a Christian; for it is no ceremonial command, nor one of those which were typical of Christ, and abolished at his coming; but there still lies a strict and indispensable obligation upon us, to observe a sabbath holy to the Lord. The reasons of this command are all of them moral and perpetual, and therefore oblige us Christians. The equity is the same to us as it was to them, that we should allow one day in seven to the worship of that God who so liberally allows us six for our ordinary affairs. The ease and refreshment of our bodies, from the labours of our calling, is now as necessary as it was then; and we are still as much obliged with thankfulness to remember and meditate upon the great mercy of our creation, as they were. And therefore, if these were sufficient reasons why the Jews should observe a particular sabbath, they are still forcible and cogent to bind us. But though the sanctifying of a sabbath be thus obligatory to Christians, yet it is not the sabbath-day that the Jews and the people of God, before Christ's coming into the world, were bound to observe, that we are to keep. For it is with good reason and upon good authority changed from the last day of the week to the first; from Saturday to Sunday, called now the Lord's day, because it was the day of the week on which our Lord and Saviour rose from the dead; in memory of which, and as a thankful acknowledgment of the great mercy of our redemption, fully completed by his resurrection, the sabbath hath been translated to this day, and is now celebrated thereon by all the churches of Christ. And this change of the sabbath is the next thing I proposed to consider.

And as the first institution of the sabbath was by divine authority, so is the change thereof. For as God rested from his labour on the last day of the week, so did Christ from all his sorrows and afflictions on the first, when he had fully compleated the work of our redemption. Christ not only sanctified this day by his resurrection, and the Apostles confirmed the observation of it by their writings and practice; but the Apostles themselves required the first Christians to meet together on the first day of the week; which was at that time honoured with the name of the Lord's day, and has been ever since in all ages of the christian church observed as the day dedicated to the service and worship of God, and to the celebrating of our Lord's resurrection on that day from the dead, to whom he gave all power both in heaven and earth.

Having thus opened to you the ends of this commandment, and the reasons for the change made in the day, I proceed in the last place to consider the manner of sanctifying this day aright, so as to avoid extremes on all sides. We must then remember, that the sabbath was made for man, and not man for the sabbath; and that it is lawful to do good on the sabbath day. The Jews, to whom this commandment was frequently repeated in terms that imported much strictness, and a great severity on those that transgressed it, at last raised the observation of it to a superstitious niceness. They came, as most hypocrites are apt to do, to place all religion in those outward performances, that had an appearance of great exactness in obeying the law punctually; and therefore they took occasion from the miracle that our Saviour wrought on the sabbath day, and from his disciples plucking some ears of corn when they were hungry, to represent him as one that profaned the sabbath. But since it has been already shewn, that the end of the sabbath is to keep alive in the hearts of men a more deep sense of our duty to God, and of the obligations that religion puts us under, and not to load us with superstitious observances, or scrupulosities in smaller matters; it appears from thence, that only such an observation of the Lord's day is required, as tends to perfect and advance the service of God. We ought indeed to make the sabbath our delight, to rejoice on that day, to put from us the common concerns of life, not speaking our own words, or doing our own ways; that is not letting our hearts run out into projects and cares relating to our own affairs, or wasting our time in unnecessary discourse; but to rejoice in the liberty to which Christ hath called us, who hath delivered us from this part of the Jewish bondage, and assured us, that the sabbath was made for man: and therefore a nice and scrupulous anxiety in small matters, savours more of the Jewish spirit, than the Christian temper. But as we ought to be aware of this extreme, so we are much more in danger of another, I mean that of prophaning this day, either by minding our temporal concerns and affairs, or, which is yet much worse, by thinking we are on this day excused from our labours, that we may serve our lusts and pleasures with so much the more freedom. If the ceasing from labour is made an occasion to intemperance and disorder, to sloth and idleness, to vice and debauchery; this is plainly to turn the grace of God into lasciviousness. God did, in the Old Testament, reckon it among those blessings he had heaped on his people, that he gave them his sabbaths to be a sign between him and them, that they might know that he was the Lord; and as this, if well improved, is an excellent mean for setting forward the designs of religion; so, on the other hand, we walk contrary to God, and disobey his will, if we do not improve such blessings, by keeping holy the Lord's day, and not to profane it by servile work or sinful practices.

The proper ways of sanctifying this day, are first, the spending some considerable portions of time in our secret meditations, prayers, and studies; and we ought to review the past week, and observe how far we have been endeavouring to do our duty to God, and our neighbour; to examine wherein we have failed, what sins or errors we have been guilty of, what former vows and resolutions we have broken; into which of our former sins we have relapsed, or into what new ones we have fallen, and whom we have any way wronged in word or deed. All these things we ought to call to mind, that we may humbly confess them before God, be truly grieved for them, sincerely repent of and forsake them, and then to form holy and firm resolutions not again to fall into them. We ought also to observe what particular providences of God have occurred to us the past week, either such as tend to awaken and quicken us in our duty, or oblige us to offer up our prayers and thanksgivings to God. Those who are not well instructed in religion, should take pains to increase their knowledge, by reading or causing to be read to them, such portions of scripture, or other good books, as may give them some farther instruction, in order to the working out their salvation, with fear and trembling.

When a good man has been thus employing some part of the morning in fitting himself to appear before God, then he ought to go to the house of prayer, remembering that the scriptures join these two together, Ye shall keep my sabbaths, and reverence my sanctuary. We ought to consider the prayers and praises of the church, as the public services which we offer up to God, and in which we must remember, what a terrible condemnation they fall under, who draw near to God with their mouth, and honour him with their lips, when their minds and hearts are far from him. We should therefore join our hearts with our lips in every part of the worship. And when we pronounce the confession of sins, we must confess our secret ones to God; when the absolution is read, we ought most humbly to beg our share therein; when the psalms and hymns are repeated, we should raise up our souls, and rejoice in God, for the great blessings commemorated in them; while the lessons are reading, we ought to observe what particular instructions, reproof, or consolation arises to us, from any part of them; in the collects, and ~~and~~ the litany, we should pour out our hearts to God, for the graces and blessings which we ask of him; in the thanksgiving we ought to join in an humble acknowledgment of those mercies, which we have particularly met with from God. When we make confession with our mouths of our faith, we must be sure to join with it the belief of our hearts; otherwise we lie to God, when we say we believe that to which our hearts do not consent. While the commandments are repeated, we ought to remember both our former sins, and the infirmities of our nature, together with the temptations to which we are exposed; so shall we have a true sense of our wants, both of mercy and of grace to help in time of need.

When we hear sermons, we ought particularly to observe, what parts of scripture are thereby rendered more intelligible to us, that so we may afterwards read these with more profit. We ought also to observe what sins are reprov'd in them, what duties are recommended, what resolutions of doubts, or directions are given, wherein we are more immediately concerned, that so we may lay them up in our hearts, and afterwards reflect upon them. We are not to hear sermons, as men who intend only to censure them, but as becomes those who are resolved to be the better for them; and when we get home we are to consider frequently in our thoughts, such passages in them, as are likely to have a good effect on us, in order to our growing in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. If these rules ought to be minded by us every Lord's day, much more should it be on days of communion; in which we are called to a more immediate commemoration of the death and sufferings of our Saviour, and to renew our vows to him: as then we again dedicate ourselves to him, and receive the fullest pledges of his love, we must awaken our minds to a greater seriousness, to more contrition for our sins, to more earnestness in our prayers, to greater firmness in our resolutions, to a higher fervour of charity, in our intercessions for others, to a fuller assurance of faith, and more elevated acts of praise and thanksgiving to God, for all his mercies. But above all, for that astonishing effect of his love to mankind, in sending his son into the world to save sinners; in giving him to die for our sins, raising him again from the dead, and crowning him with glory and honour. Thus we ought to behave ourselves in the house of God, in all the several parts of the public worship, nor ought we to think it too hard a burden to return a second time to evening prayer, and sermon; we should rather rejoice at our going often to the house of God together. For if we despise these solemn assemblies, we may thereby provoke God to visit us with a famine, not of bread, or of water, but of hearing the word of the Lord.

When the public worship is ended, every one of us ought for some time, to recollect his thoughts, and renew his vows and good resolutions; and remembering what we have learned, either from the word of God, or the sermon, to raise in our minds such a sense of things as is agreeable thereto. Masters of families ought also to bring their families together to prayer, to the reading some portions of scripture, and of other good books; and we ought to edify and admonish one another, by singing of psalms, and serious godly discourses. It is also an act of charity, highly becoming this day, to visit the sick, the widows, and the fatherless in their affliction, to comfort the afflicted, to reconcile differences between neighbours, and to do such other acts of love and kindness, without disturbing too much our own devotion, as may tend to their good; by which peace, kindness, and love may be preserved among friends, neighbours, and acquaintance. For by so doing, we serve God, and advance the true ends, as well as the honour, of religion.

Thus I have shewn what are the particular duties of keeping the sabbath; by which we may perceive how generally God is dishonoured on this day; the due observation whereof, is one chief means, that God hath appointed to promote and increase religion in the world: and the neglect, or prophaning of it, is one great occasion of that forgetfulness of God, that immorality and impiety, which so much abounds. For if men on this day, do not regard their souls, and the concerns of religion, when they are at leisure, and not engaged about their ordinary affairs, how is it to be expected they should have much thoughts of religion, when their minds are distracted with their temporal concerns, and their bodies fatigued with labour? We ought then to think it one of the greatest blessings to a nation that God gives them his sabbaths; and those who despise this day and wish it was gone, as imagining it too great an interruption to their affairs, may provoke God to shut them out of his rest, even that rest, or keeping of the sabbath, which remains for the people of God.

Let us then consider well of how much importance our immortal souls are. For, what shall it profit us if we gain the whole world, and lose our own souls? Shall we labour all the week for our bodies, which are perishing, and yet think it too much to dedicate one day in seven to the care of our souls, that are to live for all eternity? Let us consider what a miserable thing it is to be ignorant of our duty in the midst of so much light and knowledge as we enjoy, and which may be easily acquired by any who will spend but a few hours once a week to learn instruction. If we will chuse a wilful ignorance, we may provoke God to give us up to that darkness in which some delight. But if we will hearken to his voice, and apply ourselves to the hearing and learning of his laws, he will make us to learn wisdom in the inward part: he will, by the assistance of his grace, so open our eyes, that we may behold the wonders of his law; and so quicken our hearts, that we may run the ways of his commandments; he will guide us here with his counsel, and afterwards receive us to glory.

SERMON XLII.

By BISHOP HOPKINS.

The Fifth Commandment.

Exod. xx. 12.

Honour thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee.

As there is nothing wherein the truth and power of godliness, and the life of religion, is more concerned, than in a conscientious performance of relative duties, because they daily occur; so there is no subject more ungrateful to men, than to be reminded of these duties, and reproved for the neglect of them: however, the frequent occasion we have to practise them, renders it necessary to consider how to perform them.

I begin with the honour and reverence that is due from children to their parents. Reverence to parents consists in having a respectful love for, and an awful fear to offend them: not such a fear as terrifies, for that is a slavish and tormenting; but an obliging fear, that will create esteem and veneration; that will engage us to observe their commands, and refrain from whatever is displeasing to them. This reverence should be expressed in our words and actions. Our expressions must be full of respect and honour, giving them such titles as their quality and condition require; our words, in answering them, should be few, humble, and submissive. It is but reasonable we should give them the most obliging language, who first taught and instructed us to speak. We must also reverence them with a decent, modest, and respectful bodily behaviour, shewing all external signs of honour. Joseph, though highly exalted in the court of Pharaoh, when he brought his sons to receive the blessing of Jacob his father, bowed himself with his face to the earth. All sour, morose, and unseemly looks towards a parent is threatened to be severely punished. The eye that mocketh at his father, and despiseth to obey his mother, the ravens of the valley shall pick it out, and the young eagles shall eat it.

But as we must honour them with reverence, so especially with obedience; without which all external respect is mere formality. Children obey your parents in all things, for that is well pleasing to God. We are obliged to pay them both active and passive obedience. Active, in observing all their commands, that are not contrary to the laws of God; and passive, in suffering their anger and resentment, with all patience and submission, when they require to be performed what is sinful; rather than to disobey God. If they chasten and correct us for their own pleasure, yet we are to reverence them, to bear with their infirmities, to conceal and not expose their weakness to others. And if they are reduced to poverty, we are obliged liberally to assist them, according to our ability; it being a sin the most unnatural, for children that can relieve their necessitous parents, to suffer them, who were the cause and authors of their life, to want a livelihood and comfortable subsistence. We must also honour our parents, by regarding their good instructions, and imitating their pious examples. My son, says Solomon, keep the father's commandments, and forsake not the law of thy mother. Until we are set free by their consent, we ought not to enter into the state of marriage, without their knowledge and approbation. If we seriously consider that we owe to our parents our lives, education, and many other benefits, we should never think any thing too much to do for them. Oh! the cares, anxious thoughts, and perplexing fears, which our parents have continually had for our welfare! And can we so return their love and tenderness, as to despise their persons, or become stubborn and disobedient? If we have any ingenuity in our nature, or that the principles of reason and equity are not quite extinguished in us, we should requite the love and solicitude which our parents have shewn us, in the most ample and acceptable manner that is possible. If any by disobedience have brought down the grey hairs of their parents with sorrow to the grave, let such seriously consider, what an unnatural sin they are guilty of: and since they cannot beg pardon of their parents, let them ask it of God, the great and universal Father of all; and beseech him, not to revenge their disobedience, by the undutifulness of their own children.

As to the duty of parents to their children, that respects either their temporal or spiritual good. The former consists in protecting and providing for their bodies; as the other does for their souls. This the law of nature requires. In brute beasts there is so strong a parental affection, as that they will expose their lives to the greatest hazard for the preservation and defence of their young. And it the instinct and impulse of nature is so powerful in irrational creatures, how much more should it prevail on us, who have reason given us on purpose to perfect nature? Their weakness and impotency demand from us our care and protection. To how many diseases and dangers are their feeble infancy exposed? and their growing childhood, through want of care and experience, daily leads them into many more. Parents therefore are to guard and defend them from every threatened injury: and if it is inhuman for parents to neglect the care of their children, much more wicked and diabolical is it to hurt or destroy them: yet this is the too common practice of many wretches, who, to conceal their shame, either abandon or murder their innocent babes. And as parents are to protect their children from incident evils, so are they to provide necessities and conveniences for them, according to the station in which Providence hath placed them: even infidels and heathens are taught by the light and law of nature to make provision for their own. If we cannot leave them a sufficiency to subsist on, we should fix them to some business or employ, by which through God's blessing they may procure a livelihood. Children are not to lay v. for the parents, but parents for children. And we ought to place them to such business, as is most agreeable to their genius and inclination; otherwise they will be uneasy all their days. The duty of parents to their children relating to spirituals, consists in taking care of their souls, and promoting their eternal happiness. Their first concern is to have them baptised, and admitted members of Christ's church; and whoever neglects this, is highly culpable, and acts very injuriously by their children. They are afterwards to instruct, admonish, and educate them in the knowledge and fear of God. Would parents bring them to the love of piety and virtue, whilst their minds are flexible, and before they are filled with vanity, the next generation would not be so debauched in their youth, nor obdurate in old age, as is every where now too visible and apparent. Such instructions should be done in an easy familiar way, by catechising and instructing them in the grounds and principles of the Christian religion.

A good example is another duty of parents. If we blaspheme the name of God, by swearing and cursing, abuse ourselves or others by riot and intemperance, how can we expect our children should revere that dreadful name we profane, and love that sobriety and temperance we recommend, but do not practise? What effect can words have, when we contradict them in our actions? If our children improve in wickedness by our ill examples, what will our exhortations and admonitions avail, unless to reproach ourselves, and increase our own condemnation? But if parents will with tenderness and affection instruct their children in the ways of virtue and religion, and confirm them in the practice thereof by their own good example, none would behave undutifully, or live wickedly, but such as are in their nature deplorably vicious. However, if neither instruction nor good example will prevail, then correction and discipline become a necessary duty; though to inflict it, may be as uneasy to the parent as the child. Reason and not passion should prescribe the measure of punishment. Immoderate correction does not amend, and reform children, but either exasperates, and makes them more stubborn, or else dispirits and stupifies them. Fathers should not provoke their children to anger, lest they be discouraged. But where age and decency permit, the severity of discipline is sometimes necessary, if used with prudence. He that spareth the rod, hateth his son; but he that loveth him, chastens him betimes. Lastly, Parents are to offer up fervent and earnest prayers to God for their children, beseeching him to own and provide for them, to make them heirs of glory, and coheirs with Jesus Christ. That he would give them a convenient portion of temporal good things, whereby they may be enabled to serve him with greater cheerfulness; also to bestow on them spiritual blessings, and at last to bring them to eternal glory.

As for supreme magistrates, their duty is to establish the true worship and service of God to reform all corruptions and abuses, to distribute justice impartially, to maintain the cause of the poor and oppressed, and restrain the insolence of proud oppressors. Governors ought to be exemplary for virtue and piety, because the eyes of their subjects are upon them. They ought to fear God above all, to seek his honour and glory, to be prudent in their designs, faithful in their promises, wise in their counsels, observant of the laws, careful of their subjects' welfare, merciful to the poor, kind to the good, terrible to the evil, and just towards all; ever remembering they are men who must give an account unto God of the trust he hath reposed in them. The duties of subjects towards princes and magistrates are honour, obedience, and prayer to God for them. We must honour and reverence them in our thoughts and words; speaking what good we know, and prudently concealing their vices and infirmities. To publish the faults of governors can only tend to alienate the affections, and relax the obedience of subjects. Much more wicked is it to falsely calumniate them by reviling whispers, or suspicious intimations, and to insinuate into the minds of the people sad fears and apprehensions of dangers; all which makes their subjects to despise, if not hate them. We ought to honour them, by contributing cheerfully out of our substance when the necessities of affairs require it. Obedience is another duty we owe them: we are commanded to be subject to the higher powers, to submit to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake, whether it be to the king as supreme, or unto governors as sent by him, for the powers that be are ordained of God. Fervent and earnest prayers for our governors is also a great duty of subjects. Let supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving thanks be made for all men, especially for kings, and all in authority. A crown is a heavy, though glittering ornament, and the welfare of thousands depends on the prudent counsels of a prince. The cares and burdens of government are weighty and constant; we ought therefore earnestly to pray that magistrates may be endued with sufficient abilities to discharge their high and important office, to God's glory and their subjects' happiness.

The duties of husbands to their wives are to love, provide for, and instruct them; to act with tenderness, respect, and prudence towards them: love adorns all relations, and is the foundation of this. Though want of love will not dissolve the band of marriage, yet it destroys the comforts of a married state. A wife is the chiefest object of our love, even above parents, children, and friends. We must leave father and mother for our wife. We must love our wives as ourselves, be as careful and tender of their good as our own, and resent any injury done to them the same as if offered to us, they two being but one flesh. So that we are to love our wives with as much tenderness and natural affection as we do ourselves: nay, husbands must love their wives as Christ did the church, which was better than he did his own life, for he shed his most precious blood for her. We are to love our wives as Christ loved his church, by bearing with and forgiving their weaknesses, by being willing to submit to many inconveniences for their sakes, by interposing between them and any danger, and by promoting their spiritual good and benefit. A husband is to provide for his wife, to nourish and cherish her, to impart to her, according to his ability, what her occasions require. He ought not to spend in riot and excess among lewd and wicked companions, what should go towards her support and maintenance. If a man provides not for his own house, he hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel. As the husband is the head of the wife, so is he the fountain of knowledge and wisdom, and therefore should instruct, advise, and direct her in all emergencies, especially in her duty to God. Indeed, where the wife is blessed with greater prudence and knowledge than the husband, he then ought to submit to her advice, though not to her authority; but this she must tender him with all modesty, respect, and submission. The husband is also to be tender and mild to his wife, and not to torment her by provoking words or actions. If the wife carefully perform her duty, she ought to be treated with love and kindness, to receive praise and commendation. Her failings should be rebuked with meekness, and so as to discover more of sorrow than anger. Perpetual quarrels cmenter the comforts of life, and hinder each from performing their respective duties. While contention between man and wife reigns, business is neglected, and ruin ensues; and nothing is regarded but how to quarrel and rail at one another. Respect and honour is due unto the wife, as being the weaker vessel; a husband is not to be observant to her humour, for that will dishonour him; nor is she to be a slave to him, for that would dishonour her; but she ought to be treated as a kind and dear companion. Lastly, A husband must manage his authority with prudence, not with rigour and violence: the best way to preserve his authority is, by discretion, sobriety, and an exemplary good life; this will produce a reverent esteem and veneration from the wife and family; but a humoursome lightness or severity will expose men to the contempt of both. He that will not reverence himself, will not be revered by others; but where there is a mixture of prudence and purity, those will make a man truly awful, and induce the wife and family to esteem and imitate him.

The duties of wives to their husbands are subjection and obedience, respect and reverence. Wives are to submit unto their husbands, as unto the Lord. As the church is subject to Christ, so must wives be subject to their husbands in everything. The head of the woman is the man, for the woman is of the man. The man was not created for the woman, but the woman for the man. Man was prior to the woman in the creation, and is therefore superior in nature. A woman is not to usurp authority over the man, for Adam was first formed, and then Eve. And the Apostle directs wives to be discreet, chaste, keepers at home, good and obedient to their husbands. Another duty is respect and reverence: let the wife reverence her hus- band. As he is her head and superior by God's appointment, she ought to reverence him with fear; not a servile and slavish, but an awful and loving fear. She should endeavour to frame her affections and outward behaviour agreeable to the inclinations of her husband; to rejoice when he is pleased, to be uneasy when he is offended. She ought to be helpful and assisting to him in all things; to his soul, by promoting religion and piety in him; to his body, by expressing due care and tenderness; to his good name, by defending his reputation from any injurious slanders; to his estate, by a prudent and frugal management of all his domestic concerns. She is not to dispose of any part of his estate contrary to his mind and consent; her proper office being to govern the family with industry, care, and fidelity. She is to be adorned with a meek and quiet spirit, with sobriety, modesty, and good works. Her countenance, gesture, and words should be such, as to express the inward calmness and serenity of her mind. Impetuous, clamorous, and turbulent women are a torment to themselves and their husbands. There are also mutual duties to be performed by each; such as prayer, prudence in governing their families, discreet education of children, mutual love, and bearing with each other's infirmities.

The duties of servants to masters are obedience, reverential fear, diligence, honesty, and veracity. Their obedience is required in all things not contrary to the law of God: servants obey in all things your masters according to the flesh. Should the commands of masters be impertinent, impetuous, or tyrannical, yet servants are no more exempted from obedience, than masters shall be from punishment, for requiring unreasonable things. Servants are also to suffer patiently the reproofs and corrections of their masters without answering again, or murmuring. A quiet silent submission is required, even when the servant hath given no just cause for being rebuked, but that it proceeds from the unprovoked rage and passion of a master. The Apostle's command is, servants be subject to your own masters with all fear, not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward; if a man for conscience towards God suffers wrongfully, and takes it patiently, this is praise-worthy, and acceptable to God. But if, when we are buffeted for our faults we take it patiently, what room for glory is this?

Indeed of all things belonging to the duty of a servant, this is the most difficult, and nothing can sweeten and make it tolerable but a sense of duty, and the expectation of a reward from God. Reverential fear of masters is another duty of servants, who are commanded to be subject to their masters with all fear. This fear is to be expressed in their words and actions: in their words, by forbearing all irreverent muttering, and indecent expressions; by giving such respectful titles as their place and station require; by speaking well of them, if they can with truth; or otherwise to be silent, and conceal their infirmities: in their actions, by a modest and respectful behaviour, by observing their commands, and doing what they think will be pleasing and acceptable to them. Diligence is another duty: he is not a faithful servant who is slothful and negligent, for if he doth not use his strength and time in his master's service, he is a thief, and robs him of so much advantage. Servants are also to be just, faithful, and honest, not to defraud their masters of the least thing, but to serve them with fidelity and integrity. Many have been reduced and ruined by the unfaithfulness and carelessness of servants, either stealing from them, or prodigally wasting their properties. Truth and veracity is another duty: lying is a sin very odious to God, and most detestable to men. Servants are as the hands and eyes of masters, and ought to report nothing but what is true. Lying is the effect of cowardice, of a base slavish fear. Lastly, Servants are to serve their masters with good-will and singleness of heart; not as men-pleasers, only with eye-service, who are no longer diligent than their masters are present; but as servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart. Servants are to have respect not so much unto men as unto God; and to serve well, because God hath commanded it. Let their service be never so mean, painful, and laborious, yet if they perform it out of conscience to God's command, he esteems it as done to himself, and will hereafter bountifully reward them. And this is a great encouragement for servants to persevere in well-doing.

As to masters, their first duty is a prudent care in the choice of servants. This is a concern of great moment, on which the comfort and happiness, or the trouble and misery of a family doth much depend. The qualifications of a servant are, ability to discharge the duties of his place, an upright conscience, and piety towards God: the last is of great importance though too little regarded; for few inquire about their servants' principles in religion, but chuse them as we do beasts of burden, the most strong and able. But this is very imprudent and sinful. Masters should never think servants fit for their service, unless they are careful to worship that God whom both are bound to serve and obey. Wicked servants will corrupt a whole family; their lewd examples will soon tempt others to be as bad as themselves. To this may be imputed that general profaneness so prevalent in most families, especially where there are numerous servants. Children by conversing with such, here imitate the first rudiments of vice; learn the first syllables of oaths, curses, and obscenity; and who, for their easy docility and ready aptness therein, are applauded by these impious wretches. Such servants are the pests of mankind, as they corrupt those in their youth, who may afterwards have an influence on the state and commonwealth, and thereby render them a shame to their families, and a curse to the kingdom. For where servants are wicked, children are more influenced by their flattery and examples, than the authority and command of parents. It is therefore the wisdom and concern of masters to chuse such servants as know their duty, and make conscience of performing it, in whose integrity and fidelity they may repose themselves in safety. Another duty of masters is, to govern their servants with prudence, and to make a reasonable provision for them. A master's demeanor should be grave and awful, and his very countenance beget reverence. If a master's behaviour is mean and indiscreet, servants will grow familiar and contemptuous; not that masters are to command with rigour or to give ill and reviling language, for that will discourage servants, and make them hate their place; but there should be such a mixture of mildness with gravity, of love with authority, as that the servants should be both compelled and inclined to obedience. Power may force submission, but only reason and gravity can render masters venerable. The commands of masters should be lawful, for servants have a supreme lord and master in heaven whom they must fear and obey. A servant is obliged to work, but not to lye, steal, or cheat for a master; they must obey God rather than men. As to correction, prudence must be the measure of what is fit, according to their age, temper, and the nature of the offence. It should be inflicted for reformation and amendment, and not out of passion and revenge: reproof is generally the best discipline.

Another duty of a master is, to provide for the bodies and souls of servants. He is obliged to supply them with all things necessary. Masters are to give unto their servants what is just and equal. To detain from them the reward of their labour as covenanted or agreed for, is a crying and provoking sin. The care of their souls is also the master's concern. For he is priest and prophet in his own house, as well as lord and king. He is to instruct his family in religion, to inform their ignorance, excite them to serve God, to pray with and for them, to direct them in the way to heaven, and, above all, to set before them a holy, pious example. Masters should remember, that as their servants have immortal souls, so God hath entrusted the care thereof to them. Masters should instruct the ignorant, reduce the erroneous, rebuke the disobedient, discard the incorrigible and audacious, and more especially require their servants religiously to observe the Lord's day, in the due observance of which a great part of the life of religion consists.—Thus have I considered the mutual duties of these several relations; and it is necessary to observe, as a general rule, that if one party omits to discharge his duty, this is no excuse for the other. Should a father be careless and cruel, yet the child's duty still remains; should a master be tyrannical and severe, yet a servant is to reverence, fear, and obey him; and so of other relations.

To the precept in this commandment, honour thy father and mother, is added as a motive and encouragement, the promise of long life. Indeed this promise was made to the Jews, and concerned the land of Canaan, which was a type of our enjoying the felicity of heaven as a reward for our observing the laws of God. For as the Apostle says, godliness is profitable unto all things, having the promises of this life, and that which is to come. He that desires to live, and loveth many days, let him depart from evil and do good. But in all promises of temporal blessings a condition is implied, that they shall only be fulfilled, if they promote our eternal happiness; and therefore God doth often in mercy abridge this promise by taking us from the world, lest it should take us from him.

By DR. LUPTON.

The Sixth Commandment.

Exod. xx. 13.

Thou shalt not kill.

THE natural impressions and obligations of moral duty, which immediately relate to the preservation of human life, are such strong guards to secure it, that nothing surely but a very powerful temptation can ever break through them. Other sins more easily prevail over us, because they are agreeable and pleasing to our corrupt inclinations; but, corrupted as our nature is, there is something so shocking in the sin of murder, that a man must offer the utmost violence to his own natural disposition before he can prevail with himself to destroy his own or his neighbour's life. And lest any thing should be wanting to render these strong bonds of duty still more inviolable, God hath been pleased to confirm and enforce the voice of nature by this express revealed law, Thou shalt not kill. In discoursing on these words, it will be ne-

As there are some instances of murder which are not universally allowed to be such, but are often palliated under various pretences and false colours of vindication; so there are some cases wherein one may violently take away the life of another without violating this command. The lawfulness of this, in the case of self-preservation, is so certain and obvious, that it can scarce admit of any mistake, so long as this necessary caution is observed, that a man should not on every little suspicion or appearance of danger presently invade his neighbour's life, though he may innocently do it; but only when the danger is so manifest that he must unavoidably either give or receive the fatal stroke. The lawfulness of war, on some occasions and under certain restrictions, is also plainly warranted by the authority of holy scripture, as well as by the nature and reason of things, the situation and circumstances of human affairs; it being often impossible for states and kingdoms to support their just rights, or even preserve themselves or their allies from utter ruin, by any other means than war. Magistrates are likewise invested with a just authority to inflict capital punishments on offenders, by cutting off the corrupted members of the body politic, for the preservation and benefit of the whole society. The innocence of that person also is abundantly clear, who, through ignorance or unavoidable accidents, deprives another of life. For an action which has no foundation in the will and intention of the agent, is not properly a moral action, and consequently cannot be criminal. And therefore under the Mosaical dispensation there was a sanctuary provided by divine appointment for every one who was so innocently unfortunate as to kill his neighbour ignorantly and at unawares, lest the avenger of blood should pursue and slay him before his innocence could be sufficiently cleared. So that whoever knowingly and designedly, (but not ignorantly or accidentally,) without any necessity, arising from any imminent and unavoidable danger of his own destruction, does take away or invade his neighbour's life, is guilty of the sin forbidden in this commandment. And this imputation of murder properly falls on them who thus deprive their neighbour of life, either by open assault and violence, by stratagem and secret contrivance, by shedding his blood themselves, or engaging others to embroil their hands in the murder; either by acting as principals or accessaries, by command or persuasion, by threatening or encouragement, by direct concert and consultation, or by suggestion; either by bearing false witness against him themselves, or by suborning others; or by any instruments, means, or methods, which are not allowed by divine authority.

And from hence it likewise follows, that every person who knowingly and wilfully destroys his own life, is guilty of murder. For he has no authority to become the instrument or cause of his own death. We are not the proprietors of our lives, and therefore may not dispose of them at pleasure. God who gave them hath the only right to take them away; so that whoever offers violence to his own life, manifestly invades the prerogative, and usurps the right and authority of God. Duels also are direct violations of this commandment; being to be ranked in the number of those violent attempts on human life, which are not allowed by divine authority; and therefore the guilt of murder is chargeable on those who engage in them. The liberty allowed to a private man of destroying his neighbour's life, is both by natural and revealed law solely confined to the case of self-preservation; but that plea is utterly foreign to the condition and circumstances of him who formally gives or accepts a challenge. And he adds to sin of making an unnecessary attempt on his neighbour's life, by needless throwing himself into the utmost danger of losing his own. Nor can mutual consent and permission excuse or be any just vindication of such men as thus expose their lives; because God being the sole proprietor, the absolute lord of every man's life, no one has any right to dispose of or determine the duration of it, nor to transfer the disposal of it to another. Lastly, This commandment extends not only to our actions, but to our words, to the secret intentions and affections of our hearts. Our blessed Saviour expressly applies it to the several degrees, and various effects of causeless anger, breaking forth into bitter, reproachful language; and the Apostle tells us, that hatred is murder, and inconsistent with the hopes of heaven. Whosoever hateth hi, brother is a murderer; and ye know that no murderer hath eternal life abiding in him. Having thus considered the latitude and extent of the commandment, I proceed

To represent the guilt and danger which men incur by transgressing it. If the measure of this transgression is taken, either from the indignity thereby offered unto God, or from the injury done to man, from the punishments expressly denounced against it or from the anguish and horror which it is apt to leave on the mind, we shall find abundant reason to assign it a place amongst the most heinous crying sins. The first instance of murder in the world was closely followed with perplexity, oppression of spirit, and intolerable despair. My punishment (said Cain, the abandoned fugitive) is greater than I can bear; or rather, my iniquity is greater than can be forgiven. Every one that findeth me shall slay me. It was a dismal, but natural apprehension, which his guilt suggested to his thoughts, that the whole creation must be alarmed on the occasion, and stand ready to execute vengeance on him. And that weight of confusion, which natural conscience lays on such sinners, must be vastly increased by the severe expressions of God's indignation against them. The Lord abhors the blood-thirsty. Atonements and means of satisfaction were by divine institution provided for the sins of the people in several other instances of a very high and provoking nature; but God hath expressly forbid shewing mercy and compassion to a murderer, or taking any satisfaction for his life. If any man hate his neighbour, and smile him mortally that he die, thine eye shall not pity him. Ye shall take no satisfaction for the life of a murderer, but he shall surely be put to death. Not the cities of refuge, nor the holy altar of God, (a sanctuary the most sacred and inviolable,) could exempt such an unpardonable offender from punishment; if a man come pre- sumptuously upon his neighbour to slay him with guile, thou shalt take him from mine altar that he may die. And when the irreversible sentence of death is pronounced on him, the reason given is, that in the image of God made he man. Contempt of God is the great aggravation of sin, which in this of murder is aggravated to a singular height. Not satisfied with defying his laws, and assuming his dominion, they insult his very being, by defacing and destroying the only image of himself, which he hath impressed on the visible world. The injury done to man, is also very notorious; for other injuries may be repaired, or admit of some compensation, but this is utterly irreparable. Other injuries may rob a man of his estate, reputation, or some particular advantages; but this summary of mischief deprives him all at once of every temporal benefit and satisfaction: nay, it may prove fatal to the sufferer's soul, as well as body, and at once involve him in the first and second death, by depriving him of that space to repent, which might have been necessary to his eternal salvation. Or should the injury not follow the sufferer in a future state, and press him down into everlasting destruction, as not happening to him when in an impenitent state; yet it must be an heavy weight to him, even in respect to his view of that eternity into which he is so suddenly sent.

For who can bear the thoughts of being hastily dispatched into the other world? Who is not exceedingly desirous of going down to the grave in peace and quiet? Even the best of men would be glad of a few leisure minutes at the last, deliberately to review and lament their past defects and miscarriages; would be glad of a little calm and undisturbed space of time, in the conclusion of their lives, to adorn their souls, and prepare them for their immediate appearance before the glorious and unspotted presence of God. How dreadful then must that injury be, which deprives men of circumstances so advantageous and desirable? Such is the guilt and danger attending the transgressing of this commandment, in the first instance of it, as signifying wilful murder, or offering unlawful violence to our neighbour's life.

I shall next consider the reasons of the guilt and danger of those persons who destroy their own lives. That they are transgressing against this commandment has been already proved; it will therefore be needless to shew, that they are involved in the guilt, and obnoxious to the punishment of murder in general; but they expose themselves in a particular manner to the greater condemnation, by some singular sentiments and dispositions, which are commonly the foundation of this unnatural crime. For instance, if men destroy themselves, to avoid present sufferings, do they not tacitly declare, that God shall not act by them as he pleaseth; that they will resolutely break through what he hath determined and established; that they will not be confined to such circumstances as he hath allotted them; but will wrest their lives out of his hands, and not suffer him to prolong them beyond the limits of their own pleasure? And if this is the secret language of their hearts, what can be expected, but that God should execute the severity of his wrath upon them? Or if pride, envy, and ambition do so govern their minds, as that in the abundance of their arrogance and resentment they will violently remove themselves out of the world, perhaps because they are not advanced to a more advantageous situation in it; what can they reasonably expect or imagine, but to feel the weight of Solomon's observation, Pride goeth before destruction, and an haughty spirit before a fall? a fall into eternal as well as temporal destruction. For what foundation can there be of hope that God will forgive a flagrant sin, without the sinner repenteth? and how can a man truly repent of a sin, in the very commission of which he dies? There are some other sins besides that of offering direct violence to a man's life, which have been usually esteemed branches of self-murder; as intemperance, or the indulgence of any other vice, which impairs the health and destroys the life.

As to the guilt and danger of engaging in duels, these being manifest instances of wilful murder, such persons expose themselves to the severities of God's indignation denounced against it. Those who die in such engagements go into the other world, not only void of charity, which is absolutely necessary to their future happiness, but glowing hot with wrath and fury. And when such passions have the last possession of their souls, what society of spirits can they be qualified for to live with to all eternity? Or should they not immediately perish in the conflict, yet is their guilt the same in the sight of God, the searcher of hearts, who judges of men's wicked attempts, not by the success or event of them, but by the designs and intentions from which they proceed. And dare a man hazard eternal and unspeakable misery, for the sake of resenting an affront, or redressing an injury, how great soever? Is it a rational conduct, only to avoid a groundless imputation of cowardice, for a man to run such hazard to testify his false courage, by insulting the Lord of heaven and earth, and spending the last efforts of his strength and life in an act of defiance and rebellion against him that gave them? For supposing duels the only possible means of redressing some kinds of injury, it would not from thence follow, that recourse should be had thereto, by those who call themselves christians, and acknowledge the divine authority of the holy scriptures, which enjoin us not to avenge ourselves, but rather give place unto wrath; for, saieth the Lord, vengeance is mine. If the world hath advanced some mistaken notions, in direct opposition to God and the gospel, can those who espouse and are influenced by them be properly numbered amongst the servants of Christ? Every man who professeth the gospel is obliged to an inviolable exercise of patience, meekness, and forbearance, under the various circumstances and occurrences of life, in imitation of our Lord and Saviour. How inconsistent then is it, for a christian to be governed by such false notions of honour, as are directly contrary to the fundamental rules of his duty?

Whoever faithfully and constantly adheres to virtue and the positive commands of God, despising every imputation and reflection levelled against him, gives a much stronger evidence of true greatness and generosity of mind, than those who relinquish their duty to avoid that uneasiness which such treatment occasions. Every great mind will make favourable allowances for little infirmities and heats of passion, which are the unhappiness of human nature, and too apt to arise amongst dearest friends; nor is he less inclined to make all lawful satisfaction for any injury he hath inadvertently offered his neighbour. To fear men more than God is the most dishonourable misapplication and degeneracy of fear. To be deterred from obedience by the uneasy apprehension of being censured for the faithful discharge of it; or to be laughed and frightened out of our duty, are certain indications of a weak, little, and base spirit, which for want of ability to support itself, readily gives up the most excellent ornaments and accomplishments, when any attempt is made on them. Those therefore who engage in duels, from fear of suffering some seeming calumnies and reproaches, do at once forfeit all just pretensions to true honour and generosity of mind, all claim and title to eternal salvation.

Lastly, We must take diligent heed not to transgress this commandment, by the intentions and affections of our heart, though no actual violence is committed. Those who have not sufficient degrees of natural courage, or want favourable opportunities actually to defile their hands with blood, may yet sacrifice their neighbour in their secret thoughts and wishes, and indulge their imagination in the view of those mortal wounds they dare not give; and men, who are afraid to handle the instruments of death, may shoot out their arrows, even bitter words, and pierce the souls of their brethren, with the expressions of cruelty, malice, and contempt. But the christian law is, that whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause, shall be in danger of the judgment; and whosoever shall say to his brother, Racha, shall be in danger of the council; but whosoever shall say, thou fool, shall be in danger of hell-fire. And this demonstrates the excellence of the gospel of Christ, that as moral duty is therein raised to the most elevated height of perfection, so more especially does it recommend and promote the exercise of universal charity and benevolence, by an absolute prohibition of all strife, variance, clamour, evil speaking, wrath, hatred, envy, and malice; for these every disciple of Christ has solemnly renounced, and whoever indulges them dishonours the profession, and forfeits the gospel privileges.

Let then the use and application of this discourse be, that the heinousness of the sin of murder should raise in us a proportionable abhorrence of it, and the utmost esteem and desire of those qualities and practices which are most directly opposite thereto; that we should not only have the tenderest regard to the preservation of our neighbour's life, but to the comforts and conveniences of it; that instead of violence and injury, we should abound in acts of beneficence; that anger should be prevented by habitual meekness; malice by loving-kindness and compassion; revenge by constant endearments; and hatred by complacency and delight. So shall we fully answer the end of the commandment; and being thus heavenly in our dispositions here, we cannot fail of obtaining an inheritance in those mansions of everlasting peace, love and joy, where our Saviour is gone to prepare a place for us.

Let the consideration of what has been said possess our minds with the greatest horror and abomination of this sin of murder; and make us extremely watchful of ourselves, that we never fall into it, but keep at the farthest distance, and tremble at the least approaches towards any degree or instance of it. Let us pray for and endeavour to obtain an humble, meek, and charitable temper; more especially, for the continual assistance of God's grace, which can alone prevent, preserve, and restrain us from this, or any other the most enormous transgression. Which God of his infinite mercy grant, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

SERMON XLIV.

By BISHOP BURNET.

The Seventh Commandment.

Exod. xx. 14.

Thou shalt not commit adultery.

As this was one of the ten commandments spoken by God himself, so the punishment of it under the Jewish law, was likewise appointed by God; and the man that committeth adultery with his neighbour's wife, the adulterer and the adulteress shall be put to death. But though in the New Testament there are no laws of this nature, against this or any other sin, yet there are much more terrible denunciations made of the judgments of God against it: for, as the author of our blessed religion was, in his own person, holy, harmless, and undefiled, so he has most strictly charged us to be pure and holy in all manner of conversation, as he who called us was holy; without which we are assured, we shall not see the Lord; and the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness.

One part of the judgment of God against those who live not answerably to their holy profession is, that God gives them up to uncleanness, and to vile affections; and so odious were all the sins of the flesh to the holy apostles, that they charged the first christians not to keep company with any man that was called a brother, that is, a christian, if he was a fornicator, a covetous man, an idolater, a railer, a drunkard, or an extortioner, and with such an one no not to eat. St. Paul also warns us not to deceive ourselves; for neither fornicators, adulterers, thieves, covetous men, drunkards, revilers, nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of God. And reckoning up the works of the flesh, he begins at adultery, fornication, and uncleanness; and concludes, that they who do such things, shall not inherit the kingdom of God; and that therefore, they that are Christ's, that is, true christians, have crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts. The same apostle does also most earnestly charge the Ephesians in these words; but fornication, and all uncleanness, or covetousness, let it not be once named amongst you, as becomes saints. And to avoid all approaches to it, he charges them to abstain from filthiness, foolish talking and jesting, which are not convenient. By which is meant all steps towards impurity, lewd jests, and indecent discourses; to which he adds, for this you know, that no whoremonger, nor unclean person, nor covetous man, who is an idolater, hath any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ, or of God. And because there were in those days, as well as in this corrupted age, some who made light of this sin, and perhaps scoffed at the judgments of God, which were declared against it; he says of these, let no man deceive you with vain words, for because of these things comes the wrath of God upon the children of disobedience; be not ye therefore partakers with them.

The same things are repeated by him in his epistle to the Colossians; and in his Second Epistle to the Thessalonians he tells them, that as it was the will of God, that they should abstain from fornication, so it was also the great means of preserving themselves pure, even their sanctification; and that, though the worship of idolaters was commonly defiled with great licentiousness, and many disorders of this sort, yet God hath called Christians not to uncleanness, but to holiness. And in the visions of St. John, whoremongers are in two different places reckoned among those that are shut out of the New Jerusalem, and who shall have their part in the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone, which is the second death.

Nor did our Saviour only condemn acts of uncleanness, but he being the author of a religion designed for the cleansing of our hearts, has carried the precept further in these words; ye have heard that it hath been said by them of old time, thou shalt not commit adultery; but I say unto you, that whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her, hath committed adultery with her already in his heart. In this he strikes at the root of sin, which is in the heart; for when lust is once conceived there, it bringeth forth sin; and of this sin it may more particularly be said, that when it is finished, it bringeth forth death. For Solomon, whose heart was corrupted by those impure desires, tells us, from sad experience, that he who is enticed by a harlot, goeth after her as an ox to the slaughter, as a fool to the correction of the stocks; till a dart strike through his liver, and as a bird hasteth to the snare, and knows not that it is for his life; and he concludes, her house is the way to hell, going down to the chambers of death. Now, though there may seem to be an extreme severity in our Saviour's charging impure looks and desires with the sin of adultery; yet this, instead of making the yoke of the commandment heavier, makes it really lighter; it being much harder for us to maintain our purity, if we let our eyes and desires wander after forbidden objects, than it will be to stop the first motions to sin; and with holy Job, to make a covenant with our eyes, and upon that to say, why then should I think upon a maid? St. Paul also useth this argument to persuade us to purity, that the body is made not for fornication, but for the Lord; that we are all one body in Christ, and therefore, that our bodies are the members of Christ; that by this sin, those bodies that are sanctified, come to be defiled, and that our body is the temple of the Holy Ghost, which is in us: and elsewhere he says, that if any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy, for the temple of God is holy, which temple we are. Now if it would give us horror to see the house of God defiled, by putting unclean beasts in it; or which is worse, if we saw the churches prostituted by making them public places of lewdness and vice, we ought, according to St. Paul's reasoning, to esteem it a much more heinous thing, if these living temples of God should be thus prophaned.

From hence we see, that if we believe the holy scriptures, and take the New Testament to be the rule of our life, nothing can be more clear and express, than that these sins are so odious to God, that no man who lives in them, can have any part or portion in the mercies of God, but that he is of the number of those workers of iniquity that are to be cast out into outer darkness, where there is weep- ing, wailing, and gnashing of teeth for ever. These laws are set us by a holy God, who is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, for only the pure in heart and life shall see him. Nor can the spotless Lamb of God suffer any to follow him, who with the swine love to wallow in this defilement. If we think these precepts hard, and these threatenings terrible, this is only for want of due consideration. We must then govern ourselves according to the doctrine of Christ, or renounce our christianity, if we would rather gratify our impure appetites and desires, than keep our bodies thus pure and holy; there is no reconciling this to our holy faith; we cannot be both the members of Christ, and the members of a harlot. We must not therefore flatter ourselves with false notions, as if these were only dreadful words given out to fright us; they are true, or all christianity is only a cunningly-devised fable. For there are no parts of the whole New Testament more plain and express, and less liable to any doubtful meaning, than these which have been now delivered; and therefore, if we believe that God has revealed his gospel, as the only means by which we can fly from the wrath which is to come, when Jesus Christ shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, who shall be punished with everlasting destruction, from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of his power; then we must be very diligent and sedulous to obey these precepts, that so cleansing ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, we may perfect holiness in the fear of God, and glorify him in our bodies and in our spirits, which are God's.

And besides all that hath been said of the wrath and judgments of God against these sins, if we will but consider the state and order of this world, and our temporal and eternal interest, we shall see many other reasons concurring to enforce the observance of these commandments, and obliging us to acknowledge, that they are holy, just, and good. As for married persons, they have mutually given their faith to one another, by a solemn vow and oath made in the presence of God, so that in this sin both perjury and impurity meet together in the same action. The married man that lets his heart wander after other objects, neglects his own house, loaths his wife, and hates his children. Consider, you husbands, what you do, in the words of Solomon, lest you give your honour unto others, and your years unto the cruel: lest strangers be filled with your wealth, and your labours be in the house of a stranger; and you mourn at last, when your flesh and your body are consumed. When you have nothing left but poverty and shame, rottenness, or loathsome painful diseases, together with a guilty conscience; more exhausted with the horrors of a vicious life, than the body that is perhaps disfigured, or, at least, violently tormented with the remnants of those loose and unruly appetites. Follow therefore the advice of the wise man Drink waters of thy own cistern, and running waters out of thine own well. (a figure of speech importing a man's living happily with his own wife,) let them be only thine own and not strangers with thee; let thy fountain be blessed, and rejoice with the wife of thy youth, and be thou ravished always with her love. And why wilt thou, my soul, be ravished with a woman? For the ways of man are before the Lord, and he pondereth all his goings. Let us not flatter ourselves with this, that our sins are secret, and no eyes see them; nor yet wait for the twilight, and because we have disguised our face say, no eye shall see me; but we should remember, that God compasses our paths, and is acquainted with all our ways, and besets us before and behind: and though we may foolishly say, surely the darkness shall cover me, yet even the night shall be light about us: can the darkness hideeth not from him, but the night shineth as the day; the darkness and the light are both alike to him. Alas! all these stolen pleasures, that are now so sweet; when our iniquities shall compass us about, and make us possess many wearisome days and nights; when, between a wasting body and a guilty mind, a ruined fortune and a broken family, we feel the arrow of the Almighty piercing us, and the poison of them drinking up our spirits; when our sins have left us nothing in the decays of nature, but shame and infection, tribulation and anguish; then, even when it is perhaps too late, we shall think of crying unto God, and repenting of our sins, after they have left us and not we them; and forsaking them only, as not being able to live any longer in them.

O foolish people and unwise! Why will you not in time consider what shall be the end of all these things? Ye adulteresses, that, against the decencies of your nature, and that modesty which is the peculiar ornament of your sex, forget the vows of marriage, and your covenant with God; consider what you lose when you cast off your innocence, and make yourselves the reproach of your husbands, to whom you should be a crown; how you draw infamy on your children; by intermixing a spurious and uncertain brood; how you rob your husbands of their honour, your children of their fame, and yourselves of your reputation and credit; how you dissolve the tie of marriage, and the affection of a married state; how by an indecent and unchaste deportment, you raise terrible disquiets and uneasiness in the minds of your husbands, for jealousy is the rage of a man. It provokes a revenge that often cannot be appeased but with blood, either that of the injured husband, or the object of his jealousy; and the guilt of such blood lies chiefly on the woman, whose unchaste deportment has kindled the furious passion. Your sin is often robbery, as well as adultery and perjury, when the child of one man inherits the estate of the other on whom he is imposed, and who carries away either the whole, or at least his share in an inheritance, that of right belongs to others.

Consider this, all ye that defile the marriage bed, and think to face it out before the world, either with the hypocritical shews of piety, or with a loud and clamorous boldness. Remember you have to do with God, who will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and who will perhaps raise such horrors in your souls, that you will not be able to bear your own burthen, but become a terror to yourselves, as well as a reproach to all that belong to you. As for those who have, perhaps, some apprehension of the guilt of defiling the marriage bed, and therefore, that they may have less remorse for the free range of pleasure, in which they intend to live, will not enter into a married state, but deny themselves in no appetite, and so live loose and ungoverned lives; let such persons, who walk in the ways of their heart, and in the sight of their eyes, remember, that for all these things God will bring them into judgment. Consider that these pleasures of sin, that are but for a season, will waste your strength; expose your life and health to many dangers, and above all corrupt your minds; they will entice you to be the instruments of tempting others to sin, by bringing a double guilt upon you, both your own and the persons whom you exclude. Remember you will be the instrument of giving being to an illegitimate issue, who are born to inherit shame and contempt, poverty and misery; you refuse to follow the method that God has appointed for the increase of mankind, but chuse that which your brutish appetites suggest. You who follow forbidden pleasures, run yourselves into such a shameful course of life, as to be often tempted to deny and disown it, even with oaths and bitter imprecations. There is a fatal connection of sins one with another; ill actions commonly give suspicions, from whence often arise challenges and accusations, and these cannot be thrown off but by bold denials and impudent falsehoods, which are too frequently confirmed by bloody oaths. Injustice of all sorts also proceeds from this ill course of life; persons who promise themselves to one another are often false therein, and so carry a curse with them into any marriage which they may afterwards contract. In short, these men walk after their flesh, and not after the spirit; they prefer their own inordinate affections to the laws of God, and the precepts of the gospel. For St. Paul hath expressly said, that to avoid fornication, every man ought to have his own wife, and every woman her own husband; and if any cannot contain, let them marry; for it is better to marry than burn. Therefore, I beseech you, as strangers and pilgrims, abstain from fleshly lusts, which war against your souls; remember that you are redeemed from your vain conversation; be ye therefore as obedient children, not fashioning yourselves according to your former lusts. Remember that whoredom and wine take away the heart; and that, by the means of a whorish woman a man is brought to a morsel of bread; therefore keep you from the evil woman, and from the flat-tery of the tongue of a strange woman. Lust not after her beauty in thy heart, neither let her take thee with her eyelids; for the woman whose heart is snares and nets, and whose hands are brands, is more bitter than death. Whoso pleaseth God shall escape from her; but the sinner shall be taken by her; and he that is abhorred of the Lord, shall fall into this pit.

Lay these things to heart seriously, and in time, before you have purchased the knowledge of them at too dear a rate. Consider further, that if such advices were given by Solomon, under the old dispensation, in which, by reason of the infirmity of the Jewish nation, and for the hardness of their hearts, many things were dispensed with to them; certainly they are much more binding to us Christians, who are called to so high a degree of purity. Therefore, it is not enough for us to be blameless and harmless, and without rebuke, but we are commanded to walk as the sons of God, and to shine as lights in the midst of a crooked and perverse nation. It is the peculiar character of christianity, that it obliges us to mortify our bodies, to crucify the flesh, to put off the old man with his deeds, and to put on the new man; so that the same mind may be in us that was in Christ Jesus. We must abstain even from all appearances of evil; which is set forth in this noble figure, hating even the garment that is spotted by the flesh; that is, our abhorring every approach to any degree of defilement.

If you think these things are difficult, and not easy for flesh and blood, that is not to be denied; but if you follow the methods, recommended in the scriptures, you will find the difficulty to grow daily much less. Nor, indeed, ought you to think it hard, if you are required to be at some pains for the saving of your souls. You are willing to put yourselves to trouble for every thing else; the learning of a trade, the following of husbandry, the life of a soldier, are all things of great difficulty, and that yield but a small reward; yet men submit themselves to much toil and drudgery in every one of these. Most men's diversions and pleasures put them to a good share of trouble; and is it to be imagined, that so great a thing as eternal life, should be obtained without any difficulty or labour? Yet, after all, the labour is not so great, but it may be overcome. If men will by rioting and drunkenness, by sloth and idleness, and by exposing themselves to such temptations as they may easily avoid and resist in the beginning; if they are a little watchful; I say, if they will by such methods be laying in provision for the flesh, and for its lusts and affections, then it is no wonder if their appetites, thus indulged, should be high and unruly. But if they will learn to be sober and temperate, and study by fasting often to subdue the body; if they will avoid all that company and those occasions that betray them into these sins; keeping themselves free from the first steps, in which the appetite is yet but weak and feeble, and will follow the works of their calling with care and application, so as to employ their thoughts and time in them; and if they will make choice of such diversions, as do not betray them into these temptations; they will then find it very easy to resist or avoid them. The heathens understood this, and even one of the lowliest of their poets tells us, that the strength and arts of lusts perish, if men take care to be well employed and are not idle.

In the next place, you ought to follow the rule of religion, and to take a helpmate with whom you may hope to live happily together. Where the husband and wife are united to each other with the bonds of virtue and religion, and love one another in the Lord: as this is a kind of heaven upon earth, so it secures their hearts from impure and wandering desires, as long as they so continue and remain. In order to this end, you ought to be very careful in the choice you make in marrying yourselves, or your children; that you may not sacrifice both the peace and purity of your lives to those base considerations, upon which many of those, who even pass for wise persons in the esteem of the world, chuse a consort, and sell themselves or their children for a little money, or some other secular ends. But those who would marry in the Lord, that is, as becomes christians, ought to make such a choice, that in the company of the person with whom they are to lead their lives, they may hope to serve God, and to save their own souls; therefore the virtue and piety of the person ought to be the first and chief thing minded; not but that other considerations ought also to have a part and share therein; but when regard is only had to wealth, or other carnal ends, then the marriage will be soon repented of, the bed loathed, nothing but brawlings and contention, and at last a dissolution of that sacred faith.

To the sins of our fathers, this age has added the open giving up of marriages, and the parties allowing themselves that, which no religion nor law can allow them; to live impudently in a consortship with other persons, as if they were married to them; which is a degree of wickedness, that we have added to the former measure of our sins, and which, without this, was measure heaped up and running over. God grant it may not be the filling up the measure of our fathers; and that God who has threatened, that he will be a swift witness against the adulterers, and the false swearers, do not for the sake of those breakers of wedlock, who become guilty of both these sins at once, arise against this nation to judgment because of those crimes, whereof men are so far from being ashamed, that they openly commit them in the sight of the sun.

To conclude, Let every man pray earnestly to God, that he would assist him with his grace to subdue and mortify this body of sin, with all its lusts and evil affections. And such as do earnestly beg this of him, and do also make use of the means which he hath appointed to keep themselves pure and undefiled, may rest assured and well satisfied, that he who gives liberally to all men, and upbraideth no man, will either grant continence, which St. Paul calls a special gift of God, that indeed every man hath not; or to such whom, by not granting this, he calls to a married state, which is honourable in all men; he will grant a blessing in their marriage; for a good-will is said to be the gift of God, a prudent wife is from the Lord; and God, from whom cometh down every good and perfect gift, will certainly grant to all such as do earnestly seek to him, either one or other of these gifts, as he sees may be best for them. Therefore, to end all in the words of the same apostle, lay aside all filthiness and superfluity of naughtiness, and receive with meekness the engrafted word, which is able to save your souls.

SERMON XLI.

By BISHOP WILSON.

The eighth Commandment.

Exod. xx. 15.

Thou shalt not steal.

As the former commandment requires chastity in our persons, so this does honesty and uprightness in our dealings; a virtue immediately founded on that first practical principle of all human converse, which our Saviour lays down, whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so unto them: and recommends it to us, as the sum and epitome of all the scriptures; for this is the law and the prophets. A principle that carries such innate light and clear evidence in itself, that the very heathens frequently inculcate it in their writings as the primary dictate of that morality which they taught. This is a maxim we assent to, not by any elaborate instructions, dint of arguments, or long train of consequences; but it masters our understandings by its native evidence, and springs up in us as an unpremeditated resolve of reason. Both God and nature have set up this standard in our consciences: and usually there needs no other judge of our actions towards others, than by comparing them with what, in the like cases, we would think just and fit to be done to us. It may be, we are all partial to ourselves in our present concerns: and whilst we only look that way, we may possibly seek all advantages to promote them, though to another's detriment. But reason and religion will teach us to put ourselves in their stead, and then to manage our transactions with them, as we should judge just and reasonable, were we in their condition; and therefore when we deal with others, we should first act to ourselves both parties. For instance, a servant should consider what respect he would require, was he in the same circumstances with his master, and had servants under him. Children should consider what duty and obedience they would expect, were they parents of children. Subjects, what honour and submission they might reasonably demand, were they magistrates; and so in any other relation: and when they have thus seriously pondered it in their own thoughts, let them then perform the same duties to others, in their real condition, as they judge to belong to them in that which was only imagined. For it is a never-failing rule to direct our practice, that what we judge due to us, were we in another man's condition, is certainly as due to him in his own: and if we do not so act, we betray a great deal of selfishness and sinful partiality. This is a rule applicable to all affairs; and there is scarce any one occurrence of a man's life but he may regulate himself according to this direction; and, indeed, there scarce needs any other. Whatsoever then we have to transact with another, though perhaps we might take such advantages of him, as possibly he might never know, or be able to redress; yet let us seriously ask our consciences, if we could be content, and think it honest and just, to be so used ourselves; and if not, whatsoever the temptation be, either of gain, pleasure, or profit, let us reject it with scorn, as that which would make us violate the first principle of common honesty among men, and contradict the laws both of nature and scripture. Was this rule more generally observed among men, the world would not have that cause to complain of rapine, extortion, oppression, fraud, and injustice, as it now hath. The rich would not grind the face of the poor, nor the poor unjustly clamour against the rich. Superiors would not tyrannize over their inferiors, nor inferiors murmur or rebel against their superiors; but an equal peace, an uniform justice, would overspread the whole earth; and righteousness would run down our streets as a mighty stream. And therefore let me once more recommend it, (for indeed I cannot press it too often,) that we would frequently set this golden rule before us, and do nothing to any other person which, were we in his capacity, we should think unjust to be done unto ourselves: and what ~~over~~ we would expect from others, as our due, were we in their place, even that ought we to perform to them, or otherwise we must condemn ourselves. This is a dictate of nature and right reason; the sum of the law and the prophets. And all those various precepts which are given us in scripture, for the conduct of our lives, are but as so many lines that meet in this centre. And if we apply it to each particular command of the second table, we shall find them to be all founded on, and interpreted by this. We are required to honour our superiors, to abstain from murder, adultery, theft, false accusations, and coveting what belongs to another; and all this according to the same measures that we would have others perform these very duties to us. So that self, which is now the great tempter to wrong and injure others, was it governed by this universal maxim, would be the greatest patron of other men's rights and properties. I have the longer insisted on this, it having such general influence on the right ordering of our conversation; and because the most visible apparent violation of this natural law is, by the sin of theft, forbidden in this commandment of which I am treating.

Theft, in general, is an unjust taking, or detaining, what is lawfully another man's. He is a thief who withholds what ought to be in his neighbour's possession, or takes from him what he before possessed; for all theft presupposeth a right and property in another. God is the great Lord and proprietor of heaven and earth, and all things therein. The earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof: by him, and of him, are all things; according to the pleasure of his will they are and were created; and he hath granted unto man a large charter of the world, of every thing that is good. The heavens are the Lord's, but the earth hath he given to the children of men. A large and regal gift, whereby he hath made over unto man all sublunary things, reserving unto himself the sovereignty and supreme lordship of all, and requiring only from man the homage and payment of obedience; and yet this large charter and donation gave no particular propriety unto ~~or~~ had man continued his happy and innocent state, there would have been no need of mourning and tum, or any partition of these earthly possessions; but common blessings had been enjoyed in common by all. But sin entering into the world, men's desires after earthly enjoyments grew immoderate, and their attempts to attain them injurious to others; so that it became necessary to prescribe bounds and limits, that each man knowing his assigned portion, might rest satisfied therewith, and be restrained from invading and usurping on the rights of others. And there was no other way to effect this, but by human laws, mutual compact, and agreement, declaring the rights and properties of every man. So that it is law which determines property, and there is nothing ours, or another's, farther than this assigns it to us. Indeed, equity must sometimes interpose to moderate the letter of the law; for in some cases should we rigorously prosecute our right, and insist upon every punctilio we might call our

it would become intolerable, and be a breach and violation of the law of Christ, and of charity, which requires us rather to part with our own in small matters, than to be vexatious or contentious. Thus you see how all right and property first came into the world. A general right by the donation of God; a particular right, by the sanction of laws, allotting to each man his portion; which to invade or take from him, is injustice, or theft.—But as to theft, there are many kinds thereof. The highest and chiefest is that which is committed against God by sacrilege. Sacrilege is an alienation from God, of whatsoever he hath appropriated to himself, or that is upon good grounds dedicated to the encouragement and maintenance of his honour and service. Indeed, the alienating what hath been given to superstitious or idolatrous uses cannot be justly branded with sacrilege, for it was not so much given to God, as to ignorance and superstition; and therefore our ancestors have done well and piously, in dissolving those nests of unclean birds, the monasteries, that were so numerous and burthensome in these kingdoms. But where any thing is indeed consecrated to God, and set apart for the maintenance and encouragement of his worship and service, it is no less than sacrilege and robbing of God to alienate any part of this to secular uses. And of this God himself grievously complains, will a man rob God? yet ye have robbed me. But ye say, wherein have we robbed thee? in tithes and offerings. Ye are cursed with a curse, for ye have robbed me, even this whole nation. Certainly those things which are appointed for the worship and service of God, whether originally by divine right or not, yet they cannot be alienated, or detained without involving the persons, or the nation who doth it, in a great sin; for this is to rob God of his right. Again,

Theft may be committed against men, by an unjust seizure, or detention, of what belongs to them; and this may be done, either by fraud or force; and therefore our Saviour in reciting the commandments mentions them both, do not steal, defraud not. This is a sin that God hath threatened with many severe curses and punishments. The temporal punishments, which the scripture pronounces, is an ample and sufficient restitution; and therefore Zaccheus, when he was converted, offers a four-fold restitution to those he had wronged. If I have taken any thing from any man by false accusation, I restore him fourfold. And yet besides this restitution, sometimes the offenders were put to death, especially if to their theft they added cruelty and oppression. This appears in the parable of Nathan, when he had most artificially aggravated the rich man's crime in taking away the poor man's lamb, he so raised David's compassion and indignation, that he pronounces this sentence; the man that hath done this thing shall surely die; and he shall restore the lamb fourfold, because he did this thing, and because he had no pity.

So that under the law of Moses it was in some cases lawful to punish a thief with death; though, usually, restitution was only required. Indeed our law condemns them to death; and yet we see how many persist in this wicked course of life notwithstanding that severe punishment: and if the fear of death will not deter them, that of restitution would be much less effectual. But besides the punishment of the law, God leaves a curse upon what is gotten by theft and deceit; a curse that will blast and consume all such wicked increase. Luxury and intemperance usually devour what is got by rapine; God by his righteous judgment making one sin the vengeance of another. And therefore, saith the wise man, the robbery of the wicked shall destroy them; and, as the partridge sitteth on eggs, and hatcheth them not, so he that getteth riches, and not by right, shall leave them in the midst of his days, and at his end shall be a fool. God many times raises up such against them as will make them refund their ill-gotten treasure. Thus God threatened the Chaldeans, because thou hast spoiled many nations, all the remnant of the people shall spoil thee. Such unjust acquisitions tend only to treasure up for themselves and their posterity want and poverty. And therefore if we desire to prosper in the world, and to have our substance increase and multiply, we must be sure that no gain of robbery or oppression, fraud or deceit, be found in our hands, for this will devour our lawful acquisitions.

Besides, great anxiety of mind doth always accompany ill-gotten wealth. It is a sin so much against the light of nature, that conscience, if not totally hardened, will be for ever tormenting them with uneasy thoughts and reflections; for the fear of detection, of shame, and punishment incident thereto, must needs be a continual misery to them. But what is acquired fairly and with a good conscience, by an honest and lawful calling, whether more or less, it brings this contentment with it, that a man may quietly sit down and rejoice in that portion which the providence and bounty of God, his most gracious and heavenly father, hath offered him. He drinks no widow's tears, nor orphan's blood; he eats not the flesh of the poor, nor breaks the bones of the needy; his conscience checks him not when feeding on what his honest labour and industry hath procured; and though it be but a bit of bread, or cup of cold water, yet is he entertained at a continual feast. And what he eats is far more savoury to him, than all the heightened delicacies of rich oppressors. Therefore better is a little with righteousness, than great revenues without right. For a little that a righteous man hath, is better than riches of many wicked. Robbery and deceit also provoke God to cut such men off, by some untimely stroke, and immature judgment; either by the hand of human justice with shame and reproach, or of divine justice with wrath and vengeance. For so it is threatened, Thou, O God, shalt bring them down into the pit of destruction; bloody and deceitful men shall not live out half their days. That is, they shall not live to that period which the course and strength of nature would otherwise permit; but the hand of God will cut them off in the midst of their vigour and flourishing years. But however it may be with some of them in this life, if they escape the reproach of men, and the sword of justice, yet they shall certainly be eternally miserable. Their ill-gotten goods shall not be able to redeem their souls, to bribe the justice of God, or to obtain the least solace and comfort. And what wretched fools are they, who must everlastingly perish, for gaining of things that are perishable. Not thieves, nor covetous, nor drunkards, nor revilers, nor extortioners, shall inherit the kingdom of God. Where then shall their portion be but in the lake burning with fire and brimstone, that is unquenchable? where the Lord will spoil their very souls, as the wise man's expression is; rob not the poor, for the Lord will plead their cause, and will spoil the souls of those that spoiled them. And thus you see the various ways that God hath threatened to punish this first and greatest kind of theft, of taking away the right of another.

Another kind of theft, is oppression and unreasonable exaction; taking advantage either of the weakness or necessity of others, and imposing such unequal conditions upon them as they cannot bear, without their detriment and ruin. Contrary to the express words of God, if thou sell aught unto thy neighbour, or buyest aught at thy neighbour's hands, ye shall not oppress one another. Thus those who let out money at an extravagant interest, or rigidly exact it from insufficient persons; also the great, who force the meaner sort into disadvantageous bargains, and make them, through fear, to sell at an under-price; these, and the like, though not condemned by human law, are yet guilty by the law of God, of no less sin than oppression, a sin hateful both to God and man. The prophet calls it, a plucking off their skin from them, and their flesh from their bones, and chopping them in pieces, as for the pot. All unmercifulness and hard dealings with others is a kind of theft. For the law of nature, and much more the law of charity, obliges us so to deal with others, as not to give them cause to complain of us to God; and in the bitterness of their spirits to imprecate on us the severity of his wrath and vengeance.

Again, To detain from others what is their due, either by equity or compact, is another kind of theft. How many are there whose profuse riot and luxury are maintained at the expence of the poor creditor's ruin; who often have no other satisfaction than good words, and scarce any thing to live on but tears and sighs? How many withhold the hire of poor labourers, who, when wearied out in service, cannot receive for necessary refreshment that small reward which his labours, with the toil and sweat of his own brows, required and earned. Thou shalt not oppress an hired servant, that is poor and needy; at his day thou shalt give him his hire, neither shall the sun go down upon it. For he is poor, and setteth his heart upon it; lest he cry against thee unto the Lord, and it be sin unto thee. And in all our bargains and agreements we are bound to perform them, though never so much to our prejudice, unless the other party will release the contract. For this is one character of a good man, he that sweareth, and covenanteth to his own hurt, and changeth not; but upon demand is ready and willing to perform and execute his agreement.

Another kind of theft is, in buying and selling; and this is of a very large extent: for the subtilty of man hath found out so many artifices to defraud and over-reach others, that to recount them, is almost as difficult as to escape them. Such are the false weights and measures, that are an abomination to the Lord; also false and counterfeited wares, overcommending, or undervaluing of goods for advantage, and many other unjust contrivances, which men's consciences better know than another can suggest. The apostle hath sufficiently cautioned and threatened such men; let no man go beyond, or defraud his brother in any matter, because the Lord is an avenger of such. There is a day coming when the false weights shall be weighed, and the scanty measures measured, by a standard that is infallibly true. Possibly we may deal so craftily, that those whom we over-reach can take no advantage against us to right themselves by law; but we should remember, that the Great Judge will at the last day avenge them upon us. Then all accounts shall be balanced, and what remains shall be certainly paid; though not to the injured, yet to the justice of God, who is the great and universal creditor. Thus we have seen what the negative part of this command is, as to many particular instances thereof; others I could have mentioned had time permitted; and since every negative implies a positive, I shall now proceed to consider what is the duty required from us. Which is, first, That all of us should have some calling. Secondly, That we should be contented with that state and condition of life in which providence has fixed us.

First, Thou shalt not steal; therefore every man ought to have a calling, whereon he may comfortably subsist, and by his labour and industry, at least provide necessaries for himself and family. He that provideth not for his family hath denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel. Some there are who live without calling, such are like idle drones, that consume the labour of others; lazy vagabonds, to whom the greatest charity would be correction; who only serve to devour misplaced alms, and defraud the truly poor of relief. And we may rank with these some others who are neither serviceable to God nor their country; who have nothing of true worth in them, being the most unprofitable members of the commonwealth, and only live to kill and destroy one another in their drunken quarrels. It is certain, that those whom God hath liberally endowed with his earthly blessings have no necessity for manual employments and labour; but yet they may within their own sphere find business enough to employ their time and thoughts, so as to render them the most beneficial men on earth, and make them to be loved and honoured by others; for by their authority and example, by the largeness of their income and revenues, and the dependance that others have on them, they might be as influential to promote goodness and virtue, as too often they are to countenance and encourage vice. But as some have no employment, so others have an unlawful one, whose only business is to teach and inculcate vice, and excite men to it. And how many such are there are, who live by encouraging of wickedness in others, who are continually making use of all allurements to entice unto evil, recommending debauchery first to the fancy, then to the will and affections?

There are others who indeed have a lawful and honest calling, but then they are negligent and slothful; and which tends to poverty. Yet a little sleep, a little slumber, a little folding of the hands to sleep; so shall poverty come as one that travelleth; drawing nearer by soft and silent degrees. Poverty also tempts to theft, as Solomon says, lest I am poor and steal. And therefore this command, which forbids theft, must by consequence enjoin labour and industry in our lawful callings. According to the apostle, let him that stole steal no more; but rather let him labour, working with his hands the thing that is good, that he may have to give to him that needeth; and so by industry, of a thief he may become a benefactor and alms-giver. And as this commandment requires that we should be employed in some calling; so it,

Secondly, enjoins us contentment with that portion of earthly good things, which our heavenly father allots us. Be content with those things ye have. And certainly he that is not content with what God allows him, lies under a great temptation, by fraudulent and unjust courses, to carve out his own condition to himself, and invade the rights and properties of others. Discontent and covousness are the root of all injustice. He that thinks himself injured, because he enjoys not so much as others, will be apt, either through fraud or violence, to increase his substance by taking from his neighbour. Let us therefore in time check this repining temper, and be satisfied with that provision which God hath afforded us: and though it be not the most delicate, or the most sumptuous, yet having food and raiment, let us be therewith content. Let us look upon all other things as superfluous or indifferent; and not murmur though we should never attain them. For whatsoever is necessary to our subsistence, God's providence and blessing on our industry will supply us with; and we ought not to repine for not having what we do not absolutely want.

I shall conclude this discourse by an exhortation to those who are conscious to themselves of having wronged others. Let then such know, that they are in duty bound to restore the thing stolen or purloined, if it be in their power; if not, restitution must be made another way, by an adequate, ample, and satisfactory compensation; it not being enough to confess the sin to God, and beg his pardon; but restitution of the thing, or recompence for it, with the damage sustained, must also be made and rendered, without which pardon and remission of the guilt from God can never be expected. And the reason is, because as long as any detains another's right and property, such continues in the same sin; for unjust possession is a continued and prolonged theft. And certainly that repentance of any sin, can never be true or sincere, of which, though we seem to repent, yet we continue in. And without a true repentance, how can God's pardon be expected? But perhaps some will say, what if those we have defrauded are dead, how can restitution be then made them? To which I answer, in such case we are bound to make satisfaction to their children or representatives; and if there are none to be found, then we ought to dispose of it in acts of charity and piety. Some possibly may think this a very hard lesson of instruction, yet this is the rule of christianity, the inflexible laws of justice, and without complying therewith, we have no reasonable hopes of obtaining God's pardon. For which may we all fit and prepare ourselves.

The ninth Commandment.

Exod. xx. 16.

Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour.

As the former commandment is intended to defend our properties from wrong and violence, so this is designed to preserve our good name from slander and defamation; a good name is so excellent and valuable a thing, that the very subsistence of some, the conveniency and happiness of all, do much depend thereon. The wise man tells us, it is rather to be chosen than great riches; indeed the one without the other will afford but little comfort. And elsewhere he says, a good name is better than precious ointment; for it yields a sweet savour to all about us, it perfumes the air we breathe in, scatters its fragrancy abroad, and transmits the odour to posterity. And as a good name is in itself highly desirable, so is it a very tender thing, easily wounded, and sometimes incurable; for which reason this commandment was given to secure it from all unjust assaults. Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour. This precept being negative, I shall first consider what is therein forbidden, which in general are all the ways of injuring the credit and reputation of our neighbour, either publicly or privately; as

By bringing a false accusation, or giving a false testimony against any in courts of judicature; which is wounding of men's good name within the very letter of this commandment. This may be done, either by charging any person with what they know to be false; as that of Potiphar's wife, who charged Joseph with incontinence, when she knew to the contrary; such also were they who falsely accused our Saviour as an enemy to Cæsar, and his apostles as troublers of the world, and turning it upside down. This crime, however common, is a work of the devil, and those who practise it are the children of that wicked one. Again, bearing of false witness may be done, by concealing something that is true, whereby great injury may happen to men; or by affirming a thing with a higher degree of assurance than our knowledge extends to. In the first case, he that kills another, in his own defence, or in the execution of justice, may be condemned as a murderer, if those alleviating circumstances are not brought to light: and in the other, he that attests a thing as certain, which he believes to be only probable, gives a false testimony, because what he asserts or swears to, may, for aught he knows, be otherwise. So that in either case, he that thus swears, is guilty of bearing false witness.

Another way of bearing false witness against our neighbour is, that of lying; a vile practice, against which we have many express texts of scripture: as, lie not one to another, put away lying, speak every man truth with his neighbour. The evil of lying is very apparent; for it perverts the end of speech, which is freely and fairly to communicate our minds to each other. It robs our neighbour of that debt of truth which is due to all men, and makes the tongue, which was given for the glory of God and the good of one another, to become the instrument of deceit and dishonour to both. And therefore our Saviour tells us, that lying is of the devil, who was a liar from the beginning, and the father of it; and they who delight therein, shall have their portion with him, in the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone.

Slandering is another instance of bearing false witness against our neighbour. And this consists in raising or spreading false reports of him, to the prejudice of his fame and character. This is too common a fault among men, who whet their tongue like a sword, which cuts as a sharp razor wounding the reputation of others, without consideration or remorse. And this is done, sometimes, by fixing black and infamous characters on men, to their prejudice and great detriment. We find our Saviour himself could not escape the lashes of slandering tongues, for he was branded with characters the most infamous; an impostor, a blasphemer, a glutton, a wine-bibber, a friend of publicans and sinners: and his apostles were stiled, seditious, and troublers of the world: and among ourselves, how often do we hear the odious titles of proud, covetous, malicious, and the like invidious epithets, fixed on persons deserving a better character?

Detraction is another crime condemned by this commandment. Detraction differs from slander in this, that the latter is a wrongful imputation of some vice; the other is a wilful lessening of another's virtue. The one consists in a charge of evil on our neighbour; the other, in undervaluing and obscuring the good he does. This of detraction is a fault no less frequent than injurious. When the merits of any person shine forth with a brighter lustre than others, many are busy to cast a cloud on them, and sully the glory of his best actions. A detractor loves to find flaws and blemishes in the best things, and to derogate from the praise of the most worthy. He is uneasy under the commendation of others; thinking it lessens his own worth, and therefore seeks to raise fame on the ruin of others; by diminishing the good, aggravating the evil, blaming the principles, disparaging and perverting his best actions, and most innocent designs. But this is directly opposite to that part of charity which we call candour and ingenuity, for that inclines men to commend the virtues and good qualities of others, giving every thing its due weight; and instead of disclosing, will hide a multitude of sins; charity gives all persons and actions their just praise; and so far from speaking, it thinketh no evil.

Flattery is another way of bearing false witness against our neighbour; and this differs from the former, in that as the detractor takes off from another's worth, the flatterer adds too much to it, and so hurts his credit as much in the excess, as the other diminishes from it. The flatterer represents persons and things otherwise than they are, extolling some too high, and giving greater characters of them than they deserve. There are some who will celebrate such virtues in another, which they know is not in them; and others, who if they see one guilty of a vice, will conceal that and commend him for the contrary virtue, calling evil good, and good evil, light darkness, and darkness light, from whence have proceeded many notorious evils.

All judging and censuring of others, scoffing at, and exposing them to contempt are here condemned, as bearing false witness against our neighbour. We are commanded to judge not, lest we are judged; and Solomon tells us, he that mocketh his neighbour is void of understanding; that is, he doth not well consider the damage and detriment he thereby does him: for this is many times a great prejudice to the name, and also to the quiet and interest of another. These are the more open and public ways of hurting the credit of our neighbour, and are here forbidden, as bearing false witness against him. Besides these, there are other more secret and private ways of wounding another's reputation, that fall under the prohibition of this commandment; as back-biting, whispering, and tale-bearing; and which, though less observed, are by no means the less injurious; nay are oftentimes the more dangerous, by not being seen and discerned before they have done incurable evils. These sort of evil-speakers work like moles under ground; and as men may suffer more by the invisible hollowness of an earthquake than the loudest blusters of a storm, so the credit of our neighbour may receive deeper wounds by the invisible darts of secret calumnies, than by the bolder strokes of open and public slanders.

Back-biting is the speaking evil of another behind his back, by which many have greatly suffered; an enemy that comes behind and unawares, being far more dangerous than a known and declared one. Against the latter we may arm and defend ourselves, but the other attacks us cowardly when we are ignorant of his designs. And therefore we find the back-biter in the black list of the greatest sinner, and numbered with those who are to be excluded the kingdom of heaven. Whereas a good man is described to be one who backbiteth not his neighbour; and is thereby fitted to ascend the holy hill.

Whispering is that sort of back-biting that consists in relating men's failings in private. This is an artificial and very malicious way of defaming, and many times makes greater impressions than more open calumnies: for he that is intrusted with this secret generally obliges another with it, and so it is communicated to others, till it creeps about like infection, and leaves the party's reputation wounded beyond redress. These also are in the catalogue of such as are given up to a reprobate mind, and who without repentance shall never enter into the kingdom of heaven. Tale-bearing is somewhat a more open way of defaming, and signifies the telling tales of others as a piece of news, and to find matter of talk, which is often done to the great prejudice of men's good name; and therefore God Almighty gave an express charge against it, thou shalt not go up and down as a tale-bearer among the people. The word in the original signifies a trader in ill reports and stories of other men. This is what the Psalmist condemns in some, who sit and speak against their brother and slander their own mother's son; whose words are as swords, and wound even to the innermost parts of the belly. These, besides the evil they do to men's good name, destroy the peace and quiet of the whole neighbourhood; for a tale-bearer stirreth up strife, and separateth very friends.

Thus we see what is forbidden in this commandment, namely, all manner of evil-speaking, both open and secret, public or private, to the prejudice of the fame and reputation of another, which is in some respect to bear false witness against one's neighbour. But because all the motives and occasions of this evil are forbidden with it, therefore the apostle commands us to lay aside all malice, and all guile and hypocrisies, and envyings, and all evil-speakings. To lay aside all malice, which whets the tongue against one another; all guile, which tips it with falsehood and dissimulation; all hypocrisy, in disparaging or flattering of others; all envyings, which sour men's minds and corrupt their discourses; all evil-speakings, which breeds the poison of asps under their lips: in a word, let us lay aside all pride, self-interest, evil-speaking, faction, and whatever may tend to slander and defamation. I now proceed to consider what duties are required of us in this commandment. And first,

We are to preserve the honour and good name of our neighbour. This is what St. Peter means when he commands us to honour all men; that is, we are to be so tender of the honour or reputation of every one, as instead of impairing, to do all we can to preserve and advance it. And this honour and esteem for all, is founded on some excellency common to mankind; who have all the image of God stamp'd upon them, and should therefore, in reason, have a suitable regard paid even to the meanest person: for though some are in a more exalted station, and whose greater parts and power may demand higher degrees of it, yet some measure of honour and respect is due to that common nature of whom all are partakers; and that is to have a tender regard for the good name of every one, and to preserve all men as far as we can from reproach and contempt; for as the wise man says, he that mocketh or despiseth the poorest man, despises his Maker. It is a contempt of God to debase or vilify such as bear his image, and we debase ourselves in abusing those who are so nearly allied to us by an affinity of nature; whom we ought to honour and esteem for God's sake, and to love them for our own. We should be as tender of their character and reputation as those of ourselves. If we see a man suffer under a slander which we know to be false, we are obliged to appear in his defence, to assert and vindicate his abused innocence, and to the best of our power remove such unjust aspersions. This is implied in not bearing false witness, and is a part of justice we owe to the reputation of all men.

But further: This commandment requires truth in our words and promises; for the not bearing false witness, signifies our bearing true witness, which we are to regard in all our speeches; for a good man is one who speaketh the truth from his heart. This should be observed in public courts of justice, and in all private commerce and conversation. In courts of justice, when we are summoned to bear witness for or against any, we must speak the truth from our hearts. This is a matter of great consequence to the lives and fortunes of men, on which the safety and security of both do very much depend: and therefore the oath administered on such occasions is, that men should speak "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." The truth, without forging or falsifying any matter which perverts judgment and justice: the whole truth, without concealing any part out of favour or prejudice to either party, which prevents justice from being rightly administered, and may occasion much wrong: nothing but the truth; without adding any doubtful and uncertain conjectures whereby a jury may be induced to give a hard and injurious sentence. These are the properties of a good witness, upon whose testimony men's lives and estates depend. A faithful witness will not lie, or forge anything; but a false witness will utter lies. And, he that speaketh truth, sheweth forth righteousness, but a false witness deceiveth. All who are required to give evidence in any cause, should be careful to confine their testimony to such things only as they know to be true. For it is this that preserves the public peace and welfare, prevents injustice and wrong, and secures to us quiet and tranquillity of mind, and whereby we also promote God's glory. Joshua bids Achan give glory to God by speaking the truth, in the matter of the wedge of gold. By speaking the truth we glorify and reverence God's attributes, and conform to his nature and will, who is truth itself, and requires truth in the inward parts; but we highly dishonour him, by bearing false witness, because we thereby disown all love and fear of him.

Moreover, as this commandment requires truth in courts of justice, so does it in all our conversation and commerce with each other; we being enjoined to speak every man truth with his neighbour. In all private converse our Saviour's advice is; that our communication be yea, yea, nay, nay; that is, to affirm or deny nothing contrary to the truth, but to declare things as they are, without falsifying or forswearing. For these are of the evil one, who was a liar from the beginning, and the father of them; but God is truth, and his servants are styled children that will not lie, who have a veneration for truth in all their words and actions. Truth is too sacred a thing to be prostituted, or trifled with; it being the cement and safeguard of all society, and what ought to be inviolably observed in all our communications with one another; more especially in our promises and contracts, where our words should correspond with our thoughts, and be agreeable to our purposes and resolutions performing such agreements as we have made. It is such a serious regard to truth that can only answer the end of speech, which was given as a means to convey our mind and meaning, and to be the instrument of intercourse and mutual confidence between each other. So that he who useth his tongue to the speaking truth, employs it as God hath appointed; but a liar contradicts and inverts the design of speech, by making his tongue instrumental to promote and propagate falsehood, deceit, and slander. Indeed, truth is what all men owe to one another; and whoever falsifies or equivocates with his neighbour, does an act of great injustice, by depriving him of that right of truth which God hath made due to every man; and he most notoriously bears false witness who speaks one thing, and intends another. And therefore,

Another virtue required in this commandment, is an honest simplicity in all our words and actions. By this the heart will be void of all evil purposes and designs, and possessed only with just sentiments and strong desires of doing good. He that inwardly designs to hurt and injure another, generally disguises his intentions by outward fair speech, and so conceals the wickedness of his heart by the flattery and falsehood of his tongue; but he that hath good will for others, his tongue will not va either, his heart, nor his actions from want but a true harmony and agree-be found in both; even that simplicity and godly sincerity, in which all men are directed to have their conversation.

But this simplicity consists in several particulars; namely, in a freedom from all malice, which is the vilest of all passions, stiled therefore not only wicked but is wickedness itself; for malice, but compounded of anger and hatred, is more dangerous than both. It is a subtle, and mischievous passion, the craft of the fox mixed with the art of the tiger. It fills the heart with gall, tips the tongue with falsehood, as Solomon says, will not suffer men to sleep till they have done evil. But an honest simplicity of mind is not intended to this; it desires all good, and as the wisdom of the serpent, and yet will not harm the dove, and its name. And any, in body, goods, or name. And the simplicity here required is to be free from all guile, hypocrisy, and dissimulation. Such things put false colours upon men's words and actions, make them appear to be what they are not, and set them upon using disguise. They that have to carry on the measures, speak one way and act another, profess the greatest respect, when by fair speeches palliate dangerous actions. David complained the foulest enemies, were those who that his greatest friendship. Says he, it was not, but my companion and my own dishonour; friend; they that eat of my familiar bread wait for me. Judas came to betray his Saviour with, hail, master! and our Lord him at the same time he betrayed him. And St. Paul was in great perils by his false brethren, who spake him fair, when they designed him the greatest mischief. This is but too much practised in our days, wherein the ancient simplicity of our forefathers is in a great measure lost, and men are degenerated into craft and subtlety, aim snares in their discourse, and traps in their ways and dealings; directly contrary to the simplicity required in this commandment, by which we are not only forbidden to bear any false witness, but are enjoined to have our speeches agree with our minds and our actions to bear a true testimony to our words, to lay aside all guile and hypocrisy. Lastly, The simplicity here required implies a freedom from all envy, malice, and evil speaking. Envy sours men's minds, and embitters their tongue: ill-will never speaks well, but aggravates all misarranges; and therefore to cure these vices of the tongue, we must discard all spite and envy from our minds, so prejudicial to the good name of our neighbours, and learn that charity, which envieth not, and will not suffer us to think or speak in the miss of any.

Thus will we see what is forbidden, and what required in this commandment; to the former belong all the wicked arts of impairing or hurting our neighbour's credit; to the latter appertain all the good and christian methods of promoting and preserving his reputation. For the better observing of our duty herein, it will not be amiss, to recommend the advice of St. Paul, study to be quiet, and do your own business. Now, study implies an earnest attention of mind, accompanied with diligent inquiry and endeavours after something; and the apostle making quietness a matter of study, shews the excellency of it, and that it is worth studying to attain it. That it is worth our study, the many benefits we reap from peace, and the various miseries that flow from contention, may easily satisfy us. And if we would preserve each other's good name, let us mind our own business, and not intermeddle with other men's; for they who thrust themselves into other people's concerns, generally make bold with their reputation, assuming all wisdom to themselves, and scarce allowing others enough to understand or manage their own affairs. Hence the apostle joins busy-bodies and tattlers together; adding, that they wander about from house to house not only idle, but tattlers, and speaking what they ought not. To conclude then this commandment, we are here directed to avoid all unjust ways of lessening or detracting from the honour or reputation of our neighbour, which is bearing false witness against him; and likewise to do all the right and service we lawfully can to his good name, which is bearing true testimony to and for him.

SERMON XLVII.

By Dr. HOLE.

The Tenth Commandment.

Exod. xx. 17.

Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's house, thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's wife, nor his man servant, nor his maid servant, nor his ox, nor his ass, nor any thing that is thy neighbour's.

THESE words contain the tenth and last commandment in the decalogue: the design whereof is to regulate the inward thoughts and desires of the heart, and to keep them from all unlawful lustings or coveting what is another's. The former precepts expressly relate to the outward man, restraining the external acts of violence and injustice; but this extends to the inward man, putting a check to all secret unlawful desires, though they never come into act, and refining the heart, which is the spring of all evil, from all unjust inclinations; for out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witnesses, blasphemies. Indeed, all the laws of God are spiritual, for they reach and affect the heart; and therefore our Saviour in expounding the commandments declares, that all internal motions to sin are prohibited, as well as the outward acts.

God in this commandment expressly arraigns the thoughts, and condemns the very intention of our hearts, towards what is evil; thou shalt not covet. He requires us not to deprive our neighbour of his right, nor even to wish or desire it; and to abstain, not only from all unjust actions, but from all covetous inclinations. For this law forbids the sin of covetousness, or an inordinate lusting after, or desiring what belongs to another. There may be an honest and regular desire of others' goods, when confined to just and lawful means of obtaining it; since without this, there can be no traffick or commerce. None will buy or purchase any thing of another, unless he has a mind thereto; trade and commerce depend on the liking and desiring one another's goods. But then there are besides irregular desires, whereby men covet the goods of others, and would unjustly obtain them; and such are gross violations of the commandment. Some things of our neighbour's cannot lawfully be parted with, others not without great loss, inconveniences, or reluctance; in such cases, to desire our neighbour's goods, is an evil covetousness; and which leads me to consider the several objects of concupiscence mentioned in this command.

We are forbidden to covet our neighbour's house; that is, not only his habitation, but whatever he is rightfully possessed of; these he ought quietly to enjoy, without any secret wishes or desires of ours after them. It was Ahab's sin to covet Naboth's vineyard; and we shall be as guilty to covet our neighbour's house, or farm, unless in an honest way, when the owner is willing legally to part with them, on terms that are just and right. We are forbidden to covet our neighbour's wife, because this should not be; for whom God hath joined together, let no man put asunder. No consent of parties can dissolve the bonds of wedlock, or violate the laws of chastity; and therefore all such desires must be sinful; for they being made one by mutual agreement and God's institution, their hearts must not stray from each other, nor others run towards them. To covet or withdraw the affection of either is a manifest breach of the laws of God and nature. We are forbidden to covet our neighbour's servant, whether man or maid; for these are part of our neighbour's goods, made so by mutual covenant and promise; and by the laws of God and man, he hath a right to their labour and service, which none may lawfully desire or deprive him of. Indeed, a master and servant may lawfully part by consent, or he may remove an idle unfaithful servant, and then they are free to any other; but none may secretly wish for entice, or seduce another's servant, for this is a breach of justice and charity, and creates difference among neighbours. This is to do to another what we should not like to be done to us, and is very contrary to that love and kindness we are forbidden to bear to one another. We are forbidden to covet our neighbour's ox or ass; that is, any of his cattle, flock, or these things our neighbour has so just a property as may not be invaded so much as by a wish, for then it possibly would go farther; coveting will lead to pilfering and embezzle; for next to desiring is defrauding; and therefore this commandment checks the first motions and tendencies to such evil; for it calls our not only against robbing and stealing our neighbour's cattle, but forbids all thoughts and desires leading thereto: may, so far from coveting or hurting his cattle, we are to save and succour them in all their wanderings; for our Saviour's commands, that if our neighbour's ox or ass fall into a pit, we should help him out, and if he goes astray, to bring him home. Lastly, We are forbid to covet any thing that is our neighbour's; the forcings of weight and command relates to that we might not consequence; and that we might not think ourselves at liberty to desire the smallest matters belonging to our neighbour, it is added, for any thing that is his. Some therefore are, who will own it unjust and unreasonableness to covet another's house, wife, servant or cattle, and yet think a little corn, grass, wood, or apples, such trifles as not to be minded; and so are apt to indulge, not only their hearts in coveting, but also their hands in purloining of them. But this commandment corrects all such mistakes, by us not to covet any thing that requiring our neighbour's, he having an equal is our neighbour's, small as well as greater matters; right to that which violates God's authority in and he will soon do it in the other; for the one by using to pilfer in little trifles, many proceeded to things of greater value; which should make men avoid the beginnings of this vice, and not to meddle with their neighbour's property in the lowest matters. Thus I have shewn the sin forbidden in this commandment.

But it must be remembered, as before observed, that all the motives and inducements to any sin are also prohibited with the sin itself: and we shall find many evils condemned by this law, leading to the great sin of covetousness. As first, discontent with our present condition is forbidden in this commandment, as an occasion of coveting; for he that likes not his own circumstances, will covet what he should not; and thinking he hath not enough, will be ever uneasy and desirous of more. Discontent deprives men of the comfort of what they enjoy : Ahab could take no pleasure in the glory and greatness of a kingdom whilst he coveted Naboth's vineyard ; for he came to his house heavy and displeased, he laid him down on his bed, turned away his face, and would eat no bread. This folly leads men to fraud and injustice. The apostle declares, that they who being uneasy at their present fortunes do covet to be rich, fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful lusts, that draw them in destruction and perdition. Discontent with our condition, says the wise man, frets the heart against the Lord ; as if he dealt hardly with them, and denied to give what they desired or deserved. It makes them find fault with the dispensations of divine providence, as thinking other men's lot better than theirs ; and which leads first to coveting, and then purloining what is another's. Envy is another sin forbidden in this commandment, as an occasion of this evil concupiscence. This is an effect of the former, and naturally leads to covetousness. For he that is discontented with his own condition, will envy others ; and that naturally begets inordinate desires and hankerings after it. This sin offers great indignity to God, for it will not allow him to dispose of his own blessings. The envious person would have things ordered, not by the wisdom of the divine will, but his own fancy and humour : he would be the sole carver of his own and other men's fortunes, and therefore grudges and murmurs if any have more than he thinks proper ; which is a great affront to the wisdom and authority of our Maker. It is also highly injustice to our neighbour to covet what is his, and repine at his prosperity, when we ought to rejoice thereat : nor is it a small injury to a man's self, for it destroys the peace and tranquillity of his mind, and deprives him of all the comfort he might reap from the prosperity of others ; this envious coveting of another's property, serving only to fret and gall his mind, to weaken his body, and bring leanness and rottenness into his bones. Another occasion of coveting here forbidden is an immoderate care and anxious solicitude for the things of this life ; for which reason our Saviour gives a strict caution against it ; says he, take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat or what ye shall drink ; nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on : Is not the life more than meat, and the body than raiment ? Not that our Saviour here condemns all prudent moderate care about earthly things, nor requires us to cast off all thoughts and concern for our body ; we being commanded to provide things honest in the sight of all men, and not to be slothful, but diligent in our business. But our Saviour's charge is, not to give way to any anxious, perplexing, or solicitous cares about these things ; such as to distrust God's providence, or to put men upon inordinate desires and endeavours after what is not their own ; for these destroy property, disturb the peace and order of the world, violate the laws of God, and bring destruction to the souls of men ; and therefore our Saviour uses many arguments, whereby to cure such carking and immoderate cares.

For he sends us to the fowls of the air, and the beasts of the field, who sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns, and yet our heavenly Father feedeth them ; and are we not much better than they ? To check all solicitous thoughts about meat and drink, he minds us of the provision made for all inferior creatures ; how he feeds the ravens, and will not suffer a sparrow to fall to the ground ; and can we think he will starve his own children ? To cure all anxious cares about raiment, he sends us to the lilies of the field, to consider how they grow, they toil not, neither do they spin ; and yet, says he, Solomon in all his glory, was not arrayed like one of these : and if God so clothe the grass of the field that to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall he not much more clothe us ? Lastly, He shews the vanity of all such carking and distrustful cares, which can neither add one cubit to our stature, nor one grain to our estate without God's blessing ; which will sooner be obtained by a devout dependance on his providence, than by all the anxious and indirect arts of our own contrivance. These, together with idleness and pride, are the principal motives and occasions of that sinful concupiscence condemned in this commandment, which we must carefully watch against, as the enemies of our souls, and the obstacles of our salvation. In a word, let us subdue the first motions of discontent, envy, and ambition, which will otherwise betray us into greater evils; for by suffering our hearts to evert, we let loose our hands to picking and stealing, and shall thereby incur the miseries and punishments both of this life and the next.

Having considered the negative part of this commandment, which forbids all coveting or desiring what belongs to others, I shall now proceed to the affirmative part of it, which instructs us in what is required; namely, contentment with our own condition; according to the apostle, let your conversation be without covetousness, and be content with such things as ye have. In treating of this great duty, I will shew the nature of contentment; the reasonableness of it; and lastly, propose some directions for attaining it.—Contentment is such a satisfaction of mind in any condition, as to be easy to one's self and others. True contentment springs from the mind; it arises not from the abundance of outward things, which often brings disquiet, but from the inward frame and disposition of the soul, that thankfully enjoys, and prudently acquiesces, in whatever portion is allotted. Therefore St. Paul declares, that he coveted no man's silver, or gold, or apparel; but had learned to be content with his own estate. Indeed, with any estate that should happen to him; for he knew how to be abased, as well as how to abound; both to be full and to be hungry, to abound and suffer need. Contentment is such a well-pleasedness with our condition, as to render us easy to ourselves. The good man, saith Solomon, shall be satisfied from himself. He hath such a spring of joy and peace from within, as keeps him from murmuring and repining, and makes him cheerfully to receive whatever God is pleased to allot him. And the good effect of this virtue not only renders him easy to himself, but to all others; for contentment preserves us from all the evil effects of envy, and makes us rather to rejoice than repine at another's prosperity.

But the reasonableness of this virtue of contentment will more plainly appear, if we consider, that whatever our state and condition may be, yet it is allotted by God, the sovereign disposer of all things, from whose bounty flows all that we receive. The earth is the Lord's, and the fullness thereof, which he bestows on the sons of men as he thinks fit. We are debtors to him for our very being; we are made by his power, and daily supported by his providence for in him we live, move, and have our being; so that we ought rather to be contented and thankful for what we have, than murmur and complain for what we want. And as we can claim nothing as our due, neither can we challenge any thing as our desert; for we are less than the least of all God's mercies, and can merit nothing at his hands. We should therefore be content, and receive with gratitude what we have. And if to the sovereign right and title of Almighty God, we add the consideration of his wisdom and goodness, we shall see far greater reason to be content with our portion; for what we have is allotted us by an all-wise and gracious hand, who knows what is better for us than we can do for ourselves. We often wish and long for those things that will do us more harm than good. But God in his wisdom best knows what is proper and fit for us, and dispenses his goodness to us in such proportion, as most tends to promote our welfare; and therefore we ought, in point of interest, as well as conscience, humbly and thankfully to acquiesce in what he orders: for to be dissatisfied with our condition, is, in effect, to prefer our judgment to his, and to think ourselves wiser than God. And to be displeased with his allotment, is the ready way to forfeit our Maker's favour, and provoke him to recall what we have, instead of giving more. Besides, there is a peculiar happiness attending contentment; for a contented mind is always easy: it creates a constant, calm, an undisturbed tranquillity within; but discontent and envy disquiet the mind, and raise a perpetual storm in the hearts of men. Content is true happiness, the blest estate of heaven, the joy of glorified saints, and of the spirits of just men made perfect; who are not only pleased with their own joys and blessedness, but delighted with those of others : but discontent and envy are the passions and torment of wicked spirits, whose own uneasiness, like so many furies, makes them tear and devour one another.

Lastly, I shall prescribe some rules for the better attaining this excellent art of contentment. And as this useful virtue is seated chiefly in the mind, we must begin there, and endeavour to bring our minds to our condition. The reason why so few attain this art is, because they take not the right method. Men are solicitous enough to bring their estates to their minds, which, being too large to be satisfied with earthly things, is a vain attempt ; for he that loveth silver shall not be satisfied with silver, nor he that loveth abundance with increase. But to act rightly, we must labour to bring our minds to our estate, and to rest satisfied with whatever the divine wisdom and goodness allots for us, which better knows what is fit for us, than we can do for ourselves. Again, in order to be content with our condition, we should consider that all earthly things are insufficient to make us happy. Some weakly imagine, that if they could arrive to such an estate, or attain such a degree of honour, dignity, and preferment in this world, they should then be so happy as to be satisfied without seeking or desiring more ; and yet when they have obtained their wish, they find their cares and troubles greater, and themselves more uneasy than before ; and therefore, Cynæas the philosopher wisely told Pyrrhus, on his informing him of the designs he had on Rome, Sicily, and Carthage, that if he could not be content with his own kingdom, neither would he be satisfied with the whole world. Indeed such things will not satisfy us, for they rather increase than allay the thirst of the soul. So that let the world flow ever so much upon us, our desires will run faster and exceed them. Wherefore it will be our wisdom to fix our affections on higher and better

To learn this lesson of contentment, we must subdue all pride and haughtiness of mind, for he that is highly opinionated will think he hath not what he deserves ; this will make him repine, desire more, and envy others : but he that has humble thoughts of himself, will be thankful and content with any thing. We must also be diligently employed in that business and calling wherein God hath placed us, for that will secure his blessing on our endeavours, and bring us content. The blessing of God (saith Solomon) maketh rich, and bringeth no sorrow, with it. He who hath that, is rich in any condition, and doth not want a competency. It is idleness that occasions want, covetous, and envious thoughts, which industry chases away, and leaves no room for. We must also take care to live within the bounds of our estate ; for he that exceeds it, will contract debts that unavoidably lead to danger and discontent. Frugality, temperance, and honesty are excellent helps to contentment, there being a blessing annexed to these things, which brings peace to the mind, and prosperity to our affairs ; but extravagancy and dishonesty are ever attended with a curse, which disquiets the mind, diminishes the substance, and lays a foundation for misery and trouble. Again, if we would get and preserve a contented mind, we must more observe those who are below, than such as are above us ; for the splendour of greatness is apt to dazzle the eye, to create envy and discontent. He that too much admires the wealth, honour, and power of another, will be easily induced to envy their happiness, and be discontented with his own condition ; but if he looks below him, and considers how many want what he enjoys, this will teach him to be content and thankful for his own allotment. Nature is content with a little : he that lives by the necessities of nature is easily supplied ; but he that feeds a carnal and sensual appetite, multiplies his wants, and makes artificial necessities, which drive away contentment. Lastly, To acquire the grace of contentment, we must learn to fix our trust and dependence on God, who hath promised never to leave nor forsake us. He alone is able to satisfy the cravings of our souls, to supply the wants and necessities of our bodies. All other things leave us when we most need them : they are of no use in time of sickness, the hour of death, or day of judgment ; and therefore, let us not trust in uncertain riches, but in the living God, who giveth us all things richly to enjoy.

Thus I have shewn what is required and forbidden in this and the other commandments; and the wise man's conclusion of the whole matter is, fear God and keep his commandments, for this is the whole duty of man; and which our Saviour hath comprised in the love of God and our neighbour.

The fear of God will restrain us from having any other Gods besides, or before him; which is the first commandment. He that hath this holy awe and reverence for the divine majesty, will dread to offend him; either by the guilt of atheism, idolatry, or worshipping any rival deities. The sense of his power and greatness, as our Lord and Master, will make us to honour and serve him only. The fear of God will keep us from worshipping him contrary to his word and will, as by images or pictures, which is the thing forbidden in the second commandment. He that truly fears God, will not worship the creature instead of the Creator, much less give his glory to graven images. The sense of God's jealousy of a rival, and the vengeance he hath denounced against such and their posterity, should teach us to worship God, as he hath commanded, in spirit and in truth. The fear of God will keep men from profaning his sacred name, and beget a veneration for it, which is the substance of the third commandment. The want of this holy fear and reverence is what makes men venture so boldly to take God's name in vain, by rash and false swearing; to invade his property by sacrilege, to despise his ministers, and detain their maintenance from them; to pollute his sanctuary by profaneness, and to think meanly of persons, places, and things, dedicated to his name: but did we stand in awe of God as we ought, we should not dare to sin thus against him. Did we truly believe, the Lord will not hold them guiltless that thus take his name in vain, we should more honour his holy name, and avoid detracting from it. Lastly, The fear of God will make us remember to keep holy the sabbath-day, and to have a due regard to the times set apart and devoted to his service, which is required by the fourth commandment. If we fear God, we shall not profane those days by working at our calling, much less by following the works of sin; but rather conscientiously rest from all our labours, the better to attend God's worship, and the exercises of religion: especially considering the liberal allowance God hath given us, of six days in the week for our use, and reserving only one in seven for his own service. And surely he that hath any fear of God, or honour for him, will be afraid and ashamed to deny him this. Thus we see how the fear of God runs through the first table of the law, and at once comprizes and enforces the duties we owe to God.

The next thing to be considered is, the duties we owe our neighbour, contained in the commandments of the second table, which are only performed by keeping of them. By observing the fifth commandment, we discharge our duty to all our superiors; which is to honour our parents, both natural and civil, and to obey those that are set over us in church and state; to which we are encouraged by the promise of long life here, and eternal bliss hereafter. By keeping the sixth commandment, we perform the duty we owe to one another's lives, and the body and soul of both; which is to take the best care we can of the health, safety, and welfare of each, and avoid maiming, murdering, and destroying of either. By observing the seventh commandment, we discharge the duty we owe to our neighbour's wife; we abstain from all uncleanness in thought, word, and deed; and keep our vessels in sanctification and honour; we preserve a pure and inviolable chastity, and are thereby true to our marriage vows and promises. By observing the eighth commandment, we perform the duty we owe to our neighbour's goods and substance; which is not to steal, take away, or withhold his right from him; and not to over-reach him by any methods of fraud or deceit, nor lessen his substance by robbery or oppression; but to use our best endeavours to preserve, promote, and advance his prosperity. By keeping the ninth commandment, we discharge the duty we owe to the credit and good name of our neighbour; which is, not to blast it, by bearing false witness, lying, slander, and detraction.

nor to undermine it by secret whispering, tale-bearing, and backbiting: but as much as possible to silence all vilifying and detracting language of other men: to vindicate every one from unjust aspersions, and endeavour to preserve the reputation of others. Lastly, By the tenth commandment we are restrained from all unjust covetous desires, and from indirectly obtaining what belongs to our neighbours; and are thereby taught to be content with what is truly and honestly ours, and willing that all others should also enjoy what is their right and property. Thus, as our duty to God is included in the fear of him, so our duty to our neighbour is contained in keeping the commandments; which two things are so full and comprehensive that the wise man calls them, the whole of man.

For this is the whole duty, end, and happiness of man. This is the whole work and business incumbent on man, and about which we are to employ ourselves in this world; not that we are to neglect the duties of our calling, and to have our minds always on religion; but that we must make it our main and chief business, and prefer it above all other. To fear God, and keep his commandments, is a matter of universal concern to all men, none are exempted; this being the whole duty or principal business that belongs to every man. This is the end of man; for God gave him faculties above other creatures, that he should honour, fear, and obey him. He is not distinguished from brute beasts so much by reason, as by religion and the fear of God; so that this is the whole essence and end of man: and to fear God and keep his commandments will qualify and prepare us for happiness, and secure to us our future bliss. It will raise our natures to their highest perfection, and conform us to the divine nature, which nothing but the practice of religion and virtue can do. So that this is the whole work and business, the end and design, the interest and happiness, of man; all which are so many powerful arguments to persuade us to the practice of it.

From what hath been said, let us learn to live always in the fear of God, and that will keep us to our duty: let us this meditate on the infinite power of God, which is able to punish all offences, for if we set him always before us, we shall never do evil: let us not fear men whose power can reach no farther than the body or goods, but fear him who can destroy both body and soul in hell: let us consider and reflect on his impartial justice, and frequently have in remembrance his infinite mercy, that we may fear the Lord for his name, and dread to offend his justice: let us live in constant obedience to his commands, then shall we perform our duty to our neighbour, and thereby keep a conscience void of offence, both towards God and man. For what doth the Lord our God require of us, but to fear and serve him, to walk in his ways, and keep his commandments? for this is the whole of man; always remembering that God will bring every work to judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good or evil.

SERMON XLVIII.

By BISHOP HORSLEY.

The Observance of the Sabbath.

MARK, ii. 27.

The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath.

THE two opposite characters of the hypocrite and the profane are in no part of their conduct more conspicuously distinguished, than by the opposite errors which they seem to adopt concerning the degree of attention due to the positive institutions of religion, whether of human or Divine appointment. Under the name of positive institutions, we comprehend all those impositions and restraints, which not being suggested to any man by his conscience, and having no necessary and natural connexion with the dictates of that internal monitor, seem to have no importance but what they may derive from the will of a superior who prescribes them. Of this sort, as far as we at present understand it, was the prohibition laid upon our first parents in paradise—the prohibition of the use of blood for food, after the giving the rite of circumcision in Abraham's family—the whole of the Mosaic ritual—the sacraments of the Christian church—the institution of the Sabbath—and, besides these, all ceremonies of worship whatsoever of human appointment. All these things come under the notion of positive institutions; for although the expediency of things of the kind, in the several successive ages of the world, is sufficiently apparent, yet the particular merit of the special acts enjoined, for which they might be preferable to other acts which might have been devised for the same purpose, is perhaps in none of the instances alleged very easy to be discovered. That men should assemble at stated seasons for the public worship of God, all must perceive to be a duty who acknowledge that a creature endowed with the high faculties of reason and intelligence owes to his Maker public expressions of homage and adoration; But that the assembly should recur every seventh rather than every sixth or every eighth day, no natural sanctity of the seventh more than of the sixth or eighth persuades. That Christians, in their public assemblies, should commemorate that death by which death was overcome, and the gate of everlasting life set open to the true believer, no one who pretends to a just sense of the benefit received and the sharpness of the pain endured will dare to question: But the particular sanctity of the rite in use proceeds solely from our Lord's appointment. The same may be said of baptism. A rite by which new converts should be admitted into the church, and the children of Christian parents from their earliest infancy devoted to Christ's service in their riper age, is of evident propriety: But our Lord's solemn injunction of its constant use constitutes the particular sanctity of that which is employed. The like observations applied with equal force, in ancient times, to the particulars of the Mosaic service—to the rite of circumcision—to the prohibition of the use of blood—and to the abstinence from the fruit of a particular tree, exacted of Adam in paradise, for no other purpose perhaps but as a test of his obedience; and they are still applicable with much greater force to all ceremonies of worship appointed in any national church by the authority of its rulers. The fact is, that all ceremonies are actions, which, by a solemn appropriation of them to particular occasions, are understood to denote or are made use of to produce certain dispositions of the mind towards God: They acquire their meaning merely from the institution; and the necessity of making a choice of some one out of a variety of acts which naturally might be equally significant and equally fit to be made subservient to the intended purpose, will always produce, even in the ordinances of Divine appointment, an appearance at least of something arbitrary in the institution. Hence it will of necessity come to pass, that these ordinances will be very differently regarded by different men, according as the particular cast of each man's temper and disposition—his natural turn to seriousness or gayety—his acquired habits of sincerity or dissimulation—render either the importance of the general end, or what there may seem to be of arbitrary authority in the particular institution, the object most apt to seize upon his attention; according as he is disposed to be scrupulous in his duty, or impatient of restraint—fair and open in his actions, or accustomed to seek his private ends in the fair show and semblance of a ready and exact submission to authority. With the hypocrite, therefore, the whole of the practical part of religion will consist in an ostentatious rigour in the observance of its positive precepts. With that thoughtless tribe which constitutes, it is to be feared, the far greater proportion of mankind,—those who, without any settled principles of positive infidelity, and without any strong propensities to the excesses of debauchery, find, however, their whole occupation in the cares and what may seem the innocent amusements of the world; and defer the consideration of the future life till they find the present drawing to a close,—with persons of this disposition, the duties of which I speak are for the most part totally neglected; insomuch, that an affected assiduity in the discharge of the positive precepts of religion on the one hand, and the neglect of them on the other, may be considered as the discriminating symptoms of the two opposite vices of hypocrisy and profaneness: For the name of profaneness, you will observe, in strict propriety of speech belongs not only to the flagrant and avowed impiety of the atheist and libertine, but to the conduct of him who, without any thing notoriously reprehensible in his morals—any thing to make him shunned and disliked by his neighbours and acquaintances, lives, however, without any habitual fear of God and sense of religion upon his mind.

The Mosaic law, as it was planned by unerring wisdom, was unquestionably admirably well contrived for the great purposes for which it was intended,—to maintain the knowledge of the true God among a particular people, and to cherish an opinion of the necessity of an expiatory sacrifice for involuntary offences, till the season should arrive for the general revelation. Nor is it to be supposed that it failed of the purpose for which it was so well contrived: The highest examples of consummate virtue and heroic piety which the ancient world knew were formed in that people, under the discipline of their holy law. Nevertheless, the great stress laid upon ceremonial observances had, notwithstanding the continual remonstrances of the prophets—not from any defect in the law itself, but from the corruption of human nature—it had at least an ill effect upon the manners of the people. Notwithstanding the eminent instances of virtue and piety which from time to time arose among them—of virtue and piety of which faith alone in the revelation which they enjoyed might be a sufficient foundation,—yet if we look to the national character, especially in the later ages of the Jewish state, we shall find that it was rank hypocrisy, such as justifies what is said of them by a learned writer, that they were at the same time the most religious and the most profligate people upon the earth,—the most religious in the hypocrite's religion—the most regardless of what their own law taught them to be more than all whole burnt-offerings and sacrifices.

Strange as the assertion may seem, this depravity of the Jewish people, the effect as has been observed of an abuse of their divine law, was favourable (so active is the merciful providence of God to bring good out of evil),—this ill effect of the abuse of the divine law was favourable to that great end to which the law tended, the introduction of an universal revelation for the general reformation of the manners of mankind. It was favourable to this end, because it was favourable to our Saviour's method of instruction. Our Saviour's method of instruction was not by delivering a system of morality in which the formal nature of the moral good should be traced to the original idea of the seemly and the fair—the foundations of our duty discovered in the natural relations of things, and the importance of every particular duty demonstrated by its connexion with the general happiness. This was not his method of instruction, because he well knew how long it had been followed with little effect; for, abstruse speculations, whatever they may have at the bottom of solidity and truth, suit not the capacities of the many, and influence the hearts of none. The method of instruction which he chose was to throw out general maxims respecting the different branches of human duty, as often as in the course of an unreserved intercourse with persons of all ranks, characters, and conditions, he found occasion either to reprove the errors and enormities which fell under his observation, or to vindicate his own conduct and that of his disciples when either was unjustly arraigned by the hypocrites of the times. Had the manners of his contemporaries been less reprehensible, or their hypocrisy less rigid and censorious, the occasions of instruction by reproof and apology would have less frequently occurred. It was an accusation of his disciples as profaners of the Sabbath, when they took the liberty to satisfy their hunger with the ripe ears of standing corn, which they plucked as they chanced to cross a corn-field on the Sabbath day, which drew from him that admirable maxim which I have chosen for my text:—a maxim which, rightly understood, may be applied to all the positive precepts of religion no less than to the Sabbath, and clearly settles the degree of attention that is due to them; inasmuch, that whoever will keep this maxim in its right sense constantly in view, will with certainty avoid the two extremes of an unnecessary rigour in the observance of these secondary duties on the one hand, and a profane neglect of them on the other.

After all that can be said, and said with truth, about the immutable distinctions of right and wrong, and the eternal fitness of things, it should seem that the will of God is the true foundation of moral obligation; for I cannot understand that any man's bare perception of the natural seemliness of one action and unseemliness of another should bring him under an obligation upon all occasions to do the one and to avoid the other, at the hazard of his life, to the detriment of his fortune, or even to the diminution of his own ease, which suffers diminution more or less in every instance in which he lays a constraint upon his own inclination. I say I cannot understand how the bare perception of good in actions of one sort, or of evil in actions of another, should create such an obligation, that a man, if he were not accountable to a superior for the conduct of his life, should yet be criminal, if, in view of his own happiness or ease, he should sometimes think proper to omit the action which he admires, or to do that which he disapproves. No such obligation therefore arising from the mere intuitive perception of the differences of right and wrong, it follows that notwithstanding the reality of those differences, and the incommutable nature of the two things, still the obligation upon man to act in conformity to these perceptions arises from the will of God, who enjoins a conformity of our conduct to these natural apprehensions of our minds, and binds the obligation by assurances that what we lose of present gratification shall be amply compensated in a future retribution, and by threatening the disobedient with heavier ills than the restraints of self-denial, or the loss of life. But if this be the case, that the will of God is the sole foundation of man's duty, it should seem that the distinction which is usually made between the great natural duties of justice and sobriety—all, in short, that are included in the general topics of the love of God and man,—it should seem that the distinction between these and the positive precepts of religion is imaginary, so far at least as the distinction regards positive precepts of divine appointment; it should seem that all duties, natural and positive, are, upon this principle, of the same value and importance,—that, by consequence, all crimes are equal, and that a wilful unnecessary absence from the assemblies of the Seventh day, or from the Lord's table, is a crime of no less guilt than theft or murder.

The highest authority hath decided otherwise, and hath established the distinction. Our Lord told his disciples, that "unless their righteousness should exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, they should in no wise enter into the kingdom of heaven,"—that is, unless it should be a righteousness of a higher kind; for, in the sort of righteousness which they practised, the scribes and Pharisees were not easily to be out-done. He recommended to them two things very contrary to the hypocrite's religion, secrecy and brevity in their devotions. He seemed industriously to seek occasions of doing those good actions on the Sabbath day, which, to those who understood not how the principle and the end sanctified these works of mercy, seemed a violation of the institution: And it was in justification of an action in which no such merit could be pretended—an action done by some of his followers, perhaps without much consideration, to appease the cravings of a keen appetite—that he alleged the maxim in the text, "that the Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath;" a maxim which, at the same time that it establishes in the most peremptory terms the distinction between natural duties and positive institutions, defines with the greatest precision and perspicuity in what the difference consists, and as little justifies the wilful neglect of the ordinances of religion as it countenances an hypocritical formality in the performance, or a superstitious reliance on the merit of them.

Although the obligation upon man to a discharge of any duty arises, as I have observed, from the sole will of God, yet, in the great duties of justice and charity in our dealings with men,—of mildness to our inferiors, courtesy to our equals, and submission to our governors—of sobriety and temperance in their reflections of the body; and of moderation in the pleasures which belong to the animal life, in all these we can discern a natural fitness and propriety immutably inherent in the things themselves; insomuch that any rational being, once placed in a situation to be superior to the influence of external motives, and to be determined in his conduct by the sole approbation of his own mind, must always delight in them; and though occasions may arise which may render a contrary conduct useful to the individual, yet no occasions can arise which may render it so lovely and laudable. Now, although this natural fitness and propriety be not the origin of moral obligation among men, yet it is indeed a higher principle; for it is that from which that will of God himself originates by which the natural discernment of our conscience acquires the force of a law for the regulation of our lives. Of these duties of inherent and immutable propriety it were not true to say that they are made for man: But what is denied of positive institutions is true of these, that man was made for them. They are analogous to the moral attributes of the Deity himself. The more that any man is fixed in the habitual love and practice of them, the more the image of God in that man is perfected. The perfection of these moral attributes is the foundation of the necessity of God's own existence; and if the enjoyment and display of them is (if the expression may be allowed) the end and purpose to which God himself exists, the humble imitation of these Divine perfections is the end and purpose for which men and angels were created.

We discern, therefore, in these natural duties, that intrinsic worth and seemliness which is the motive that determines the Divine will to exact the performance of them from the rational part of his creation for God's will is not arbitrary, but directed by his goodness and his wisdom. To go a step higher, the natural excellence of these duties, we may reasonably presume, was the original motive which determined the Deity to create beings who should be capable of being brought to that dignity of character which a proficiency in virtue confers, and of enjoying, in their improved state of moral worth, a corresponding happiness.

But in the positive institutions of religion we discern nothing of inherent excellence. They evidently make a part of the discipline only of our present state, by which creatures in their first state of imperfection, weak in intellect and strong in passion, might be trained to the habit of those virtues which are in themselves valuable, and, by the fear of God thus artificially as it were impressed upon their minds, be rendered in the end superior to temptation. They are therefore as it were but a secondary part of the will of God; and the rank which they hold as objects of God's will, the same they must hold as branches of man's obedience. They are no otherwise pleasing to God, than as they are beneficial to man, by enlivening the flame of genuine religion in his bosom. Man therefore was not made for these; but these were made for man. To commemorate the creation of the universe by certain ceremonies in public assemblies on the Seventh day, though a noble and a salutary employment of our time, is not, however, the principal business for which man was created; nor is the commemoration of our Redeemer's death, by any external rite, the principal end and business of the Christian's calling: But the observation of the Sabbath with certain ceremonies in public assemblies, and the commemoration of our Lord's death in the eucharist, were appointed as means of cherishing in the heart of man a more serious and interested attention to those duties which are the real end and purpose of his existence, and the peculiar service which the Christian owes his Lord, who bought him with his blood. And thus we see the distinction between the primary duties and the positive precepts of religion. The practice of the first is the very end for which man was originally created, and, after the ruin of his fall, redeemed: The other are means appointed to facilitate and secure the attainment of the end. In themselves they are of no value: insomuch, that a scrupulous attention to these secondary duties, when the great end of them is wilfully neglected, will but aggravate the guilt of an immoral life. Man was not made for these.

But, on the other hand, it demands our serious attention, that it is declared by the very same authority that they were made for him. They are not mere arbitrary appointments, of no meaning or significance; they are not useless exactions of human power, contrived only to display the authority of the master and to imbitter the subjection of the slave. They were made for man: They were appointed for the salutary influence which the Maker of man foresees they are likely to have upon his life and conduct. To live in the wilful neglect of them is to neglect the means which Infinite Wisdom hath condescended to provide for the security of our future condition. The consequence naturally to be expected is that which is always seen to ensue,—a total profligacy of manners, hardness of heart, and contempt for God's word and commandment.

Having thus shown the true distinction between the primary duties and the positive precepts of religion, I shall in some future discourses proceed to the particular subject which the text more especially suggests, and inquire what the reverence may be due to the Sabbath under the Christian dispensation; which I shall prove to be much more than it is generally understood to be, if the principles of men are to be inferred from their practice.

SERMON XLIX.

By BISHOP HORSLEY.

The Observance of the Sabbath.

MARK, ii. 27.

The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath.

WHAT is affirmed of the Sabbath in these remarkable words is equally true of all the ordinances of external worship. The maxim therefore is general; and, at the same time that it establishes a distinction between the primary duties and the positive institutions of religion, it clearly defines the circumstance in which the difference consists. Of the positive institutions of religion, even of those of Divine appointment, whatever sanctity may be derived to them from the will of God, which is indeed the supreme rule and proper foundation of human duty,—whatever importance may belong to them as necessary means for the attainment of the noblest end, the improvement of man's moral character, and the consequent advancement of his happiness,—yet we have our Lord's authority to say, that the observance of them is not itself the end for which man was created: Man was not made for these. Of natural duties we affirm the contrary; The acquisition of that virtue which consists in the habitual love and practice of them is the very final cause of man's existence. The intrinsic worth and seemliness of that virtue is so great, that it may be presumed to be the motive which determined the will of God to create beings with capacities for the attainment. These therefore are the things for which man was made: They were not made for him. They derive not their importance from a temporary subserviency to the interests of man in his present condition—to the happiness and preservation of the individual or of the kind. They are no part of an arbitrary discipline, contrived, after man was formed, for the trial and exercise of his obedience. Their worth is in the things themselves. In authority, they are higher than law—in time, older than creation—in worth, more valuable than the universe. The positive precepts of religion, on the contrary, are of the nature of political institutions, which are good or bad in relation only to the interests of particular communities. These therefore were made for man. And although man hath no authority to give himself a general dispensation from any law which hath the sanction of his Maker's will, yet, since God hath given him faculties to distinguish between things for which he is made and things which are made for him, it is every man's duty, in the application of God's general laws to his own conduct on particular occasions, to attend to this distinction. If, by an affected precision in the exercises of external devotion, while he disregards the great duties of morality, he thinks that he satisfies the end of his creation, if he sets sacrifice in competition with mercy, as the Jews did, when, under the pretence of rich offerings to the temple, they defrauded their parents in their old age of the support which was their due—and when they took advantage of the rigour with which their law enjoined the observance of the Sabbath to excuse themselves on that day from offices of charity, while they could dispense with the institution for the preservation of their own property,—whoever, after these examples, thinks to commute for natural duties by an exact observance of positive institutions, deceives himself, and offers the highest indignity to God, in believing or affecting to believe that he will judge of the conduct of moral agents otherwise than according to the truth of things—that he will prefer the means to the end, the subordinate to the primary duties. On the other hand, the wilful neglect of the ordinances of religion, under a pretence of a general attention to the weightier matters of the law, argues either a criminal security or a profane indifference. No one, whatever pretensions he may make, can have a just sense of the importance and the difficulty of virtuous attainments, who in mere indolence desires to release himself from a discipline which may diminish the difficulty and insure the effect: Nor is it consistent with just apprehensions of the Divine wisdom, to suppose that the means which God hath appointed in subservience to any end may be neglected with impunity. A neglect, therefore of the ordinances of religion of Divine appointment, is the sure symptom of a criminal indifference about those higher duties by which men pretend to atone for the omission: It is too often found to be the beginning of a licentious life; and for the most part ends in the highest excesses of profligacy and irreligion.

Having thus taken occasion from the text to explain the comparative merit of natural duties and positive precepts,—and having shown the necessity of a reverent attention to the latter, as to means appointed by God for the security of virtue in its more essential parts,—I proceed to the inquiry which the text more immediately suggests—the sanctity of the Sabbath under the Christian dispensation. The libertinism of the times renders this inquiry important; and the spirit of refinement and disputation has rendered it in some degree obscure. I shall therefore divide it into its parts, and proceed by a slow and gradual disquisition. An opinion has been for some time gaining ground, that the observance of a Sabbath in the Christian church is a matter of mere consent and custom, to which we are no more obliged by virtue of any Divine precept than to any other ceremony of the Mosaic law. I shall first, therefore, show you, that Christians actually stand obliged to the observance of a Sabbath,—that is, to the separation of some certain day for the public worship of God; and I shall reply to what may be alleged with some colour of reason on the other side of the question. I shall, in the next place, inquire how far the Christian, in the observance of his Sabbath, is held to the original injunction of keeping every seventh day; and which day of the seven is his proper Sabbath. When I have shown you that the obligation to the observance of every seventh day actually remains upon him, and that the first day of the week is his proper Sabbath, I shall, in the last place, inquire in what manner this Christian Sabbath should be kept.

To the general question, What regard is due to the institution of a Sabbath under the Christian dispensation? the answer is plainly this,—Neither more nor less than was due to it in the patriarchal ages, before the Mosaic covenant took place. It is a gross mistake to consider the Sabbath as a mere festival of the Jewish church, deriving its whole sanctity from the Levitical law. The contrary appears, as well from the evidence of the fact, which sacred history affords, as from the reason of the thing, which the same history declares. The religious observance of the seventh day hath a place in the Decalogue among the very first duties of natural religion. The reason assigned for the injunction is general, and hath no relation or regard to the particular circumstances of the Israelites, or to the particular relation in which they stood to God as his chosen people. The creation of the world was an event equally interesting to the whole human race; and the acknowledgment of God as our Creator is a duty in all ages and in all countries, equally incumbent upon every individual of mankind. The terms in which the reason of the ordinance is assigned plainly describe it as an institution of an earlier age: "Therefore the Lord blessed the seventh, and set it apart." (That is the true import of the word "hallowed it.") These words, you will observe, express a past time. It is not said "Therefore the Lord now blesses the seventh day, and sets it apart;" but "Therefore he did bless it, and set it apart in time past; and he now requires that you his chosen people should be observant of that ancient institution." And in farther confirmation of the fact, we find, by the sixteenth chapter of Exodus, that the Israelites were acquainted with the Sabbath, and had been accustomed to some observance of it, before Moses received the tables of the law at Sinai. When the manna was first given for the nourishment of the army in the Wilderness, the people were told that on the sixth day they should collect the double of the daily portion. When the event was found to answer to the promise, Moses gave command that the redundant portion should be prepared and laid by for the meal of the succeeding day: "For tomorrow," said he, "is the rest of the holy Sabbath unto the Lord: On that day ye shall not find it in the field; for the Lord hath given you the Sabbath, therefore he giveth you on the sixth day the bread of two days." He mentions the Sabbath as a Divine ordinance, with which he evidently supposes the people were well acquainted; for he alleges the well-known sanctity of that day to account for the extraordinary quantity of manna which was found upon the ground on the day preceding it. But the appointment of the Sabbath, to which his words allude, must have been earlier than the appointment of it in the law, of which no part was yet given: For this first gathering of the manna, which is recorded in the sixteenth chapter of Exodus, was in the second month of the departure of the Israelites from Egypt; and at Sinai, where the law was given, they arrived not till the third. Indeed, the antiquity of the Sabbath was a thing to well understood among the Jews themselves, that some of their Rabbins had the vanity to pretend that an exact adherence to the observation of this day, under the severities of the Egyptian servitude, was the merit by which their ancestors procured a miraculous deliverance. The deliverance of the Israelites from the Egyptian bondage was surely an act of God's free mercy, in which their own merit had no share: Nor is it likely that their Egyptian lords left them much at liberty to sanctify the Sabbath, if they were inclined to do it. The tradition therefore is vain and groundless: But it clearly speaks the opinion of those among whom it passed, of the antiquity of the institution in question; which appears, indeed, upon better evidence, to have been coeval with the world itself: In the book of Genesis, the mention of this institution closes the history of the creation.

An institution of this antiquity and of this general importance could derive no part of its sanctity from the authority of the Mosaic law; and the abrogation of that law no more releases the worshippers of God from a rational observation of a Sabbath than it cancels the injunction of filial piety, or the prohibitions of theft and murder, adultery, calumny, and avarice. The worship of the Christian church is properly to be considered as a restoration of the patriarchal, in its primitive simplicity and purity;—and of the patriarchal worship the Sabbath was the noblest and perhaps the simplest rite.

Thus it should seem that Christians are clearly obliged to the observance of a Sabbath. But let us consider what may be alleged with any colour of reason on the other side. Now, it may be said that the argument which we have used for the perpetual sanctity of the Sabbath is of that sort which must go for nothing, because it proves too much: If the antiquity and the universality of the original institution be made the ground of a permanent obligation to the observance of it, it may seem a consequence, that the practice of the world, since the establishment of Christianity, must have been far more deficient than hath been been suspected; since, upon this principle, mankind, it may be said, should still be held to various ceremonies which for many ages have sunk into disuse. Circumcision, it is true, will not come within the question; for though four or perhaps six centuries older than the law, it was only a mark set upon a particular family. But the prohibition of the use of blood in food bore the same antiquity, it may be said, with respect to the second race of men, as the Sabbath with respect to the first. The prohibition of blood followed the deluge as closely as the Sabbath followed the creation: The one was no less general to all the sons of Noah than the other to all the sons of Adam. The use of animals at all for food is, only to be justified by the Creator's express permission; and since the exception of the blood of the animal accompanied the grant of the flesh, the prohibition, it may be said, unless it was at any time solemnly repealed, must be as general and as permanent as the licence. In the assembly of the apostles at Jerusalem, of which we read in the fifteenth chapter of the Acts, when the question was solemnly discussed concerning the obligation of the Jewish law upon the converts from the Gentiles, the prohibition of blood was one of three things specially reserved in the solemn act of repeal in which the deliberations of that council terminated. "It seemed good to the Holy Ghost and to us,"—these are the words of the apostolical rescript,—"it seemed good to the Holy Ghost and to us, to lay upon you no greater burden than these necessary things,—that ye abstain from meats offered to idols, and from blood, and from things strangled, and from fornication." It seemed good to the Holy Ghost and to the apostles to lay no other restraint upon the Gentile converts: But this restraint, of which an abstinence from blood made a part, it seemed good to the apostles, not to the apostles only, but to the Holy Ghost also, to lay; and they declare that they laid it on as a necessary thing: Whereas, in the same decree, which so remarkably reserves the abstinence from blood, the Sabbath is not at all reserved as a thing either of necessity or expedience. It should seem, therefore, it may be said, that the prohibition of blood was an ordinance of more lasting obligation than the Sabbath: The argument from antiquity and original generality applies with equal force to both; and the prohibition is enforced by the authority of the apostles, who mention no necessity of any observance of a Sabbath in the Christian Church. Upon what principle, then, is the sanctity of the Sabbath maintained by those who openly disregard the prohibition?

I must confess, that had the Sabbath been a rite of the Mosaic institution, or were any reason to be assigned for the prohibition of blood which might be of equal force in all ages, I should hold this argument unanswerable, and feel myself compelled to admit that the disregard of the Sabbath were a less crime than the use of blood: But, as the apostles assembled to consider whether the Gentile converts were to be holden to any part of the Jewish ritual, and if to any, to what part, it was beside their purpose to mention any thing that was not considered by those who consulted them as a branch of Judaism. Fornication, indeed, they mention; for it hath been owing to that refinement of sentiment which the Christian religion hath produced that this is at last understood to be a breach of natural morality. In the heathen world it was never thought to be a crime except it was accompanied with injury to a virgin's honour, or with violation of the marriage-bed. Abstinence in this instance was considered as a peculiarity of Judaism; and had it not been mentioned in the apostolical decree, the Gentile converts would not have been very ready to discern that the prohibition of this crime is included in the seventh commandment. But with regard to the Sabbath, although it was gone into disuse among the heathen long before the appearance of our Saviour, yet the most ignorant idolater observed some stated festivals in honour of the imaginary divinities to which his worship was addressed. When an idolater therefore was converted, the natural consequence of his conversion—that is, of his going over from the worship of idols to the worship of the true God,—the natural and immediate consequence would be, that he would observe the festival of the true God instead of the festival of his idol. Thus the Gentile convert would spontaneously adopt the observation of the Sabbath, as a natural duty—a branch, indeed, of that most general commandment "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God." It was therefore as little necessary that the Sabbath should be expressly observed in the apostolical decree, as that express reservation should be made of any other of the ten commandments: Nor is the neglect of the Sabbath more to be justified by the silence of the apostolical council concerning the necessity of the observation, than idolatry or blasphemy is to be justified by their silence about the second or the third commandment.

The argument, therefore, from the parallel antiquity of the injunction of a Sabbath and the prohibition of blood, rather goes to prove that the prohibition is in force, than to invalidate the conclusion of the perpetual sanctity of the Sabbath from the early date of the institution. Accordingly, it hath been the practice of very considerable men, within our own memory, to abstain, from conscientious scruples, from all meats prepared with the blood of animals, and from the flesh of animals otherwise killed than by the effusion of their blood. The truth, however, seems to be, that the two ordinances, the observation of a Sabbath and abstinence from blood, although they were equally binding upon all mankind at the time when they were severally enjoined, differ nevertheless in this,—that the reason of the Sabbath continues invariably the same; or, if it changes at all, it hath been gaining rather than losing its importance from the first institution. The reason of the prohibition of blood was founded on the state of mankind before the coming of Christ, and was peculiar to those early ages. The use of the Sabbath, as it began, will end only with the world itself. The abstinence from blood was a part of that handwriting of ordinances to which sin gave a temporary importance, and which were blotted out when the Messiah made an end of sin by the expiatory sacrifice of the cross. I have already had occasion to remark, that it was the great end of the numerous sacrifices of the Mosaic ritual, to impress the Jewish people for a season the chosen depositaries of revealed truth with an opinion of the necessity of a sanguinary expiation even for involuntary offences,—to train them to the habitual belief of that awful maxim, that “without blood there shall be no remission.” The end of those earlier sacrifices, which were of use in the patriarchal ages, was unquestionably the same. To inculcate the same important lesson, in the earliest instance of a sacrifice upon record, respect was had to the shepherd’s sacrifice of the firstlings of his flock rather than to the husbandman’s offering of the fruit of his ground; and for the same reason, by the prohibition laid upon the sons of Noah, and afterwards enforced in the severest terms in the Mosaic law, blood was sanctified, as it were, as the immediate instrument of atonement. The end of the prohibition was to impress mankind with a high reverence for blood, as a most holy thing, consecrated to the purpose of the general expiation: But this expiatory virtue belonged not to the blood of bulls and of goats, but to the blood of Christ, of which the other was by God’s appointment made a temporary emblem. As the importance, therefore, of all inferior sacrifices, and of all the cleansings and purifications of the law, ceased when once the only meritorious sacrifice had been offered on the cross, and the true atonement made, animal blood, at the same time and for the same reason, lost its sanctity. The necessity, therefore, mentioned in the apostolic rescript, so far as it regards the restriction from the use of blood, can be understood only of a temporary necessity, founded on the charitable condescension which, in the infancy of the church, was due from the Gentile converts to the inveterate prejudices of their Hebrew Brethren. Accordingly, although we read of no subsequent decree of the apostolical college, rescinding the restriction which by the act of their first assembly they thought proper to impose, yet we find what is equivalent to a decree in the express licence given by St. Paul to the Christians of Corinth, that of whatever meat was set before them, provided it occurred not the imputation of ido-

latory, by partaking of a feast upon the victim in an idol's temple. With this exception, they had permission to eat whatever was sold in the shambles, and whatever was served up at table, without any attention to the legal distinctions of clean and unclean and without any anxious inquiry upon what occasion or in what manner the animals had been slaughtered.

Thus it appears, that the prohibition of blood in food was for a time indeed, by the generality of the restraint, binding upon all mankind: But, in the reason of the thing, its importance was but temporary; and when its importance ceased, the restraint was taken off,—not indeed by a decree of the whole college of apostles, but still by apostolical authority. The observation of a Sabbath, on the contrary, was not only a general duty at the time of the institution, but, in the nature of the thing, of perpetual importance; since, in every stage of the world's existence, it is man's interest to remember and his duty to acknowledge his dependence upon God as the Creator of all things, and of man among the rest. The observation of a Sabbath was accordingly enforced, not by any apostolical decree, but by the example of the apostles, after the solemn abrogation of the Mosaic law.

Thus, I trust, I have shown that the observation of a Sabbath, as it was of earlier institution than the religion of the Jews, and no otherwise belonged to Judaism, than as, with other ordinances of the patriarchal church, it was adopted by the Jewish legislature, necessarily survives the extinction of the Jewish law; and makes a part of Christianity. I have shown how essentially it differs from other ordinances, which, however they may boast a similar antiquity, and for a season an equal sanctity, were only of a temporary importance. I have shown that it is a part of the rational religion of man, in every stage and state of his life, till he shall attain that happiness from the toil of perpetual combat with temptation—from the hardship of duty as a task, of which the rest of the Sabbath is itself a type. I have therefore established my first proposition, that Christians stand obliged to servance of a Sabbath. I am, in the next place, to inquire how far the Christian, in the observance of a Sabbath, is held to the original injunction of keeping every seventh day; and which day of the seven is his proper Sabbath: And this shall be the business of my next discourse.

SERMON L.

By BISHOP HORSLEY.

The Observance of the Sabbath.

MARK, ii. 27.

The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath.

THE general application of this maxim of our Lord, as a rule establishing the true distinction between natural duties and positive institutions, I have already shown. I have already shown you, that, rightly understood, whatever pre-eminence in merit it may ascribe (as it ascribes indeed the greatest) to those things which are not good because they are commanded, but are commanded because they are in themselves good, it nevertheless as little justifies the neglect of the external ordinances of religion as it warrants the hypocritical substitution of instituted forms for those higher duties which it teaches us to consider as the very end of our existence. In the particular inquiry which the text more immediately suggests, what regard may be due to the institution of the Sabbath under the Christian dispensation, I have so far proceeded as to show, in opposition to an opinion which too visibly influences the practice of the present age, that Christians are indeed obliged to the observance of a Sabbath. It remains for me to inquire how far the Christian, in the observance of a Sabbath, is held to the original injunction of keeping every seventh day; and when I have shown you that this obligation actually remains upon him, I am, in the last place, to show in what manner his Sabbath should be kept.

The spirit of the Jewish law was rigid, and severity. Rigour and severity were adapted to the rude manners of the first ages of mankind, and were particularly suited to the refractory temper of the Jewish people. The rigour of the law itself was far outdone by the rigour of the popular superstition and the Pharisaical hypocrisy,—if, indeed, superstition and hypocrisy, rather than a particular ill-will against our Lord, were the motives with the people and their rulers to tax him with a breach of the Sabbath, when they saw his power exerted on the Sabbath day for the relief of the afflicted. The Christian law is the law of liberty. We are not therefore to take the measure of our obedience from the letter of the Jewish law,—much less from Jewish prejudices and the suggestions of Jewish malignity. In the sanctification of the Sabbath, in particular, we have our Lord's express authority to take a pious discretion for our guide; keeping constantly in view the end of the institution, and its necessary subordination to higher duties. But, in the use of this discretion, I fear it is the fashion to indulge in a greater latitude than our Lord's maxims allow or his example warrants; and although the letter of the Jewish law is not to be the Christian's guide, yet perhaps, in the present instance, the particular injunctions of the law, rationally interpreted by reference to the general end of the institution, will best enable us to determine what is the obligation to the observance of a particular day,—what the proper observation of the day may be,—and how far the practice of the present age corresponds with the purpose and spirit of the ordinance.

The injunction of the Sabbath, in the fourth commandment, is accompanied with the history and the reason of the original institution. Both the history and the reason given here are the same which occur in the second chapter of Genesis. The history is briefly this,—that “God blessed the seventh day, and hallowed it.” “He hallowed it,”—that is, God himself distinguished this particular day, and set it apart from the rest; and “he blessed it,”—that is, he appropriated this day to religious exercises on the part of man; and he engaged on his own part, to accept the homage which should on this day be offered to him. He promised to be propitious to the prayers, public and private, which should be offered to him on this day in the true spirit of piety, humility, and faith. This is, I think, the import of the phrase that God “blessed the day.” He annexed the promise of his especial blessing to the regular discharge of a duty enjoined. The reason of this sanctification of the seventh day was founded on the order in which the work of the creation had been carried on. In this business, we are told, the Divine power was active for six successive days; on the sixth day all was finished; and on the seventh God rested: His power was no longer exerted in the business of making; the whole world being now made, arranged, and finished.

From the reason thus assigned for the institution, it is easy to understand that the worship originally required of men on this day was to praise God as the Creator of the universe, and to acknowledge their dependance upon him and subjection to him as his creatures: And it is evident that this worship is due to the Creator from all men in all ages, since none in any age are not his creatures. The propriety of the particular appointment of every seventh day is also evident from the reason assigned, if the fact be as the letter of the sacred history represents it, that the creation was the gradual work of six days. It hath ever been the folly or the pride of man to make a difficulty of every thing of which he hath not the penetration to discern the reason. It is very certain that God needs no time for the execution of his purposes. Had it so pleased him, the universe, in its finished form, with all its furniture and all its inhabitants, might have started into existence in a moment. To say “Let the world be,” had been as easy to God as “Let there be light!” and the effect must have followed. Hence, as if a necessity lay upon the Deity upon all occasions to do all to which his omnipotence extends,—or, on the contrary, it were not impossible that infinite power should in any instance do its utmost (for whatever hath been done, more must be within its ability to perform, or it were not infinite),—unmindful of these principles, some have dreamt of I know not what figures and allegories in that part of the Mosaic history which describes the creation as a work performed in time and distributed into parts; imagining, in opposition to the letter of the story, that the whole must have been instantaneously accomplished. Others, with more discernment, have suspected, that when once the chaos was produced and the elements invested with their qualities, physical causes, which work their effect in time, were in some measure concerned in the progress of the business; the Divine power acting only at intervals, for certain purposes to which physical causes were insufficient, such as the division of the general chaos into distinct globes and systems, and the formation of the first plants and animals. These notions are indeed perfectly consistent with sound philosophy; nor am I aware that they are in any way repugnant to the sacred history: But from these principles a conclusion has too hastily been drawn, that a week would be too short time for physical causes to accomplish their part of the business; and it has been imagined that a day must be used figuratively in the history of the creation to denote at least a thousand years, or perhaps a longer period.

In what manner the creation was conducted, is a question about a fact; and, like all questions about facts, must be determined, not by theory, but by testimony; and if no testimony were extant, the fact must remain uncertain. But the testimony of the sacred historian is peremptory and explicit. No expressions could be found in any language to describe a gradual progress of the work for six successive days, and the completion of it on the sixth, in the literal and common sense of the word "day," more definite and unequivocal than those employed by Moses; and they who seek or admit figurative expositions of such expressions as these seem to be not sufficiently aware that it is one thing to write a history and another to compose riddles. The expressions in which Moses describes the days of the creation, literally rendered, are these: When he has described the first day's work, he says—"And there was morning and there was evening, one day;" when he has described the second day's work, was morning and there was evening, a second day;" when he has described the third day's work, "There was evening and there was morning, a third day." Thus, in the progress of his narrative, at the end of each day's work, he counts up the days which had passed off from the beginning of the business; and to obviate all doubt what portion of time he meant to denote by the appellation of "a day," he describes each day of which the mention occurs as consisting of one evening and one morning, or, as the Hebrew words literally import, of the decay of light and the return of it. By what description could the word "day" be more expressly limited to its literal and common meaning, as denoting that portion of time which is measured and consumed by the earth's revolution on her axis? That this revolution was performed in the same space of time in the beginning of the world as now, I would not over confidently affirm: But we are not at present concerned in the resolution of that question; a day, whatever was its space, was still the same thing in nature,—a portion of time measured by the same motion, divisible into the same seasons of morning and noon, evening and midnight, and making the like part of longer portions of time measured by other motions. The day was itself marked by the vicissitudes of darkness and light; and so many times repeated, it made a month; and so many times more, a year. For six such days God was making the heaven and the earth, the sea, and all that therein is; and rested on the seventh day. This fact, clearly established by the sacred writer's testimony, in the literal meaning of these plain words, abundantly evinces the perpetual importance and propriety of consecrating one day in seven to the public worship of the Creator.

I say one day in seven. In the first ages of the world, the creation of the world was the benefaction by which God was principally known, and for which he was chiefly to be worshipped. The Jews, in their religious assemblies, had to commemorate other blessings—the political creation of their nation out of Abraham's family, and their deliverance from the Egyptian bondage. We Chris-tions have to commemorate, beside the common benefit of the creation, the transcendent blessing of our redemption—our new creation to the hope of everlasting life, which our Lord's resurrection to life on the first day of the week is a sure pledge and evidence. You see, therefore, that the Sabbath, in the progress of ages, hath acquired new ends, by new manifestations of the Divine mercy; and these new ends justify correspondent alterations of the original institution. It has been imagined that a change was made of the original day by Moses,—that the Sabbath was transferred by him from the day on which it had been originally kept in the patriarchal ages, to that on which the Israelites left Egypt. The conjecture is not unnatural; but it is, in my judgment, a mere conjecture, of which the sacred history affords neither proof nor confutation. This, however, is certain, that upon our Lord's resurrection, the Sabbath was transferred, in memory of that event, the great foundation of the Christian's hopes, from the last to the first day of the week. The alteration seems to have been made by the authority of the apostles, and to have taken place on the very day on which our Lord arose; for on that day the apostles were assembled, and on that day se'nnight we find them assembled again. The celebration of these two first Sundays was honoured with our Lord's own presence. It was perhaps to set a mark of distinction upon this day in particular, that the intervening week passed off, as it should seem, without any repetition of his first visit to the eleven apostles. From that time, the Sunday was the constant Sabbath of the primitive church. The Christian therefore who devoutly sanctifies one day in seven, although it be the first day of the week, not the last, as was originally ordained, may rest assured that he fully satisfies the spirit of the ordinance. Had the propriety of the alteration been less apparent than it is from the reason of the thing, the authority of the apostles to loose and bind was absolute.

I must remark, however, that their authority upon this point was exercised not purely in consideration of the expediency, but upon the higher consideration of the necessity of a change,—a necessity arising, as I conceive, out of the original spirit of the institution. The original observance of a Sabbath on every seventh day was a public and distinguishing characteristic of the worship of the Creator who finished his work in six days, and rested on the seventh. This was the public character by which the worship of the true God was distinguished; that his festival returned every seventh day; and, by the strict observance of this ordinance, the holy patriarchs, and the Jews their descendants, made as it were a public protestation once in every week against the errors of idolatry, which, instead of the true God, the Creator of the universe, paid its adoration either to the works of God—the sun and moon and other celestial bodies, or to mere fragments of the human imagination, misled by a diabolical illusion—to imaginary beings presiding over the natural elements, or the departed ghosts of deceased kings and heroes—and, in the last stage of the corruption, to inanimate images, by which the supposed influences of the celestial bodies and physical qualities of the elements were emblematically represented, and the likenesses of the deified kings supposed to be portrayed. To this protestation against heathenism, the propriety of which binds the worshippers of the true God in all ages to a weekly Sabbath, it is reasonable that Christians should add a similar protestation against Judaism. It was necessary that Christians should openly separate as it were from the communion of the Jews, who, after their perverse rejection of our Lord, ceased to be the true church of God: And the sanctification of the Saturday being the most visible and notorious character of the Jewish worship, it was necessary that the Christian Sabbath should be transferred to some other day of the week. A change of the day being for these reasons necessary, the choice of the apostles was directed to the first day of the week, as that on which our Lord's resurrection finished and sealed the work of our redemption; so that, in the same act by which we acknowledge the Creator, and protest against the claims of the Jews to be still the depositaries of the true religion, we might confess the Saviour whom the Jews crucified.

You have now seen that the Christian clearly stands obliged to the observance of a Sabbath; that in the observance of his Sabbath he is held to the original institution of keeping every seventh day; and that his proper Sabbath is the first day of the seven. By keeping a Sabbath, we acknowledge a God, and declare that we are not atheists; by keeping one day in seven, we protest against idolatry, and acknowledge that God who in the beginning made the heavens and the earth; and by keeping our Sabbath on the first of the week, we protest against Judaism, and acknowledge that God who, having made the world, sent his only begotten Son to redeem mankind. The observation therefore of the Sunday in the Christian church is a public weekly assertion of the two first articles in our Creed,—the belief in God the Father Almighty, the Maker of heaven and earth; and in Jesus Christ, his only Son, our Lord.

I must not quit this part of my subject without briefly taking notice of a text in St. Paul's epistle to the Colossians, which has been supposed to contradict the whole doctrine which I have asserted, and to prove that the observation of a Sabbath in the Christian church is no point of duty, but a matter of mere compliance with an ancient custom. In the second chapter of that epistle, St. Paul, speaking of "the handwriting of ordinances which is blotted out, having been nailed to the Redeemer's cross," adds, in the sixteenth verse, "Let no man therefore judge you in meat or in drink, or in respect of an holiday, or of the new moon, or of the Sabbath days." From this text, no less a man than the venerable Calvin drew the conclusion, in which he has been rashly followed by other considerable men, that the sanctification of the seventh day is no indispensable duty in the Christian church,—that it is one of those carnal ordinances of the Jewish Dispensation which our Lord hath blotted out. The truth however is, that, in the apostolical age, the first day of the week, though it was observed with great reverence, was not called the Sabbath day, but the Lord's day,—that the separation of the Christian church from the Jewish communion might be marked by the name as well as by the day of their weekly festival; and the name of the Sabbath days was appropriated to the Saturdays, and certain days in the Jewish church which were likewise called Sabbaths in the law, because they were observed with no less sanctity. The Sabbath days therefore of which St. Paul in this passage speaks were not the Sundays of the Christians, but the Saturdays and the other Sabbaths of the Jewish calendar. The Judaizing heretics, with whom St. Paul was all his life engaged, were strenuous advocates for the observation of these Jewish festivals in the Christian church; and his (St. Paul's) admonition to the Colossians is, that they should not be disturbed by the censures of those who reproached them for neglecting to observe these Jewish Sabbaths with Jewish ceremonies. It appears from the first epistle to the Corinthians, that the Sunday was observed in the church of Corinth with St. Paul's own approbation. It appears from the Apocalypse, that it was generally observed in the time when that book was written by St. John; and it is mentioned by the earliest apologists of the Christian faith as a necessary branch of Christian worship. But the Sabbaths of the Jewish church are abolished; nor is the Christian, in the observation of his own Sabbath, to conduct himself by the childish rules of the old Pharisæical superstition. This brings me to consider, in the last place, the manner in which the Christian Sabbath is to be kept.

As the reason of the institution rests on such common benefits as the creation of the world and man's redemption, it is evident that all descriptions of men stand obliged to the duties of the day. No elevation of rank may exempt; no meanness of condition may exclude; no inexperience of youth disqualifies for the task; no decrepitude of age is unequal to the toil; no tenderness of sex can suffer from the fatigue. Since the proper business of the day thus engages every rank, every sex, and every age, it is evident that it requires a suspension of the ordinary business of the world; for none can be at leisure for secular ememployments, when all are occupied, as they ought to be, in devotion. All servile labour and all worldly business was accordingly prohibited by the Mosaic law, under the highest penalties; and capital punishment was, in an early instance, actually inflicted on a man who only went out on the Sabbath to gather sticks for fuel. Christian magistrates have not only the permission, they have the injunction of our Lord—they have the authority at least of inference from the example of what he did himself, and what he justified when done by his disciples, to remit much of the rigour of this interdiction. Such a cessation however of business and of pleasure should be enforced, as may leave neither necessity nor temptation upon any denomination of men in the community to neglect the proper observance of the festival. It is to be remembered, that although the worship of God is the chief end of the institution, yet the refreshment of the lower ranks of mankind, by an intermission of their labours, is indisputably a secondary object. “Thou shalt rest on the seventh day,” said the law, “that the son of thy handmaid, and the stranger, may be refreshed.” A handmaid, in the language of the Old Testament, denotes a female slave: The son of a handmaid therefore is the offspring of a female slave; which, by the laws of the Jews, as of all people among whom slavery hath been allowed, was the property of the master of the mother. The stranger seems here to be set in opposition to the homeborn slave,—denoting a foreign slave bought with money or taken in war. These two descriptions of the homeborn and the foreign slave comprehend the whole of that oppressed and helpless order of mankind. It is expressly provided by the law, that on the Sabbath day this harassed race of mortals should have their refreshment. Now, as these injunctions were evidently founded on the general principles of philanthropy, it should seem, that allowance being made for the difference between the rigour of Jewish and the liberality of the Christian dispensation,—and allowance being also made for the different circumstances of the ancient and the modern world,—these injunctions of the suspension of the labours of the lower ranks are universally and perpetually in force, in all parts of the world, and in all ages; the rather as they are no less calculated for the benefit of the higher than for the comfort of the lower orders. It is useful to both to be admonished at frequent intervals,—the one for their consolation, the other for the suppression of that pride which a condition of ease and superiority is too apt to inspire. It is useful to both to be reminded of their equal relation to their common Lord, as the creatures of his power—the subjects of his government—the children of his love, by an institution which at frequent intervals unites them in his service. Under this recollection, the servant will obey with fidelity and cheerfulness, and the superior will govern with kindness and lenity. It is of the highest importance to the present good humour of society, and to the future interests of men of every rank, that these injunctions should be observed with all the exactness which the present state of society may admit.

The labour of man is not the only toil which the Mosaic law prohibited on the Sabbath day. “On the seventh day thou shalt rest, that thine ox and thine ass may rest.” It was a principle with some of the heathen moralists, that no rights subsist between man and the lower animals,—that, in the exercise of our dominion over them, we are at liberty to pursue our own profit and convenience, without any consideration of the fatigue and the miseries which they may undergo. The holy Scriptures seem to speak another language, when they say “The righteous man is merciful even to his beast;” and as no reason can be alleged why the ox or the ass of Palestine should be treated with more tenderness than the kindred brutes of other countries, it must be upon this general principle, that mercy is in some degree due to the animals beneath us; that the Divine legislator of the Jews provided on the Sabbath for their refreshment. This, therefore, like the former provision (allowance still being made for the different spirit of Judaism and Christianity), is to be considered as a general and standard part of the institution, which is violated whenever, for the mere pleasure and convenience of the master and the owner, either servants, or even animals, are subjected to the same severity of toil on the Sabbath which belongs to the natural condition of the one and to the civil rank of the other on the six days of the week. On the Sabbath, man is to hold a sort of edifying communion with the animals beneath him; acknowledging, by a short suspension of his dominion over them, the right of the Creator in himself as well as in them, and confessing that his own right over them is derived from the grant of the superior Lord.

It appears from what has been said, that the practice, which is become so common in this country among all ranks of men, of making long journies on the Sabbath day without any urgent necessity, is one of the highest breaches of this holy institution. It breaks in upon the principal business of the day, laying some under a necessity, and furnishing others with a pretence for withdrawing themselves from the public assemblies; and it defeats the ordinance in its subordinate ends, depriving servants and cattle of that temporary exemption from fatigue which it was intended both should enjoy. This, like other evils, hath arisen from small beginnings; and by an unperceived, because a natural and a gradual growth, hath attained at last an alarming height. Persons of the higher ranks, whether from a certain vanity of appearing great, by assuming a privilege of doing what was generally forbidden, or for the convenience of travelling when the roads were the most empty, began within our own memory to make their journies on a Sunday. In a commercial country, the great fortunes acquired in trade have a natural tendency to level all distinctions but what arises from affluence. Wealth supplies the place of nobility; birth retains only the privilege of setting the first example. The city presently catches the manners of the court; and the vices of the high-born peer are faithfully copied in the life of the opulent merchant and the thriving tradesman. Accordingly, in the space of a few years, the Sunday became the travelling day of all who travel in their own carriages. But why should the humbler citizen, whose scandaler means oblige him to commit his person to the crammed stage-coach, more than his wealthier neighbour, be exposed to the hardship of travelling on the working days, when the multitude of heavy carts and waggons moving in all directions renders the roads unpleasant and unsafe to all carriages of a slighter fabric; especially when the only real inconvenience, the danger of such obstructions, is infinitely increased to him, by the greater difficulty with which the vehicle in which he makes his uncomfortable journey crosses out of the way, in deep and miry roads, to avoid the fatal jostle? The force of these principles was soon perceived; and, in open defiance of the laws, stage-coaches have for several years travelled on the Sundays. The waggoner soon understands that the road is as free for him as for the coachman,—that if the magistrate connives at the one he cannot enforce the law against the other; and the Sunday traveller now breaks the Sabbath without any advantage gained in the safety or pleasure of his journey. It may seem, that the evil, grown to this height, would become its own remedy: But this is not the case. The temptation indeed to the crime among the higher ranks of the people subsists no longer; but the reverence for the day among all orders is extinguished, and the abuse goes on from the mere habit of profaneness. In the country, the roads are crowded on the Sunday, as on any other day, with travellers of every sort: The devotion of the villages is interrupted by the noise of the carriages passing through, or stopping at the inns for refreshment. In the metropolis, instead of that solemn stillness of the vacant streets in the hours of the public service, which might suit, as in our fathers' days, with the sanctity of the day, and be a reproof to every one who should stir abroad but upon the business of devotion, the mingled racket of worldly business and pleasure is going on with little abatement; and in the churches and chapels which adjoin the public streets, the sharp rattle of the whirling phaeton, and the graver rumble of the loaded wagon, mixed with the oaths and imprecations of the brawling drivers, disturb the congregation and stun the voice of the preacher.

These scandals call loudly for redress : But redress will be in vain expected from any increased severity of the laws, without a concurrence of the willing example of the great. This is one of the many instances in which a corrupt fashion in the higher orders of society will render all law weak and ineffectual. I am not without hope that the example of the great will not be wanting. I trust that we are awakened to a sense of the importance of religious ordinances, by the dreadful exhibition of the mischiefs of irreligion in the present state of the neighbouring apostate nation ; and though our recovery from the disease of carelessness and indifference is yet in its beginning, appearances justify a sanguine hope of its continuance, and of its ultimate termination, through the grace of God, in a perfect convalescence. And when once the duties of religion shall be recommended by the general example of the superior ranks, then, and not till then, the bridle of legal restraint will act with effect upon vulgar profligacy.

But, in the application of whatever means for the remedy of the evil,—whether of legal penalties, which ought to be enforced, and in some cases ought to be heightened—or of the mild persuasion of example—or of the two united, which alone can be successful,—in the application of these various means, the zeal of reform, if it would not defeat its own end, must be governed and moderated by a prudent attention to the general spirit of Christianity, and to the general end of the institution. The spirit of Christianity is rational, manly, and ingenuous ; in all cases delighting in the substantial works of judgment, justice, and mercy, more than in any external forms. The primary and general end of the institution is the public worship of God, the Creator of the world and Redeemer of mankind.

Among the Jews, the absolute cessation of all animal activity on their Sabbath had a particular meaning in reference to their history ; It was a standing symbolical memory of their miraculous deliverance from a state of servitude. But to mankind in general—to us Christians in particular, the proper business of the day is the worship of God in public assemblies, from which none may without some degree of crime be unnecessarily absent. Private devotion is the Christian's daily duty ; but the peculiar duty of the Sabbath is public worship. As for those parts of the day which are not occupied in the public duty, every man's own conscience, without any interference of public authority, and certainly without any officious interposition of the private judgment of his neighbour,—every man's own conscience must direct him what portion of this leisure should be allotted to his private devotions, and what may be spent in sober recreation. Perhaps a better general rule cannot be laid down than this,—that the same proportion of the Sabbath, on the whole, should be devoted to religious exercises, public and private, as every man would spend of any other day in his ordinary business. The holy work of the Sabbath, like all other work, to be done well requires intermissions. An entire day is a longer space of time than the human mind can employ with alacrity upon any one subject. The austerity therefore of those is little to be commended, who require that all the intervals of public worship, and whatever remains of the day after the public duty is satisfied, should be spent in the closet, in private prayer and retired meditation. Nor are persons in the lower ranks of society to be very severely censured,—those especially who are confined to populous cities, where they breathe a noxious atmosphere, and are engaged in unwholesome occupations, from which with their daily subsistence they derive their daily poison—if they take advantage of the leisure of the day to recruit their wasted strength and harassed spirits, by short excursions into the purer air of the adjacent villages, and the innocent recreations of sober society ; provided they engage not in schemes of dissipation and tumultuous pleasure, which may disturb the sobriety of their thoughts, and interfere with the duties of the day. The present humour of the common people leads perhaps more to a profanation of the festival than to a superstition, even in the observance of the attempt to reform, we shall do wisely to remember, that the thanks for this are chiefly due to the base spirit of puritanical hypocrisy, which in the last century opposed and defeated the wise attempts of government to regulate the recreations of the day by authority, and prevent the excesses which have actually taken place, by a rational indulgence.

The Sabbath was ordained for a day of public worship, and of refreshment to the common people. It cannot be a day of their refreshment if it be made a day of mortified restraint. To be a day of worship, it must be a day of leisure from worldly business, and of abstraction from dissipated pleasure. But it need not be a dismal one. It was ordained for a day of general and willing resort to the holy mountain; when men of every race, and every rank, and every age, promiscuously—Hebrew, Greek, and Scythian—bond and free—young and old—high and low—rich and poor—one with another—laying hold of Christ's atonement, and the proffered mercy of the gospel, might meet together before their common Lord, exempt for a season from the cares and labours of the world, and be "joyful in his house of prayer."

SERMON LI.

By BISHOP PORTER.

An immoderate Love of Diversions inconsistent with the Duties of a Christian.

2 TIM. iii. 4.

Lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God.

To what period of time, and to what particular persons, the sacred writer here alludes, it is neither easy nor material to determine. But there is a question which it is very material, and I doubt but too easy, for most of us to answer; whether the description in the text may not be justly applied to ourselves. In whatever sense we take the word pleasures, whether as denoting those which are criminal, or those which only become so by excess and abuse; it is surely doing us no injury to say, that we love them more than God. At present I shall confine myself to that sort of pleasures which are usually styled innocent; and in a certain degree, and under proper restrictions, undoubtedly are so; I mean the gaieties and amusements of life. If we are not lovers of these pleasures more than lovers of God, if our piety is greater than our dissipation, it must be great indeed. If we served our Maker with half that zeal, half that alacrity and perseverance, with which we pursue our amusements, we should be the most pious nation this day upon earth. But how far this is from being the case, at least with respect to a large proportion of almost every rank of men amongst us, is but too apparent. It is not the living God, it is pleasure that they worship. To this they are idolaters; to this they sacrifice their time, their talents, their fortunes, their health, and too often their innocence and peace of mind. In their haste to enjoy this life, they forget that there is another; they live (as the apostle expresses it) without God in the world (Eph. ii. 12.), and their endless engagements not only exclude all love, but all thought of him. However carefully right principles of religion may have been originally planted in their breasts, they have no room to grow up. They are choaked with the pleasures of this world, and bring no fruit to perfection. Invention seems to have been tortured to find out new ways of consuming time, and of being uselessly employed. And there has appeared so wonderful an ingenuity in this respect, that it seems almost impossible for the wit of man to invent, or the life of man to admit, any further additions to this kind of luxury. There are thousands, even of those who would take it very ill to be called vicious, who yet from the time of their rising in the morning to the time of their going to rest at night, never once bestow a single thought upon eternity; nor while they riot in the blessings of Providence, vouchsafe to cast one devout look up to the gracious Author of them, in whom they live, and move, and have their being. (Acts, xvii. 28.)

Nay, I know, would persuade themselves and others, that there can be no harm where there is no actual vice; and that, provided they step not over the bounds of virtue, they cannot be guilty of an excess in pleasure.

But is it true in the first place, that the man of gaiety never does step over the bounds of virtue? Are all those things which go under the name of amusements as perfectly innocent as they are generally represented to be? Is there not one diversion at least (as it called), and one so predominant in the higher ranks of life, that it has swallowed up almost every other, which is big with the most fatal mischief? A diversion, which, far different from the common run of amusements, has no foundation in our natural appetites; no charms to captivate the fancy or the understanding; nothing to make glad the heart of man, to give him a cheerful countenance, and refresh him after the cares and fatigues of duty; but runs counter to reason, sense, and nature; defeats all the purposes of amusement; sinks the spirit instead of raising them; sours the temper instead of improving it; and, when it is carried to its utmost lengths, takes such entire and absolute possession of the soul, as to shut out every other concern both for God and man; extinguishes every generous sentiment; excites the most malignant passions; provokes to the most profane expressions; brings distress, sometimes ruin, upon its wretched votaries, their families, friends, and dependents; tempts them to use unfair, or mean, or oppressive methods of retrieving their affairs; and sometimes to conclude the dismal scene by the last fatal act of desperation. I do not say that gaming always produces these effects; or that it is to all persons, in all circumstances, and in all its various degrees, equally pernicious and unlawful; but it has always a natural tendency to these effects, it always exposes ourselves and others to great danger, and can never be ranked among our innocent amusements. Yet as such it is every day more and more pursued; nay, has even appropriated to itself the name of play; for what reason I know not, unless to play with our lives and fortunes, with happiness temporal and eternal, be the most delectable of all human enjoyments.

But putting this strange unaccountable passion out of the question, do not even our most allowable diversions sometimes end in sin, though they may not begin with it? Does not an immoderate fondness for these trivial things inevitably weaken and corrupt our hearts, and lead us by imperceptible steps to a loss of mind, and a course of action, essentially wrong? The fact is, a state of neutrality in religion, an insipid mediocrity between vice and virtue, though it is what many would be glad to take up with, is an imaginary state; at least, is very seldom, if ever, to be found in a life of gaiety and dissipation. The man who is constantly engaged in the amusements, can scarce ever escape the pollutions of the world. In his eager pursuits of pleasures, he will be sometimes apt to overshoot the mark, and to go further than he ought, perhaps than he intended. Even they who are most in earnest about their future welfare; who have taken care to fortify their minds with the firmest principles of religion; who constantly endeavour to keep alive their hopes and fears of futurity; to guard with the utmost vigilance every avenue of the mind, and secure all the issues of life (Proverbs, iv. 23.); even these, I say, are sometimes unable, with all their caution and circumspection, to prevent surprise; with all their strength and resolution to withstand the violence of headstrong passions and desires, which often burst through all restraints, and beat down all the barriers that reason and religion had been a long time raising up against them. What then must be the case when all the impressions of religion are, by the continual attrition of diversions, worn out and effaced; when the mind is stript of all prudential caution; no guard left upon the imagination; no check upon the passions; the natural spring and vigour of the soul impaired, and no supernatural aid to strengthen and support it? What else can be expected, but that we should fall an easy prey to the weakest invader, and yield ourselves up to the slightest temptation? When the unclean spirit cometh, he finds every thing within prepared for his reception, empty, swept, and garnished; and he taketh with him seven other spirits more wicked than himself; and they enter in, and dwell there, and the last state of that man is worse than the first (Matt. xii. 44, 45); he begins in gaiety and ends in vice.

Let us, however, take this question up on the most favourable grounds: let us allow it possible for you to run round for ever in the circle of gaiety, without ever once striking into the paths of vice: Is this, do you think, sufficient for salvation? If your amusements as effectually choke the good seed as the rankest weeds of vice, can you with any propriety call them innocent? Do you imagine that God, who is a jealous God (Exod. xi. 5.), will bear to be supplanted in your affections by every trifle; or that he will be content with your not taking up arms against him, though you do him not one single piece of acceptable service? The utmost you can plead, is a kind of negative merit, the merit of doing neither good nor harm; and what reception that is likely to meet with, you may judge from the answer given to the unprofitable servant, who produced his talent wrapt up in a napkin, undiminished indeed, but unimproved: O thou wicked servant, wherefore gavest thou not my money into the bank, that at my coming I might have required mine own with usury? (Luke, xix. 23.) It is not enough merely to abstain from gross crimes; it is not enough to enjoy yourselves in an indolent harmless tranquillity; to divide matters so nicely as to avoid equally the inconveniences of vice, and the fatigues of virtue; to praise religion in words, to love it perhaps in speculation, but to leave the trouble of practising it to others. This languor and inactivity is a kind of lethargy in the soul, which renders it utterly insensible to the life and spirit of religion. Indifference in any good cause is blamable. In religion, the Christian religion, it is insupportable. It does violence to the first and fundamental principle of that religion. Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, with all thy soul, with all thy mind, and with all thy strength (Matt. xii. 30.) Go now and let your whole heart, and soul, and mind, and strength, be engaged in pursuing your amusements, and promoting your pleasures, and then lay claim to the rewards of Christianity.

Happy will it be for you, if you can escape its punishments. The gospel, I am sure, gives you no grounds to suppose that you shall. Though you bear no evil fruit, yet if you bear no good, you are involved in the sentence of the fig-tree, Cut it down, why cumbereth it the ground? (Luke, xiii. 7.) To do nothing is in many cases to do a positive wrong, and as such requires a positive punishment. To stand neuter in dangerous commotions of the state, the great Athenian lawgiver declared to be a crime against the state; and in like manner the great Christian lawgiver declares; he that is not with me, is against me; and he that gathereth not with me, scattereth abroad. (Matt. xii. 30.)

Christianity is throughout an active religion; it consists not only in abstaining from all appearance of evil (1 Thess. v. 22.); but in being ready to every good work (Tit. iii. 1.); and if we stop short at the first, we leave the better half of our business undone. Christ himself went about continually doing good (Acts, x. 38.); and he has prescribed a variety of positive and practical duties to his disciples, as the condition of their salvation; and pressed the performance of these duties upon them with an earnestness and a force of expression that may well alarm the thoughtless and the gay, and make them reflect on the extreme danger of their situation. With regard to God, we are commanded to believe in him, to fear him, to love him, to worship him, to give him thanks always, to pray without ceasing, and watch thereunto with all perseverance. With regard to our neighbour, we are to do good unto all men, to be rich in good works, to be kind and tender-hearted, to feed the hungry, to clothe the naked, to remember them that are in bonds, to minister to the sick, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction. With regard to ourselves, we are enjoined to be temperate in all things, to keep under our bodies, and bring them into subjection, to set our affections on things above, to watch and pressing we enter into temptation, to work out our salvation with fear and trembling, to use all diligence to make our calling and election sure. Such and so various are the duties pressed upon us in every page of the scriptures. And is this now a religion to be trifled with? Is it not enough to employ every moment we can spare from the indispensable duties of our station, and the necessary refreshments of nature; and how then can it be consistent with that incessant hurry and dissipation, which, intent only on providing a succession of worthless amusements and ignoble gratifications, overlooks every obligation of a man and a christian; and supposes that the whole business of life is not to employ time usefully, but to consume it insignificantly? Can these men seriously imagine that they are all this time working out their salvation; that they are pressing forwards towards the mark for the prize of their high calling (Phil. iii. 14.); that they are every day drawing nearer and nearer to immortal happiness; and that they shall share the crown of glory with them who have borne the burthen and heat of the day? (Matt. xx. 12.) Is eternal life so very small an object, so extremely cheap a purchase, as to require not the least pains to obtain it? Or is the situation of the rich man represented in scripture to be so perfectly safe and secure, that, while the rest of mankind are enduring afflictions, struggling with difficulties, subduing their passions, and working out their salvation with fear and trembling; he, and he only, may neglect all these precautions, may give up his whole time and thoughts to dress, and magnificence, and diversion, and good cheer; may center his whole care in his own dear person, and make it his sole study to gratify every wish of his heart; may leave his salvation to take care of itself, and, as if he had obtained a promise of heaven in reversion, think of nothing but present felicity, and say within himself, Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years, take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry? (Luke, xii. 15.) Is not deceived; this is not virtue; this is not religion; this is not christianity. It is, on the contrary, that very temper of mind, that indolent, soft, luxurious dream of the soul, for which the rich man in the gospel was condemned to lift up his eyes in torments (Luke, xvi. 23.); and let those who dread his punishment, be warned by his example.

It is then a fatal mistake, to suppose, that a life of continual gaiety and dissipation, because it is not marked with any notorious crimes, because it does not shock our consciences with palpable guilt, is therefore perfectly innocent. You have by this time seen, I hope, that it is far from being so. You have seen that it naturally leads to, and frequently terminates in, actual vice; that at the least it so totally unmans and enfeebles the soul, as to render it unfit for the reception of religious truths, incapable of exerting its nobler powers, unable to struggle through the common difficulties, or support the common afflictions, of life; and leaves neither time, nor inclination, nor ability, to perform the most important duties of a man, a social being, and a christian.

The truth is, although diversions may serve very well to quicken a palled appetite, they are much too poignant and high-seasoned to be the constant food and nourishment of the soul. They not only destroy our relish for the more plain and simple fare of sobriety and virtue, but lay a foundation for the worst diseases; and though they do not so instantly kill as the deadly poison of vice, yet with a gradual and a fatal certainty, they undermine the vital parts, and sap the constitution.

Beware then of an error, which is the more dangerous, because it is not always perceived, or at least acknowledged, to be an error. And such of you, more especially as are just setting out in life, full of those high spirits and gay imaginations which youth, and rank, and affluence, naturally inspire; beware of giving way to that feverish thirst of pleasure, to that frivolous turn of mind and levity of conduct, which will render all your great advantages useless, and totally defeat every grand purpose of your creation. Do not imagine that you were born to please yourselves only. Do not entertain that false, that destructive notion, that your wealth and time are all your own;

that you may dispose of them exactly as you think fit; may lavish the whole of them on your own pleasures and amusements, without being accountable to any one for the application. There is one, most assuredly, who may, and who has declared that he will, call you to an account, for the use of that leisure and those riches which he bestowed upon you for far other purposes than that mean ignoble one of mere selfish gratification. There are duties of the last importance owing to your families, your friends, your country, your fellow-creatures, your Creator, which you are bound under the most sacred ties to perform; and whatever calls off your attention from these, does from that moment cease to be innocent. Here then is the precise point at which you ought to stop. You may be lovers of pleasure; it is natural, it is reasonable, for you to be so; but you must not be lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God. This is the true line that separates harmless gaiety from criminal dissipation. It is a line drawn by the hand of God himself, and he will never suffer it to be passed with impunity. He claims, on the justest grounds, the first place in your hearts. His laws and precepts are to be the first object of your regard. And be assured, that by suffering them to be so, you will be no losers even in present felicity. It is a truth demonstrable by reason, and confirmed by invariable experience, that a perpetual round of fashionable gaiety, is not the road to real substantial happiness. Ask those who have tried it, and they will all (if they are honest) with one voice declare, that it is not. It is indeed in the very nature of things impossible that it should be so. This world is not calculated to afford, the human mind is not formed to bear, a constant succession of new and exquisite delights. To aim therefore at uninterrupted, unbounded gaiety, to make pleasure so necessary to your existence, that you cannot subsist one moment without it, is to convert every thing that is not absolute pleasure into absolute pain, and to lay the foundation of certain misery. Diversions are of too thin and unsubstantial a nature to fill the whole capacity of a rational mind, or to satisfy the cravings of a soul formed for immortality. They must, they do, tire and disgust; you see it every day; you see men flying from one amusement to another; affecting to be happy, yet feeling themselves miserable; intemperate, yet pursuing their pleasures, yet uneasy without them; growing sick at last of them all, of their selves, and every thing around them; and compelled perhaps at last to have recourse to solitude, without the least provision made for it; without any fund of entertainment within, to render it supportable. From this wretched state it is that religion would preserve you; and the very worst you have to fear from it, is nothing more than such gentle restraints on your gaiety, as tend to promote the very end you have in view, the true enjoyment even of the present life. Suffer it then to do you this kind office, and do not look on Christianity in that gloomy light, in which it sometimes perhaps appears to you. Far from being an enemy to cheerfulness, it is the truest friend to it. That sober and temperate use of diversions, which it allows and recommends, is the surest way to preserve their power to please, and your capacity to enjoy them. At the same time, though it forbids excess in our pleasures, yet it multiplies the number of them; and disposes the mind to receive entertainment from a variety of objects and pursuits, which to the gay part of mankind are absolutely flat and insipid. To a body in perfect health the plainest food is relishing, and to a soul rightly harmonized by religion every thing affords delight. Rural retirement, domestic tranquillity, friendly conversation, literary pursuits, philosophical inquiries, works of genius and imagination; nay even the silent beauties of unadorned nature, a bright day, a still evening, a starry hemisphere, are sources of unadulterated pleasure to those whose taste is not vitiated by criminal indulgences, or debased by trifling ones. And when from these you rise to the still more rational and manly delights of virtue; to that self-congratulation which springs up in the soul from the consciousness of having used your best endeavours to act up to the precepts of the gospel; of having done your utmost, with the help of divine grace, to correct your infirmities, to subdue your passions, to improve your understandings, to exalt and purify your affections, to promote the welfare of all within your reach, to love and obey your Maker and your Redeemer: then is human happiness wound up to its utmost pitch, and this world has no higher gratifications to give.

Try then, you, who are in search of pleasures, try these among the rest, try, above all others, the pleasures of devotion. Think not that they are nothing more than the visions of a heated imagination. They are real, they are exquisite.

They are what thousands have experienced, what thousands still experience, what you yourselves may experience if you please. Acquire only a taste for devotion (as you often do for other things of far less value) in the beginning of life, and it will be your support and comfort through the whole extent of it. It will use you above all low cure, and little gratifications, it will give dignity and ability to your sentiments, inspire you with fortitude in danger, with patience in adversity, with moderation in prosperity, with alacrity in all your undertakings, with watchfulness over your own conduct, with benevolence to all mankind. It will be so far from throwing a damp on your other pleasures, that it will give new life and spirit to them, and in due all nature looking round you. It will be a fresh fund of cheerfulness in store for you, when the vivacity of youth begins to droop, and is the only thing that can fill up that void in the soul, which is left in it by every earthly enjoyment. It will not, like worldly pleasures desert you, when you have most need of consolation, in the hours of solitude, of sickness, of old age, but when once its holy flame is thoroughly lighted up in your breast, instead of becoming more faint and languid as you advance in years, it will grow brighter and stronger every day, will glow with peculiar warmth and lustre, when your dissolution draws near, will dispel the gloom and horrors of a death-bed, will give you a foretaste, and render you worthy to partake of that fullness of joy, those pure celestial pleasures which are at God's right hand for evermore. (Psalm. xvi. 11.)

SERMON LII.

By Dr. ROGERS.

Vicar of St Giles, Cripplegate, Subdean and Canon of Wells, and Chaplain in Ordinary to his Majesty.

Upon reading the Scriptures.

2 TIM. iii. 15.

And that from a child thou hast known the holy scriptures, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation.

WHOEVER, with a serious conviction, believes that there is a God, infinite in goodness, wisdom, and power, the creator and governor of the world, and that there is another life after this, in which all human actions shall receive an eternal allotment of reward or punishment from his justice, cannot but find himself infinitely concerned to render his conduct agreeable to this Almighty Being, this Sovereign Disposer of happiness or misery, and consequently, to apply himself with the greatest care and attention, to discover what actions will recommend us to his favour, and what will expose us to his displeasure.

How dark and uncertain a progress we could have made in this inquiry, upon the strength of natural reason, we may judge from the errors and superstitions of the heathen world. We have there a certain conviction of the inability of man to trace out the lines of duty, and prescribe to himself an acceptable service of his Creator. How absurd were their conceptions, and how ridiculous, and even impious, was their worship of the Deity? And though some thoughtful spirits carried their inquiries beyond the common stupidity of the vulgar, and retrieved a tolerable body of moral precepts, yet the most accurate of these systems are chargeable with great imperfections, and at best were confined to the studies of a few speculative persons, while the far greater part of mankind, who had neither leisure nor abilities for these philosophical researches, were left to be carried on in the stream of popular superstition, without any other rules of action, than either their passions and natural temper, or the prevailing fashions or laws of each country prescribed to them. How invaluable a blessing then must it be to us, to have so exact and infallible a direction of our conduct as the holy scriptures? To have all our doubts and scruples removed, and the measure of our duty ascertained in a full and distinct revelation of the whole will of God? A direction so complete as to reach every occasion of action, so clear and perspicuous, as to be intelligible to all capacities, and which we are encouraged to comply with, by an assurance that it will secure to us our most important interests, will make us wise, even wise unto salvation. In treating the scripture before us, I shall shew,

I. The obligations we are under to apply ourselves to the knowledge of the holy scriptures.

II. The great advantage that will attend this study.

III. The particular happiness of an early education in this knowledge.

IV. I shall recommend some rules to your observance, which may render your applications to this study successful.

And, I. We are obliged to apply ourselves to the knowledge of the holy scriptures, because they are the word of God.

The very first regular deductions of our reason tell us, that since there is an Almighty Being, who made and governs the world, it is of the utmost concern to our happiness, to engage the favour of this supreme power, by doing such things as please, and avoiding such as offend and provoke him. Nay, farther, since God has by right of creation a sovereign title to our obedience, it is not only our greatest interest, but our indispensable duty, to submit all our actions to his pleasure and direction: and since it is impossible for us to obey this will of God without knowing it, it follows, that the first necessary branch of our duty is to inquire what is his will, and endeavour to acquaint ourselves with the particular injunctions of it. These deductions are so natural, that all the religions which have ever appeared in the world, have been founded on these principles, and have been recommended to mankind from the authority of a real, or a pretended, declaration of the divine will. Since, therefore, God, who communicated his will unto the fathers by the prophets, has in this last dispensation of the gospel fully revealed himself unto us by his Son, and has demanded our obedience to the rules there prescribed to us, on peril of eternal damnation, it becomes a duty of the highest importance and obligation to us, to acquaint ourselves with the extent and meaning of that revelation. If the Gentile world, who had no other knowledge of God and his will, than they could collect from his visible works of the creation, and the light of unassisted reason, were left without excuse, for not attending sufficiently to the directions of that light; how shall we escape, if, when God has fully revealed to us his will, by the ministry of his evangelists and apostles, and given us his full and final instructions concerning our duty, how shall we escape, if we neglect to improve so much greater means of salvation? Since the Almighty has spoke from heaven, let the earth keep silence, and tremble at his word; since God has lift up his voice, let not man shut his ears, nor turn away his heart from attending to it. In vain has the Son of God come down from heaven, and declared the will of his Father; in vain did he send his apostles, and in vain have they preached in obedience to that mission, and committed to writing that gospel which they preached; in vain has the providence of God preserved and continued down to the church that sacred treasure of wisdom, if, after all, men are at liberty to slight or attend to it at their pleasure.

God indeed may, by an immediate and particular revelation, make known to us his will, without our application to this written declaration of it: but since he has now given us a standing complete system of all the truths he requires us to believe, and of all the duties it is his pleasure we should practise; it is a most unreasonable presumption in any man, to expect that God should miraculously convey that knowledge to him; which it was in his power, by an easy application, to have obtained. God has now written his will in fair characters, and it is our duty to acquiesce in this revelation, to seek thence the directions of our Creator, and the measures of that obedience we owe him. This obligation indeed is not equal to all men. For there is an order set apart for this purpose, separate and removed from common uses, and by their office more especially dedicated to this employment. And though it is an universal duty on all Christians to be conversant in the holy scriptures, yet some men have added farther to this general obligation, by a solemn devotion of their lives to this service.

But though the priests be the messengers of the Lord of Hosts, though their lips should especially preserve knowledge, and at their mouths the people should seek the law; and though their office more eminently requires them to be mighty in the scriptures, yet their ministry is not intended to excuse the negligence, or render useless the application, of others; but to assist their weakness, direct their ignorance, and encourage their assiduity in so excellent a study. Every private man is also obliged, by name and character, as a Christian, to set before his eyes this word of God, to search the holy scriptures for the proper motives and directions of duty, and apply his attainments to the promotion of his own and his neighbour's happiness. When the Almighty gave a law to the house of Israel, by the hand of his servant Moses, though one tribe was taken and separated from the congregation for the service of the sanctuary, to bless in the name of the Lord, and to teach the people; yet the rest were not therefore excused; much less excluded from the study of his precepts. God did not take from them the key of knowledge, nor shut up the kingdom of heaven from any who were inclined to enter in. Hear, O Israel! (says he,) the words which I command thee this day shall be in thy heart; and thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, when thou liest down, and when thou risest up; and thou shalt bind them for a sign upon thine hand, and they shall be as frontlets between thine eyes, and thou shalt write them upon the posts of thy house, and upon thy gates. And agreeably we find our Saviour, in his disputes with the Jews, generally appealing to the scriptures, and referring his hearers to the books of Moses and the prophets, as writings of common and public recourse, and such as every one was not only allowed, but bound, to be acquainted with. And I think it may very justly be inferred from my text, that the scriptures were permitted to the people in the Jewish church, since they are here said to have been known and studied by Timothy, from his very childhood; for I imagine, the scriptures here referred to by the apostle, to have been the books of the Jewish canon; because the time in which he is mentioned to have known them, was probably before his or his mother's conversion, and when few, if any, of the Christian scriptures were published or written. But if any one will understand the apostle of any evangelical writings, the conclusion will be, that St. Paul allowed and commended Timothy's application to the knowledge of the scriptures, when he was yet but a child, many years before he was ordained to the ministry: but at present I infer no more from it, but that in the Jewish church there was no such thing as a prohibition from reading the scriptures, but that all, even women and children, were allowed, encouraged, and commended, in that study. And that no such restraint was intended to be laid upon men by the gospel, is plain from several considerations.

1st, It is observable, that the scriptures of the New Testament were written in a language, at that time, the most universally read and understood of any in the world, and that by men whose native language it was not. Now, if the apostles and evangelists had designed to have excluded any number of men from reading the scripture, they would never have made use of an universal language, but have locked it up in some of those unknown or uncommon tongues they were masters of. Or, if their books had been written even in their own tongue, they would indeed have been of popular use in Judea, and a few of the eastern regions; but in all the rest of the world, the knowledge of them would have been confined to a small number of persons. Few would have taken the pains to learn a difficult foreign tongue, without the least affinity to their own, and few would have had leisure or capacity for such laborious applications. But, on the contrary, we find that the apostles, as they designed the salvation of all, so they wrote the books which were to direct men to salvation, in a language at that time spoken by almost all the world; and that the lowest education should not be excluded from the knowledge of them, these books were in a short time translated into several languages, and every nation heard them speak in their own tongue, wherein they were born, the wonderful works of God.

2dly, If the apostles had designed to restrain any number of their converts from reading their works, they would have left some express prohibition of it. Had it been a thing of so much danger to Christianity, as the church of Rome pretends, the qualifications had been defined of those who were to be trusted with this perilous liberty, and the rest excluded, or at least discouraged from the attempt by proper representations of the hazard that would attend it. But on the contrary, their writings are directed to all; and particularly the evangelist St. John directs his gospel, not only to a few select disciples, but to all Christians, for the instruction and confirmation of their faith; that they might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the son of God; and that believing, they might have life through his name. The epistles of St. Paul were intended, most of them, for the use of all the saints in those places to which they were sent, and are expressly inscribed to all the faithful in Christ Jesus; to all that in every place call on the name of Jesus Christ, as well as the bishops and deacons. St. Peter indeed tells us, that there were many things in his brother Paul's epistles, which they who were unlearned and unstable wrested, as they did also the other scriptures, to their own destruction. But this can never be interpreted as a prohibition; on the contrary, it is plain from this, that those holy writings, even the most difficult of them, were not in the apostles' time taken out of the hands even of the ignorant and unlearned, since they are here charged with the abuse of them. Neither does the apostle exclude them from any future access to these writings; but only gives men of inferior capacities the prudent and reasonable caution, that they should have a careful reading these scriptures, lest they should misinterpret any place, to the understanding of which more learning is required than they are masters of. But they should be especially careful, lest from want of steadfastness in their faith, they let themselves loose to raise new doctrines and opinions thence, and so disturb the peace, and divide the unity, of the Christian church.

But it is unreasonable from this, or any the like caution, to conclude they ought wholly to be denied looking into these writings. The great and necessary truths of the gospel, and the main lines of our duty, are drawn there fair and strong, and he that runneth may read them. The meanest capacity, as it is concerned to know, so it is very well able to comprehend the import and extent of them; and if they will not be too forward of themselves to determine the sense of the more difficult places; but either leave it to those whose peculiar study it is, or apply themselves to them to be informed in the meaning of them, with these cautions they will be secured from all danger, and blessed with such a knowledge of their religion, as is absolutely necessary to a rational profession of it. On the contrary, totally to prohibit the reading these treasures of eternal life, is like taking away a traveller's chart and compass, because there is a possibility that in some parts of his journey he may mistake the use of them, and so lose his way. The proper remedy his guide should apply in such a case is, to give him good directions, to point out to him the places where he is most apt to be misled, and shew how he may avoid the dangers of them; but taking away his rule, is either obliging him to sit still, or leaving him to the casual direction of those he meets on the way, where he will be infinitely more exposed to error, from their ignorance or knavery, than he could be by following a rule which is every where pure and intelligible, in all the most material parts of it; and where it is not so, we are easily secured from much danger in our mistakes. In sum, the holy scriptures and the only sure guide to our feet, 'and lantern to our path'; and it is not only the privilege, but the duty of every Christian, to follow the direction of this light. A light which discovers to us all we are concerned to know, in order to be happy; a study which is able to make us wise in our most important interest, even wise unto salvation which is the Ild General I proposed to speak to. And the proof of this will irresistibly inter both our duty and liberty to apply ourselves to this study, for if it be every man's duty to endeavour to attain salvation, and the reading and studying the scriptures be the readiest method to secure to us that attainment, it follows that it is every man's bounden duty, as well as greatest interest, to apply himself to this saving knowledge, these words of eternal life.

Now this was the only end of God's revealing his will, that mankind, who had long wearied themselves in dark and fruitless searches after happiness should be directed to a felicity suited to the dignity of our nature, and equal to the desires of an immortal being. In vain had men trod all the intricate mazes of philosophy, seeking rest but finding none. Inextricable difficulties perplexed all their speculations, and in the result of all their disputes and inquiries after happiness, they were left as little satisfied, either what to wish for, or how to pursue it, as when they began. They felt and lamented weaknesses, for which they had no remedy, were conscious of sins for which they knew not where to apply for pardon, were without assurance in their hopes, and without comfort in their fears. But now that life and immortality, which was in vain sought after in the paths of natural wisdom, is brought to light by the gospel. In the scriptures, the prospect is clearly opened to our faith, and the duties that lead to it distinctly proposed to our practice. We are there informed what spiritual enemies we are exposed to in our journey, what attempts we may expect from their power, and by what arms and conduct we may defeat their malice. We have there remedies prescribed and adapted to all our infirmities; the weary may there find refreshment, and the heavy-laden relief; and every weak and dejected spirit is supplied with proper consolations. Our repentance is there assured of pardon, and our sinners the duties of our religion of eternal

And methinks a Christian should want no exhortation to apply himself to this important and excellent study. The gospel proposed to us only as a great speculation, as a discovery of the nature of God, and spiritual beings, as an hypothesis that decided those great questions, of the rewards of virtue, and the immortality of the soul, accounted for all the mysteries of Providence, and proposed remedies for all the weaknesses of our nature, methinks our curiosity itself should find entertainment enough to engage us in so noble a theory. But when we consider it is the word of life, as a system proposed to our faith and observance, on peril of evilising damnation, with what zeal and assiduity should we apply ourselves to a study of such moment to our happiness, of such infinite concern to our souls? All other researches, when compared with this, will appear but as impertinent amusements of our time. Though we have read and digested volumes of philosophy; though we are acquainted with the histories of all ages, and are able to judge of the interests and policies of kingdoms; yet if we are ignorant of this one necessary part of knowledge, our wisdom is but folly, and all our learning but a reputable vanity. We have laid out our money for that which is not bread, and toiled for that which will profit us nought.

I let us then labour to be wise for ourselves, to be wise unto salvation. Let our daily study be in the statutes of God, and let his testimonies be our delight and our counsels. Let us read and meditate on the words of that wisdom which came from above: the wisdom of the Father of all lights, whom to know and obey is eternal life.

SERMON LIII.

By Dr. ROGERS.

Upon reading the Scriptures.

22 TIM. iii. 15.

And that from a child thou hast known the holy scriptures, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation.

In my former observations on this text I endeavoured to convince you, 1st, Of the obligations incumbent on all Christians to read and study the holy scriptures.

2dly, To encourage you in these applications, from the great advantages derived on us by them.—They will make us wise, even wise unto salvation.

But because some rules are necessary to be observed by us, to render the performance of this duty effectual to this great end; and to prevent those inconveniences which the church of Rome pretends to remedy, by prohibiting men from reading the scriptures, I proceed, 3dly, To prescribe some rules for our direction in this instance of duty.

Now, though a great variety of rules may be given for this purpose, it may be generally sufficient that we observe these:

I. That we read the scriptures frequently.

II. With attention.

III. With reverence.

IV. Without prejudice. And,

I. We must read the scriptures frequently, because from hence we shall receive the greatest assistances in understanding them. One of the best lights in interpreting what is difficult or obscure in these writings is, the comparison of one place or expression with another: now this cannot be done without a comprehensive knowledge of the scriptures, without being able to recollect the similitude of sense or expression, and readily to refer ourselves from one place to another, and this ability can no other way be obtained, than by a frequent attendance on this study. Another advantage we may expect from assiduity in this study is, that that reluctance and disaffection with which men are observed to decline and shift off this employment, will, by an habitual attendance on it, be worn off, and the duty engage us to it with pleasure and delight. How often indeed any one should apply himself to this duty, or how long continue in it, it is impossible by any general rules precisely to determine. The variety of circumstances and conditions of life is duly to be considered. One man may deserve the character of a diligent reader, while another, who is not less constant, may be guilty of remissness and negligence, if his manner of life and education give him more opportunities of attending this duty. Some men's calling, and constant labour for the necessary supplies of life, engage so large a share of their time, that they have no leisure for reading or meditation; whilst others, by the bounty of Providence, are exempted from the necessity of labouring with their own hands for their support, and have consequently more time for religious employments. Now from him who has much given, much is required; but God has not made the supplies of life so difficult to any station, but that the most engaged may find some hours of leisure for an attendance on this duty. One day at least in seven the most necessitous is discharged from his worldly employments, and required to devote himself to the service of religion; and as the intervals of divine worship on that day give us the fairest opportunities for reading and meditation, so it is a sacrilege without excuse, either to trifle them away in idleness, or profane them by secular applications. In sum, every man must be faithful and true to himself: his own conscience will inform him whether he be any time remiss in this duty or not. If he finds it a trouble to him to read and study the holy scriptures; if he frames excuses, and purposely engages himself either in business or diversion, to shift off this duty, he has reason to suspect himself of disaffection to God and his service; his own heart will remind him of his guilt, and God, who is greater than his heart, and knoweth all things, will not be imposed on by frivolous excuses. One would imagine, since these scriptures are acknowledged to be the real and measure of our actions, we should care to have them always open before our eyes, to fix them in our minds by frequent applications, and to be able, in every difficulty that occurs, to refer ourselves to this decisive standard of good and evil. But especially, since these scriptures are the words of eternal life, and the sure guide to salvation, no time should be thought too much, and no labour too great, to acquaint ourselves with their direction. This was the study that employed the royal Psalmist in all his retirements. The law of the Lord was his delight, and all the day long was his study in it. This was the knowledge he recommends to us, as more to be desired than gold, and more earnestly to be sought for than fine gold. And if the law, which was only the shadow of good things to come, deserved so high a character, and gave so much encouragement to the study of it, how much more should the writings of the gospel engage our applications, in which life and immortality are brought to light, in which our hopes are assured of everlasting felicity, and our actions directed to the attainment of it! But if we expect these advantages from the study of the scriptures, we must

II. Read them with attention. Without this indeed, barely to run over the words of scripture, in a negligent, cursory manner, is a profane disregard to the Almighty Author, whose name they bear. We owe so much respect to every common writer, whom we think ourselves concerned to read, though the subject he treats of be of less importance to us, as to allow him a fair and attentive reading, how much more then is this a duty, when the words we are reading are the words of God, when the matter they treat of is no less than our eternal happiness or misery? How little then do we regard either the majesty of the author or the importance of the subject, when with a careless precipitation we hurry over some portion of the scripture, merely because we are accustomed at such a time and such a place to do so, and dispatch it as a burdensome task imposed on us, which we want to get rid of as fast as we can? To what purpose, or with what prospect of improvement, can we read a book, the sense of which we never attend to? It is indeed equally disrespectful to these sacred oracles entirely to throw them by, and to read them with such a negligent indifference, as defeats the end for which they are written, and without that holy spirit whose authority they bear. 'A due reverence,' which is the

III. Qualification. I prescribed, and indeed secure us from falling into these abuses of negligence or inattention. The reverence, I understand that humility of mind which is due from us to our great Creator, that submission and abjection of our hearts and understandings to his divine will, which disposes us readily to comply with whatsoever he proposes to us, whether it concerns our faith or practice. So that if God reveals any truth, and commands us to believe it, we presently, and without scruple, give our assent to it, though the proposition revealed be above our capacities clearly to comprehend. To a good Christian this is a sufficient proof of any article, that God, who can neither deceive nor be deceived, has revealed it in his word. He does not reply against God, and raise doubts and questions within himself, and too curiously inquire, how can these things be, because it is impossible our finite capacities should have an exact and adequate idea of the nature and attributes of an infinite being. It is therefore our duty to submit our scriptures to the authority of the revealer, the proposition may be true, notwithstanding all objections, and since God has commanded our assent, we are bound to believe it. Should the authority of divine revelation indeed be pretended for any thing directly contradictory to the plain principles of reason, such as the doctrine of transubstantiation, it were supererogation, and not faith, to assent to it. This is a subject of which our faculties are proper judges, and if we cannot be sure that this is false, we cannot be sure that any thing is true; and therefore it is rudeness, and not reverence, to interpret the divine words in such a sense, as exposes them to the contempt of all considerate inquirers. Where there is a possibility of the proposition being true, the divine authority must decide the question. This grace of holy reverence is that temper of soul to which God has promised to impart himself in the finest communications. To the meek, mysteries are revealed; to him will God discover the hidden treasures of that wisdom which is from above. Thus saith the Lord, heaven is my throne, and the earth my footstool; but to this man will I look, to him who is poor, and of a contrite spirit, and trembleth at my word. We must not exalt ourselves against God, and make our finite reason the measure of faith and duty. We must not search for the complete law of our faith and actions in our own understandings, but in the holy scriptures, which are to be looked on and revered by us, not as the words of men, but, as they are in truth, the word of God.

But besides this reverence to God the author, there is a farther instance of our humility to be shewn, in not being too hasty and peremptory of ourselves, to determine the meaning and sense of the holy scriptures. They were, indeed, every part of them, written for instruction, and every where contain something useful and fit to be known; but then, what is absolutely necessary to be known by all, is easy to be understood by all, and is obvious and intelligible to ordinary capacities. In the mean time, there are not a few places which the wisest and best men cannot readily explain; and others which they shall never be able to interpret, till the appointed time shall come, when God shall think fit to open our eyes, and let us see clearly these sacred mysteries. With great caution therefore and humility should the ignorant and unlearned proceed, to whom many more places must be difficult and unintelligible, than to those who have greater capacities, and who have applied themselves to the study of them. I am far from desiring that any one should implicitly resign himself to the sentiments of another man, how great or how knowing never. He cannot, by any authority, be obliged to understand any words in scripture in such a sense as makes the proposition evidently false, because no authority can be argument of equal weight with the plain evidence of the thing. But then it is manifest, that he who has not learning must, in many instances of his inquiry into the sense of difficult places, be, in the result, determined by some authority or other; and when there is an order of men, qualified with all the learning that is necessary for such inquiries, and who have set themselves apart to this particular study, and are by proper authority appointed to be guides to other men, it is but reasonable, that those of less abilities and opportunities of knowledge, should first consult them, and prefer their authority to any other, to persons not so qualified, or not so appointed.

Upon the whole, this general rule should be observed, whatsoever is necessary for every man to understand, is plain to every man; and if persons of inferior capacities would content themselves with understanding and practising what is plain in the scriptures, they would perhaps do all that is strictly required of them; but if they will be curious, or have a real occasion to inquire into the meaning of more difficult places, it certainly becomes their humility to consult those whom they may modestly presume to know more than themselves. Let every one apply himself first to the study and practice of the most plain and obvious scriptures; and if his desire of divine knowledge carry him farther, let him, with the modesty of the eunuch in the Acts, desire some one, of more capacity, to lead and keep him, lest he wander out of the way. The apostle assigns this very reason to the Ephesians, of God's establishing the several orders of the ministry in the church, that they should no more be carried about with every wind of doctrine, but have a rational, though not infallible, recourse in their knowledge, for the solution of their doubts, in any question of faith or practice.

The IVth rule to be observed in consulting the scriptures is, to read them without prejudice; a fault we shall never avoid, unless we observe the former rule, and approach those sacred oracles with reverence and humility, with an open heart, and a teachable disposition.

The word of God must have its free course. To put a force upon the scriptures, and constrain them to declare on our side, and speak what they never intended in fighting against God, and doing violence to the Holy Spirit; and of this every one is guilty who comes to those writings with prejudice and prepossession. He gives a law to the scriptures, instead of making them the rule of his faith and actions; he is desirous that some beloved opinion should be true, and is therefore determined to find it there written: or he is unwilling to part with some favourite sin, and therefore resolves to find no law against it. Be the precept never so plain, he has still some distinction in itsrve, which avoids its force, and eludes its meaning. This is a vice of the greater danger to us, because it slides insensibly into our mind, and often prevails there most when it is least perceived. He is happiest who is least enslaved, for I am afraid no one is wholly free and out of its power.

Who is there who does not incline one way or the other, and would not be glad that this or that side of the question was true? antecedently to the consideration of any law or reason to determine his judgment? Who is there that does not take up something without ground, and upon trust; which because he has once espoused, he is resolved, at all adventures, afterwards to maintain? To a man thus prepossessed, it happens well, if by chance he is in the right; for if it be otherwise, he is hardly to be reclaimed. In every line he reads he finds something that sounds like an argument for his cause, and favours his opinion; and when the scales are held thus partially uneven, the slightest probabilities have the weight of demonstration.

This large and absolute is the dominion of prejudice; and, what is still the worst circumstance of this disease, the infection is found most where it least of all should appear, in the inquiries of religion. With what obstinacy may we see the heretic persist in his mistake, and how unwillingly is he brought to retract what he has once asserted? With what shifts and evasions will he put by the evidence of truth? And what weak pretences will he lay hold of to maintain an opinion he has undertaken to defend? And even at last, when he can support it no longer by argument, he is often as for soon owning his error as before. He will hold out against the clearest light, and resist even conviction itself. But this is a temper which must unavoidably deprive us of all the advantages of our reading and application; and how far soever we are under the dominion of this passion, so far we are unqualified for the study of the holy scriptures. To these qualifications I will add—but one thing more as necessary, and that is fervent prayer to Almighty God, that he would assist our applications with his Holy Spirit; that he open our understandings, enlighten our ignorance, and lead us into the knowledge of his truth, and give us grace, that we may in such wise hear, mark, learn, and inwardly digest his holy word; that the fruit of them may appear in an orthodox faith, and a regular practice of all Christian graces.

But there is still one thing farther the apostle recommends to us in the words of my text; and that is,

4thly, An early education in this study.

The first advantage I shall mention, of being applied to this study when we are children, is, that then we generally read under the direction of a guide, who can explain the doctrines, recommend the precepts, preserve us from error, and encourage us in duty.

For though God has appointed the ministers of his word to be as fountains of knowledge for the recourse of his people, to be at all times ready to assist their ignorance in whatever difficulties may occur to them in the study of these oracles; yet when men are arrived to the age of manhood, they are either too much ashamed to own their ignorance, to apply for these assistances, or too confident of their own abilities to believe they want them: it is therefore of great advantage to us to be inured to these directions, when the mind is humble and modest, and disposed to receive and obey instruction.

But the happiness of an early education in this knowledge, will more fully appear if we consider its tendency to give success to this study. And 1st, What we apply ourselves to in our early years, will particularly engage our attention. The first passions that appear in the soul are insatiable desires of knowledge and happiness. While the capacities are empty and unfurnished, the novelty of every thing proposed to us, and the authority of the teacher, imprint the subject on our mind in the deepest characters, and command the attention of every faculty: but especially, if it is represented to us as a subject of great importance to our felicity, the mind is then eager and importunate in its inquiries, and every capacity of the soul is opened to receive its direction to happiness. But when this study has been neglected in our minority, our thoughts are distracted, by a variety of other speculations, we are prepossessed in favour of other schemes of happiness, and it is with reluctance we are brought to hearken to any fresh proposals. And as what we are employed in when children, particularly engages our attention; so,

2dly, It is received with peculiar impressions of awe and veneration. Father and master are names of so much authority with us, in that governable part of our life, that whatever system of religion, or rule of action, they propose to our observance, is revered as infallible. It is then the scriptures are most effectually recommended to us, under the venerable character of the word of God; and the natural force of education will incline us to treat them with the same respect in the future part of our lives. If indeed we consider the force of an early education in the knowledge of the scriptures, with regard to the fourth qualification I prescribed for reading them, a freedom from prejudice, the same arguments that recommend it as a foundation of reverence, seem equally to dissuade it as the occasion of all those prejudices, which afterwards obstruct the freedom of our inquiries. But this, only is an accidental effect, and may be very much prevented by the care of our first directors. Or if it be impossible (as I am afraid it is) to preserve the mind clear from all prepossessions, this indeed is an argument for choosing persons of knowledge and honesty, to be employed in this province, and eminent for their care and assiduity in the discharge of it: but when this is provided for, it is certainly an insupportable happiness to the child to be engaged on the side of truth, and furnished with a set of principles, which the strictest examinations of his reason must afterwards approve and confirm.

But it is farther observable, that the ill effect of these early prejudices, appears chiefly in the speculative points of religion. The practical rules, indeed, of the scripture are so clear and obvious, that neither the instructor nor the pupil can easily mistake them. It is only from habits of vice, and an unwillingness to find a favourite passion disapproved, that we are induced to prevaricate with the precepts of scripture; and consequently, since an early education in the knowledge and esteem of them, is the most effectual method to inure us to the practice of those duties they prescribe, it must be acknowledged as the likeliest means to secure us from mistake, in assigning the meaning of them. Nay, farther, if we examine into the reasons of men's obstinacy in the defence even of those speculative errors, it will be often found that either the errors themselves are such as tend to palliate some practical immorality, or that men adhere to them rather out of pride, and affectation of singularity, or a disdain of retracting what they have once asserted, than from a serious and rational persuasion of the truth of them: and consequently, since, as I observed, an early education in the study of the scriptures is the most probable method to engage us to practise that meekness, humility, and the other moral graces they prescribe; it is a remedy equally effectual to preserve us from the greater part of these speculative errors; and whatever mistake can consist with the sincere exercise of these virtues, is of no great danger to our happiness, and consequently of no great concern whether it be prevented or not.

Upon the whole, as the study of the scriptures is in general commanded to all men, so an early application to this study is particularly encouraged and recommended to us. This is the proper season of discipline and instruction; and whoever, through misfortune or negligence, has wanted this direction, his early years, must return back to the modesty and humility of that age, before he is qualified to receive the doctrines of the gospel. Verily, verily, (says our Saviour,) whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, he shall not enter therein. To conclude,

The holy scriptures are the noblest and most entertaining employment of every period of our age, and every condition of our life. We may there hear God speak to us, and live. We have there the most infallible directions to duty, and the most animating encouragements in the performance of it. Every infirmity of our nature is there prescribed its proper remedy, and every affliction of life is supplied with proper consolations. The just is there confirmed, the sinner reclaimed, and the penitent revived with offers of pardon; and every sincere and faithful servant of Jesus Christ is supported in all the difficulties and labours of obedience, with the assurance of a glorious immortality.

The Folly of making a Mock at Sin.

Fools make a Mock at Sin.

It is methinks a little mortifying to the profane and irreligious, who set up for more refined parts, more accurate thinking, and a deeper penetration than other men, to find so great and so wise a prince as Solomon, who had considered human life with so much attention, constantly ranking them under an opposite character, and treating them as fools. This imputation he not only asserts, but proves from a particular examination of their principles and conduct; and in my text shews it from this instance of their folly, their making a mock at sin.

By which it is not meant, that they affect to expose the vices of their own life and practice as absurd and ridiculous. Nor is theirillery directed against the laws of virtue and religion, which forbid them. The actions prohibited by these laws they are ready enough to approve and defend; but what they endeavour to make a mock at is the sin, the consideration of these actions under that frightful idea, and being deterred from the commission of them as forbidden by God.

One would wonder indeed, what motive should induce the libertine part of the world to be so solicitous as they are, either to argue or laugh the rest of mankind out of the restraints of virtue and religion. The interest even of their vices themselves seems rather to persuade of other conduct. For it is certainly a great advantage to them, in their pursuits of the honours, the wealth, or pleasures of life, to have other men limited by fixed and stated rules; to know exactly within what bounds they are confined; how far they can go, and where they must stop; and to be able to ascertain the point, beyond which they are secure from their competition, while they themselves are free from all rules, and at liberty to make use of any expedients that appear conducive to their designs. But here lies the secret: the libertine can have no rational conviction, and consequently no rational acquiescence, in the principles he acts on. A consciousness of guilt and its natural attendant, shame, hang about him, do what he can. To guard against these troublesome sentiments which haunt and interrupt his pleasures, he finds it necessary to gain the applause and approbation of men to his conduct. It is the peculiar privilege of virtue and innocence to be able to stand alone. He who is secure in the approbation of God, can despise the scorn and contradiction of the whole world; but wickedness is naturally timorous. The libertine finds himself unsupported from within, and is therefore solicitous to confirm his diffidence, and remove his shame, by the countenance and esteem of men. Now while the fear of God, and the reverence of his laws, retain their due force in the world, these men are sure of being marked out with general abhorrence and detestation. Before they can expect any favourable regard or credit with mankind, they must dispossess them of these rigid principles, and soften their aver-signs from sin. And by what methods must this be effected? Serious reasoning the cause of vice will not bear; but if they can give a ludicrous turn to the argument, and, by a mixture of wit with their profaneness, raise a laugh on their side; they succeed as far as they desire; for they know very well, that what men can be prevailed on to laugh at, they are not apt, in any great degree, either to hate or fear. Their dread of sin, and aversion from the sinner, will be gradually lessened by these impressions; and if, under any character, we can be reconciled to the friendship, and be pleased with the conversation of the criminal, we shall not be very much offended with his crimes. To correct this profane levity in those who are guilty of it, and to guard others from its impression, I shall endeavour to confirm the assertion of Solomon, That it is extreme folly thus to make a mock at sin.

But first, it may be proper to premise, that these mockers at sin may be distinguished under two characters. Either they are such as ridicule all fear of offending God, and in consequence all religion, as weakness and superstition; and these can be no other than professed atheists: or such as care not to go quite so great a length as this. Some crimes they will acknowledge to expose us to the anger of God, and to be justly odious to men; but others, such as they indulge in their own practice, or would encourage in others, they represent as light and trivial escapes; matters of jest rather than of conscience, and not deserving a serious consideration. But the folly of both these attempts against religion must appear, if we consider,

I. What sin is.

II. What consequences must attend making a mock or jest of it.

Now sin, in the notion which religion gives of it, is the transgression of a reasonable, holy, and righteous law, prescribed to our conduct by the Author of our being, on whose pleasure all that we have, and all that we hope for, depends; the reproach of our reason, which it contradicts; the abhorrence of our God, whose power and authority it defies, and whose guilt, no less a sacrifice than the blood of the Son of God himself could expiate.

Consider it in its effects, and we find it the parent and cause of all the misery we either feel or fear. It was sin that degraded our nature from the perfection in which it was created; that debased us from a glory little inferior to the angels, into that weak, passionate, and ignorant creature we now are; that brought death into the world, and opened all the paths of sorrow that lead to it. All these are the fruits and wages of sin. But it has still more terrible effects than these: it pursues us into another world, and will there be attended with everlasting penalties; horror and torments which shall never have an end. And can this dreadful evil be a proper subject for sport and drollery? Can we permit ourselves to laugh at what enrages the anger of our God against us, what nailed our friend and patron to the cross, what daily crucifies the Son of God afresh, and puts him to an open shame, and what, unless atoned for by the tears of repentance, will ruin our whole nature, and cast both body and soul into hell?

To him who calls himself a Christian, sin, under these characters, must appear the most hateful and terrible of all evils. If he believes that gospel which he professes, he knows that the wrath of God shall be revealed from heaven, against all unrighteousness of men; that no sin shall escape the notice or resentment of his Judge, but be avenged in eternal inflictions. When he reflects on these serious truths, he will find little inclination to treat any sin as a light and ludicrous thing; and make a jest at what may possibly be his own or another's damnation. The atheistical scoffers at sin indeed make a mock at these consequences of it too; ridicule them as morries invented to frighten mankind; the artifices of the crafty, or the dreams of superstition. But, alas! they will one day find that there is a God, just and terrible in his judgments! when all their jollity shall be changed into trembling, and their laughter into weeping and gnashing of teeth.

In the mean time, let us condescend so far to the libertine, as to argue with him upon his own principles. Let us consider sin only under its present consequences, and see whether he be so wise as he thinks himself, in making a mock at it.

Now, what is it that embroils human society, disturbs the peace, order, and happiness of the world, but sin? Whence come wars and fightings among us, discord and contention, fraud and oppression, and all the sad effects of malice, envy, avarice, or revenge, but from the ungoverned lusts and passions of men? The far greater part of the complaints of the miserable, when traced to their proper source, will be found to arise either from their own, or other men's transgressing the laws of God. To laugh at sin therefore is to laugh at misery, to laugh where a wise man ought to mourn. It argues indeed somewhat worse than folly, a baseness and inhumanity of temper, and an enmity to mankind, for a man to delight and sport himself with public mischief. Should we see a man playing with serpents, and jesting with scorpions, could we be diverted with the sight? Would not the natural passions arising in us upon such a sight, be pity for the ignorance, and concern for the danger, of the man? Or if we apprehend any malice in the action, a design to persuade others to venture on these perilous liberties, should we not abominate the wickedness of the intention, and with zeal and indignation oppose the success of it? And can we with patience behold a profane wretch playing with the sting of death, endeavouring to abolish the dread of sin, and persuade men to divert themselves with present misery, and future damnation? Folly, in its common notion, is too mild and gentle an imputation for such a conduct; we must aggravate the idea, and add to it some odious and detestable images, before it will express it. That even in its highest and worst sense, it will properly be applied to this practice, will further appear to us, if we

II. Consider the consequences of making a mock at sin.

Now the general consequences of this practice must be the prevailing of sin and unrighteousness in the world. The passions of mankind lead them, by a strong propensity, to what is forbidden. Our appetites are always calling upon us to reach out our hand, and taste something out of the inviting scene of pleasure that passes by us; and the devil is ever suggesting to us, we may do it safely, we shall not surely die; and all the fences and guards of religion are found little enough to withhold our compliance. All the restraint we are or can be under is from them. Were it not for the fear of offending God, exposing ourselves to his displeasure, and incurring the penalties of his laws, every kind of wickedness would soon prevail, and, like a torrent which has broke its bounds, overspread the face of the earth; and consequently, whatever weakens these restraints, must, in the same proportion, occasion the increase and overflowing of all ungodliness. Now what can more effectually contribute to this evil than making a mock at sin, laughing at that formidable notion under which it ought to be considered, and representing it only as a petty indiscretion, a light and ludicrous thing? The idea of the action is perfectly changed by this disguise; the proper penalties of it are hid out of sight, and only a trifling inconvenience from the railery of men substituted in the place of them. A penalty (if it may be called one) which will give the sinner but little apprehension, for few are disposed to think they want wit; and if they can but turn the jest upon such a reprover as this, they are sufficiently guarded against any uneasiness they can fear from him. The fear of God, and the dread of his resentments, are (as I observed) the only effectual restraints from sin. But to keep up the sense and impression of this principle, it is necessary that men should every where meet with some apparent effects of it. When they see, in all about them, a reverent apprehension of the divine presence and authority; when they hear them, on all occasions, express an awful regard to his laws, and instead of laughter or applause, entertain the transgression of them with serious reproof and abhorrence, it gives a quick and lively influence to the fear of God. It will reclaim the modest, and check even the most profligate sinner. The very shame of appearing less conscientious, less restrained from wickedness than other men, will at least correct the open insolence of impiety, and keep the public example within some bounds of decency and sobriety. But when the transgressions of God's laws are agreed where made light of; when in the world fashion, to treat sin only as a matter of jest, and pleasantry, neither shame nor conscience will be able to preserve their proper force. The libertine will no longer affect to conceal his crimes, and even the virtuous will be tempted to remit of their zeal, abate their opposition, and, by an undue compliance with the stream, avoid the reproach of affectation and singularity.

It is to be hoped indeed, that the natural reluctances of reason and conscience, will generally guard men against the scoffers of the first kind; the open atheists, who ridicule all fear of God, all restraints of virtue and religion, and, in effect, all distinctions of good and evil. Mankind must be corrupt, even beyond example, before they can, with pleasure or patience, endure such insults on common sense and virtue. But there are mockers of another character, whose success is more to be feared; men who will permit you to keep a reserve of religion, will pretend to agree with you in detesting some crimes, but persuade you to think others only ludicrous amusements, which it is weakness and superstition to abstain from yourselves, and a morose, unconvertible severity to censure in your neighbours. Now this is a temptation to which we are exceedingly open. We are fond of any overture of compounding matters with God, and will give him any equivalent for a favourite sin; and therefore, when we are persuaded to believe the sins to which the solicitations of friends, popular fashion, or our own appetites, particularly lead us, to be trifles of no moment; and that other observances, from which we have no aversion, will secure to us the expectations of duty, the delusion is not easily resisted. But how fatal must the consequences of these notions be to public virtue, wherever they are entertained? For, while every one will be for bringing his own vices within the indulgence as trifles, not meriting a serious regard, whatever restraint each private person may lay upon himself, the public example will be under none at all. Every vice will have its patrons, be represented equally trifling, equally reputable, till we will be neither ashamed nor afraid to any; and all restraint of sobriety of carriage, and even the distinction of vice and virtue, shall be laughed out of the world. These are the natural consequences of making a mock at any sin.

And can it consist with reason and wisdom to advance such a scheme as this? To let loose all the wild passions of corrupt nature, to range and sport themselves through the earth? What deluge or pestilence can make so much havoc and distraction in the world, or be so pernicious to the peace and interests of human society? In Solomon's image of this folly, it is like a man who scatters arrows, fire-bands and death, and says, am I not in sport? And what does the fool gain to himself by the success of his attempt, but a share in the common calamities he occasions? Perhaps with fools like himself he may obtain the applause and reputation of an impudent wit; but from all serious and good men, from all who have any regard for the honour of God, for the salvation of men's souls, or for the virtue and welfare of their country, indignation and abhorrence; and from God, the righteous avenger of all, contempt of his laws, the severest inflictions of his wrath, a place in the nethermost hell, with the great seducer and corrupter of mankind, whose kingdom and interests he has served. The time will come when he shall know and feel, that all the laws of God are the solemn injunctions of almighty power; that the penalties annexed to them are the immutable determinations of infinite justice. When sickness of age shall set the terrors of the Lord before him, with what regret and astonishment will he reflect on those sins which are now the subject of his mirth and drollery? With what agonies of remorse will he then remember how he has gloried in his shame, and beseech that majesty whom he has provoked, that the sorrow of the penitent may atone for the laughter of the fool?

From these reflections I hope it may appear to us, how much we are obliged in duty, and concerned in interest, to correct and oppose this vain, irreligious humour of mocking at sin. If we seriously attend to the considerations I have suggested, the nature and consequences of sin, the authority that forbids it, the penalties threatened to it, the misery it derives on mankind in this world, and the damnation that awaits it in another, it is impossible we should think lightly of it, either in ourselves or others. We may, with as much reason and sobriety, make a jest of a pestilence, and laugh at our own or our country's ruin. If the sins we treat with this levity are committed by other men, we make ourselves partakers with them; but if they are our own, we inflame the resentment, and double the guilt of them. For he who is ashamed of his sin confesses still the justice and obligation of the law he transgresses; some seeds of grace are yet alive in him, which by due culture and application may be improved to his recovery; his example at least is less infective, and if he perishes in his iniquity, he falls alone, and does not involve others in his ruin; but he who laughs and sports at his sin, not only offends, but defies God; he declares against the authority, and disowns the obligation, of his laws. Such a conduct darts light and discovery: the sinner triumphs and glories in his crimes, and forms a party against religion, and therefore will be answerable not only for his own commissions, but for the thousands that fall besides him, and the ten thousands whom he encourages in the same impious presumptions.

In order to check this growing evil, and restrain an offence so provoking to God, and so pernicious in its effects, on the virtue and happiness of mankind, let us every one, with a serious and fixed attention, reflect on that holy and dreadful presence before whom we stand; that the eyes of our Judge are always over us, attend our going out and our coming in, behold, observe, and record every action of our lives. Let us remember, that for every idle word we must give an account to his justice; that even the most innocent parts of our mirth will escape well, if they are reckoned among our pardonable infirmities. But where things serious and sacred, where God and religion, where the transgression of his laws, and the penalties he has annexed to them, are the subjects of an impious mirth, be we aware these things are noted in his book with the deepest characters of guilt, and will be resented with fury poured out. What God hates, he requires us to hate also; and to express our allegiance to his kingdom, and our affection to his service, by an open and public denunciation of what offends him. If we can be guilty ourselves of the levity I have been speaking of, or if we sit passively, and let others affront his majesty, and laugh at his displeasure, must he not look upon us as traitors to his interests, and in confederacy with his enemies? Let us, then, appear with zeal in the cause of God, and declining virtue, and not suffer our religion, which no arguments can shake, to be jested out of the world by the raillery of fools. Let neither the wit nor figure of the criminal prevail with us by applause to encourage, or by silence to approve his profane liberties; but let us treat every sin with the resentment it deserves, and every offender with reproof and correction. If those among us who truly fear God, and are concerned for his honour, would unite in such a conduct, the effect of it would soon appear. Virtue would resume courage and confidence, and vice be driven to covert and retirement. Credit and applause would attend religion, and shame would be the promotion of fools. But whether the attempt succeeds in these effects or not, let us remember that God requires it at our hands; will acknowledge and reward our honest zeal, and make us large amends for any inconvenience we can suffer from it. But if either through shame or cowardice we decline this duty, of us shall the Son of Man be ashamed, before his Father and the holy angels.

SERMON LV.

By Dr. ROGERS.

Virtue and Piety our best Security.

1 PET. iii. 13, 14.

Who is he that will harm you, if ye be followers of that which is good?
But, and if you suffer for righteousness sake, happy are ye.

THIS epistle the apostle of the circumcision addresses to the Jews of the dispersion, after he and Paul had agreed upon their distinct provinces in the work of the gospel. He begins with exhorting them to a general purity of life, and holiness in all manner of conversation, from a variety of Christian motives; from the expectation of that inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, reserved for them in heaven; from the holiness of that God who had called them, the regeneration they professed, and the dignity of that relation into which they were adopted, being as lively stones built up in a spiritual house, an holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifice, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ. To these motives he proceeds to add this consideration, that by such a conduct they would engage the esteem of those who were without, the Gentiles, among whom they lived; that whereas they were ready to speak against them as evil-doers by beholding their good works, they might be induced to glorify God. He then descends to some duties of a more especial tendency to produce these good effects, such as obedience of subjects to their civil governors, and of servants to their masters, and that not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward. He then presses, as recommended by the same arguments, the relative duties between husband and wife; and finally, a general unanimity among the brethren, an affectionate love and tenderness towards each other, and pity and courteousness towards all men. And to the motives before suggested he farther adds, that a compliance with the commands of the gospel in these instances of duty, was the most effectual way to secure their outward quiet and happiness; for thus the Psalmist had assured them: He that will love life, and see good days, let him refrain his tongue from evil, and his lips that they speak no guile: Let him eschew evil, and do good: let him seek peace and ensue it: For the eyes of the Lord are over the righteous, and his ears are open to their prayers. And besides the assurance which the promise of God gave them, that these effects should attend such a behaviour as he recommended, they might conclude it from the natural tendency of the duties themselves; for who is he that shall harm you, if ye be followers of that which is good? But, and if it should happen otherwise; if notwithstanding all their care and innocence, the malice and wickedness of men should return evil for good, and persecute them for doing their duty, they might then take to themselves this great satisfaction, that they suffered for righteousness sake, and were entitled, by the promises of the gospel to a distinguished measure of reward. The conclusions which manifestly arise to us from this scripture are,

I. That a steady practice of the duties prescribed by the gospel, is the wisest and most effectual provision against those afflictions which are derived on us from the malice and passions of men. Nevertheless,

II. That this provision will not always be effectual to secure us from these afflictions; that the innocent, notwithstanding this defence, will sometimes suffer, yea suffer for being innocent. But then,

III. He who has made this provision, will find support, and even happiness, under the worst that can befall him, from this reflection, that he suffers for righteousness sake.

And, I. We are here taught, That a steady practice of the duties prescribed by the gospel, is our wisest and most effectual provision against all those afflictions which are derived on us from the malice and passions of other men. And how large a portion of that scene of misery which occurs to us in human life, is to be assigned to this class, we need no other proof than our own daily observation and experience. Let us examine the several tribes of mourners whom we meet in the world; let us attend to the cries of the oppressed, to the destitute exile, or the solitary captive in the dungeon; in sum, let us inquire into the source of all those various instances of public or private calamities which afflict mankind; and we shall soon be convinced, that the far greater number of them are owing to the tyranny, or malice, the envy, treachery, or revenge of unrighteous men. Now, from these evils, no skill or cunning of the world can give us a security, equal to that prescribed to us by our holy religion: for, in the first place, if we serve and please God in the duties of our stations, he himself (as the apostle here observes from the psalmist) has promised to be our protector. That Almighty Power, in whose hands are all events of life; who directs the wills, and over-rules the passions of men; has assured us, that his eyes are over the righteous, that no evil shall come nigh his dwelling, neither shall the wicked approach to hurt him, and that he will make even his enemies to be at peace with him. But the apostle, in my text, particularly directs us to observe, that the duties enjoined by the gospel, are in their nature a guard and security to us from these evils.

So long as the distinctions of good and evil are acknowledged in the world, the actions commanded by our holy religion must be approved under the former character. Now this distinction was not made; and these opposite characters affixed to the actions of men, from a mere speculative and abstract consideration of their nature, but with a manifest relation to their effects, and the influence they had on the happiness of mankind. Those actions were by general consent denominated good, which conduce to private and social felicity; and those evil, which disturbed the peace of the world, or were injurious to the public or private interests of men. But among all the schemes of morality which have been recommended to the world, none ever appeared so exactly calculated for the happiness of men as that revealed and enjoined in the gospel. Natural reason approves the justness and excellency of every precept in it, and wherever it had before differed from these directions, is forced to acknowledge its own error. We may therefore conclude, that a conduct agreeable to these excellent rules of life, must lay a general obligation on the gratitude of mankind, and procure esteem and benevolence to the man whom it adorns. The most savage and wicked disposition cannot but discern something lovely and endearing in the meek and merciful, the affable and courteous, in the man who goes about doing good, and who extends his charity even to his enemies. The villain himself feels a secret impression of awe when he approaches so venerable a character: he cannot injure him without some remorse, and his hand strikes with reluctance.

But the protection of this character will especially appear to us, if we consider, that the most barbarous temper oftener exerts itself under the appearance of revenge, than of voluntary and unprovoked mischief, and will always endeavour to plead in its defence the resentment of some real or seeming injury. Now, if our conduct be governed by the inoffensive rules of the gospel, we have the security of provoking none. The meek, the humble, the patient disciple of Christ, not only defrauds, injures, or oppresses no man, but has every passion under government and discipline, and consequently raises no enemy to himself by contempt, none by censure, none by envy. His pursuits of this life are calm and inoffensive. He does not willingly cross the projects, or break into the schemes, of the worldly and ambitious; and if he happens to be engaged in a competition (as sometimes he unavoidably may be) he confines himself to the bounds of justice and sobriety; his disputes are managed without fierceness and bitterness, without slander and detraction; and though he cannot permit himself to acknowledge right to be wrong, justice to be injustice, yet rather than be the occasion of any extensive evil, or of hindering any general good, he is prepared to give up his own interests, and recede even from the most equitable pretensions. He will avoid, in the whole course of his actions, not only what is really evil, but also, so far as it is possible, all appearance of it. This is the temper, and this will be the conduct, of all who sincerely obey the gospel, and are truly influenced by the spirit of it: a conduct which, so far as any rules of life can effect it, must disarm malice itself, must reconcile the friendship and affections of men to us, and not only give the wicked no provocation to harm us, but in a great measure disable him from doing it. A general esteem is itself a real protection. The injuries offered to a good man will be resented with an universal detestation, and every man's hand will be armed against him who inflicts them.

The protection of this character will appear still farther, if we recollect that the most considerable injuries we can receive, must be inflicted under some colour of justice, with the pretence of executing public laws, or at least within the covert of them. For though we should suppose all esteem for virtue, all regards of conscience, to be cut off by men, yet malice itself will be under some restraint from the civil laws of every community, and not care to expose itself to the penalties of them. Now the ends of society require, that the laws of every community should in general intend the defence and encouragement of those who do well, and the terror and punishment of evil doers. Laws, as the apostle observes, are not made for the righteous and good, but for the lawless and unruly, for the unjust and the oppressor, for the murderers of fathers, and the murderers of mothers, for the liar and the perjured, and if there be any other thing that is contrary to sound doctrine. But against the just and the merciful, the temperate and the peaceable; against such there is no law. And consequently, they who are followers of that which is good, have not only the general protection of innocence, but act under the professed favour and defence of all laws; neither can they be brought under censure from them, unless their conduct be represented under some character of evil: an attempt of some difficulty, even to the subtlest malice, and which will not very often succeed, where the action is perfectly conformable to the rules of the gospel. Something or other will generally be found wanting, such prudence and circumspection at least, such guard against appearances as our religion advises, where an innocent person or action is in the ordinary course of justice rendered obnoxious to the law.

Let us suppose the case which was chiefly in the apostle's view, that the civil government should disavour us as it did the first Christians; these must be acknowledged to be circumstances in which our religion can give us the least protection; yet, if we be followers of that which is good, if we act up to the holy rules we profess, if we obey our superiors as far as our religion directs, if we mind our own business, confine ourselves to the duties of our station, and be pure and peaceable as we are commanded to be, such a conduct must be attended with the utmost security, that such circumstances can possibly admit: we shall, in a great measure, cut off all occasion, even from those who seek occasion, that they may have whereof to accuse us. And the most tyrannical government must not only be without any just offence from such a behaviour, but it must break through all those rules on which the happiness of society depends, and even act against its own true interests before it can harm us. From what has been suggested on this head, I presume it may appear, that a conduct of life agreeable to the precepts of our religion, not only recommends us to the special protection of God, but naturally engages the friendship and inclination of mankind to us, puts us under the defence of a general esteem, offers no provocation to malice itself, and very much restrains even its power to hurt us, and consequently is our best security against the effects of it.

But a perfect exemption from injuries, the present condition of human life will not permit us to hope for; and therefore the apostle must not be here understood as affirming universally, and without exception, that if we are followers of that which is good, it will be impossible for any one to harm us. It was sufficient to his purpose of recommending innocence and virtue as our wisest choice, if the rule generally holds; if innocence is better guarded, and less exposed, and affords upon the whole a greater security, than the most refined expedients of secular cunning can give us without it. Unless the assertion were thus limited, it could not be reconciled to those many predictions of Christ and his apostles, by which they prepared their converts for distress and persecution from a prejudiced world, and would be refuted in the example of their own most holy life and bitter sufferings. In prevention of all mistake therefore, it is

II. Here supposed by the apostle, that the provision he recommends will not always prove effectual, but that the righteous may sometimes suffer, yea suffer for righteousness sake. And this we shall easily account for, if we consider,

1st, That there always were, and ever will be, some men so exceedingly wicked, so abandoned to their lusts and passions, as to break through all the bonds of gratitude, and even nature itself, in grati-cation of them; such as murderers of fathers, and murderers of mothers; and from these the most venerable innocence cannot always be a protection, 2dly, That our good actions will not always appear in their proper character, notwithstanding our greatest care. A very good man may want some degrees of prudence, and a very good action some circumstances which may be necessary to place them in a due light; and therefore it may not appear strange to us if they are sometimes mistaken, and opposed even by men, who are in general lovers of those who are good, and friends to virtue. All moral virtue, we know, consists in a medium, and is on either side parted as it were but by a line, from its opposite vices: and when the action approaches on either side to the line of partition, it is easy even for a good man to mistake it, and much easier for malice to represent it as an excess, and expose it to the reproach and penalties of a transgression. We must reflect,

3dly, That no human virtue is perfect, without a mixture of some real failings and imperfections. Surprise, weakness, or passion, will sometimes betray the best of us into actions not defensible; and these we must always expect to be aggravated by the enemies of virtue, and represented to our greatest disadvantage. They are fond of lessening the disparity of their own character, and bringing the virtuous down to a level with themselves; and therefore they never fail of objecting such defects in a good man as a proof of his hypocrisy, that his vices are really as great as their own, and only the more dangerous, for being covered under a pretence of virtue. When we attend to these reflections, we cannot be surprised if good men and good actions are sometimes mistaken, often misrepresented, and suffer what is only due to evil actions and evil-doers.

And this we may apply particularly to what, as I observed, was chiefly in the apostle's view in the scripture before us: the resentments of the public magistrate, whose power extending farther than all other men's, the inflictions of it must be the greatest of temporal evils, and the mistaken applications of it the greatest of temporal injuries.

Now when we consider that our actions cannot come to the notice of persons in that high station, but as they are brought to them by report of others, and that generally through several successive conveyances; and that if any one of these be partial or unjust, our behaviour cannot appear to them in its proper character: if we observe at the same time by how many strong passions of interest, ambition, or revenge, they who court the favour of a prince are tempted to discredit others, to represent them as evil-doers, unfit for his trust, disaffected to his person and government, and enemies to the civil peace; how easy it is for malice to find or make colours for such suggestions, how irresistibly are they infused by continual applications, and how difficultly removed by those who are accused? When, I say, we take these and many other circumstances, which will easily occur to us, into our thoughts, we cannot wonder if even good princes are sometimes imposed on, and provoked to treat as evil-doers persons of the greatest merit and innocence. It was by these evil arts and insinuations that not only a Nero and a Domitian, but even a Trajan and Antoninus, merciful and virtuous princes, were prevailed on to persecute a religion, the most harmless and inoffensive, and the most friendly to government that ever appeared in the world.

Nay, sometimes it must be expected to happen, that virtue itself may be the direct and immediate occasion of our suffering. We have before observed, that wicked men have even by principle and constitution a secret antipathy to good men, by which they are prepared to do every thing that may lessen their esteem, and render them vile and infamous in the eyes of the world: and as punishment is in common opinion a presumption of guilt, in the same proportion that wicked men are possessed of power, good men must expect to suffer. Their virtue itself renders them offensive to men hardened in a contrary disposition; their lives are a continual reproach to vice, and their actions must often in a course of duty cross upon the schemes and obstruct the designs of unrighteous power. It is a common remark of the Roman historians, that under some of their bad emperors, it was a dangerous thing to be virtuous, and that ~~men~~ were forced to dissemble their merit, and distinguish themselves by some fashionable vices, to avoid the jealousy and resentments of those in power: but this our holy religion will never permit us to do. If we thus please men, we cannot also be the servants of Christ. We are not at liberty to decline the obedience we owe to any one command of God, in compliment to the passions of men. And if the duties of our station require us to stand in the gap, and oppose ourselves to the overflowing of ungodliness, to succour the injured, and appear in defence of the oppressed, we are bound to act up to the occasion, though in every such case it is evident that our religion and virtue will be so far from a protection to us, that it must provoke the utmost resentment from the powers of the world, and derive the whole storm of their wrath upon our heads.

Blessed be God the fundamental laws of our constitution, and the justice of our government, secure us, as far as we are capable of being secured in this world, from all apprehensions of this kind, and encourage us to hope that innocence and virtue, a firm adherence to the faith and duties of our religion, cannot suffer among us under public resentment, but through such mistakes or misrepresentations as no human polity can provide against. But the case before supposed is manifestly possible. The sword of the magistrate has been even intentionally drawn against virtue and religion, and therefore may be again: and should we set this case wholly aside; yet when we consider how often public justice, and the most upright administration, will be imposed on by invidious suggestions, how impossible it is to guard against false accusations supported by perjury, and that so long as malice or ambition, envy or revenge, are found among mankind, instances will not be wanting of these unrighteous practices; we may be sure to find at all times ground enough for the supposition in my text, that the innocent may sometimes suffer, nay suffer even for righteousness sake.

Upon the whole then it appears,

That the preceding assertion of the apostle is to be taken, with its proper restriction, as generally not universally true. Generally, and in the ordinary course of things, they, who are followers of that which is good, will be protected from harm, and therefore, notwithstanding these exceptions, virtue and innocence are our wisest choice, and render us far more secure both from private and public injuries, than they can be who trust in the unrighteous arts of worldly cunning, and strengthen themselves in their ungodliness. And this was surely enough to recommend such a conduct to our choice and preference: more certainly than is here implied, the maxims of human life, and the wisest directions for present happiness, will not admit of. But the apostle carries the argument still farther; and supposing the worst that can befall us in exception to his general rule, yet still he persuades us to be followers of that which is good: for if we have made this provision, if we have with us a conscience void of offence, we shall find support and even matter of joy, from this reflection, that we suffer for righteousness sake, and be induced to think the affliction itself an honour and happiness to us. Which is the third general conclusion from my text, which I proposed to insist on: a doctrine of great importance, and which deserves to be farther enlarged on, than the present opportunity will permit.

SERMON LVI.

By Dr. ROGERS.

Virtue and Piety our best Security.

1 PET. III. 15, 16.

Who is he that will harm you, if ye be followers of that which is good?
But, and if you suffer for righteousness sake, happy are ye.

THE import of this scripture I proposed to consider in these three conclusions, which seemed fully to comprehend the intention of the holy writer.

I. That a steady practice of the duties prescribed by the gospel, is the wisest and most effectual provision against those evils which we are exposed to from the malice and passions of men. Nevertheless,

II. That this provision will not always be effectual to secure us from those evils that the innocent, notwithstanding this defence, may sometimes suffer, yea suffer for being innocent. But then,

III. He who has made this provision will find support, and even happiness, under the worst that can befall him, from this reflection, that he suffers for righteousness sake.

In treating the former of these heads, I endeavoured to shew, that the good and virtuous have a special interest in the protection of God: that the conduct of life, implied in this character, is itself a security to us, that the duties enjoined by our religion are, in their nature, such as not only offer no provocation to malice itself, but very much restrain its power to harm us: such as recommend us to general favour and esteem, and oblige the gratitude of mankind to shew kindness and benevolence towards us; such as put us under the professed protection of all laws, and which it is the interest of the magistrate to defend and encourage. But then,

II. I observed, that this general conclusion admits several exceptions. That we must sometimes expect our good to be evil spoken of, misunderstood even by good men, and invidiously represented by wicked men; and under these appearances of evil, be attended with public or private resentments, and derive on us such treatment as is due only to evil-doers. Nay, that sometimes our virtue itself may be the occasion of our sufferings, and a firm perseverance in duty, the immediate provocation of wicked men to harm us.

And therefore, to obviate these objections, and render the persuasion of the apostle, to follow that which is good, complete and effectual, it is necessary for us to attend to what he suggests in the

III^d place, That if we have made the provision he recommends, if we have been followers of that which is good, though our innocence may sometimes fail of protecting us from sufferings, it will give us a full equivalent in supporting us under them; nay, we may find reasons not only to bear the affliction with patience, but even to esteem ourselves happy, whenever we suffer for righteousness sake.

The application of this noble motive of our religion, is what I reserved for your present meditations.

And because the foundation of this support under sufferings, is the innocence of the sufferer, and men are apt to take to themselves the comfort of suffering for righteousness sake when they have no title to this plea; and either through partiality or hypocrisy pretend conscience and obedience to God when they really suffer as evil-doers, it will be proper for us, 1st, To inquire when we may be satisfied that we suffer for righteousness sake.

I shall then shew,

2dly, The support and comfort which will arise to us from this reflection, whenever we can truly apply it to our sufferings.

As to injuries of a private nature, which flow from the malice of particular men, if we have given just provocations of resentment, or such as, in a common estimate of the passions of mankind, may be expected to irritate their revenge, though the avenger may sin in his resentment, yet the evils produced by it must be received by us as the effects of our own misconduct, and cannot be charged to the account of righteousness, unless the action be such as we are bound in strict duty to God or our neighbour to perform.

But injuries of this kind, and the occasions of them, being less capable of rule, and less considerable in their effects, than those which are derived from public power; and these latter being principally, if not only in the apostle's view, in this scripture I shall chiefly attend to these.

The only cases in which we can suffer for righteousness sake, under the inflictions of public power, are either when just laws are unrighteously applied in the execution, or when the law itself is unjust, and requires us to do what a superior law forbids.

As to the first case, corrupt and wicked as the world is, virtue and justice continue still to be venerable names, to which the most dissolute will not openly renounce their title; and accordingly, the most unrighteous power was never professedly exerted in the oppression of virtue and innocence as such, but under the colour and suggestion of some crime, acknowledged in general to deserve the infliction. Now, if a man be really guilty of the crime, objected, however virtuous or praise-worthy he may be in other parts of his character, he cannot pretend that his punishment is unjust, or that he suffers for righteousness sake. Nay, if he has not taken due care to guard against the appearances of evil, if his conduct has the outward marks or symptoms of guilt, the ministers of public justice cannot be charged with iniquity for resenting it, in a manner agreeable to the laws of that community in which they preside. Human justice can look no farther than the overt action, and the apparent characters of it; and therefore, whatever any one suffers under such legal presumptions of evil, he must take as a consequence, if not of his guilt, yet of his great indiscretion.

In the second case, when the matter of the law is such as falls properly under the direction of a human legislature, i. e. either such actions as are of prior obligation, by the dictates of a superior law; or such as are left indifferent, neither commanded nor forbidden by any law of God, positive or natural; whatever we suffer for disobedience to such laws, cannot be on account of conscience towards God, or for righteousness sake; for where the action enjoined is a duty of prior obligation by the law of God, man only requires under civil penalties, what God requires under natural or spiritual, and consequently we cannot disobey the one, but we must at the same time disobey the other. And where the matter of the human law is such actions as are neither commanded nor forbidden by God, it is evident, that by obeying such law of man, we cannot disobey any law of God (for the law of God, in this case, is supposed perfectly silent); for where there is no law there is no transgression. Objections against the law as inexpedient, or not conducive to the end it proposes, can be no reason in conscience for declining obedience to it: because the nature of society requires, that in prudential considerations, public authority should judge for the whole, and conclude the sentiments of every private member. The subject therefore cannot act contrary to any duty, in submitting to such resolutions; and consequently, whatever he suffers in refusal of such submission, he suffers not for righteousness sake, but as an evil-doer, an opposer of authority, acting within the just limits of its power.

If a man mistakes the nature of the action enjoined, and under a mispersuasion of conscience refuses obedience to the law of his superiors, as contrary to the law of God, as commanding something which he forbids, or forbidding something which he commands; in this case it is plain,

1st, that the internal circumstance of the error which may possibly excuse it before God, are undiscernable by men. They cannot certainly distinguish between a real and pretended persuasion of conscience; and if this plea were to be always admitted in exemption from punishment, no laws would be of any force or use. Where indeed it can be equitably presumed, that the error is purely involuntary, and the man notwithstanding it, innocent before God, and the action or example have no manifest evil tendency, there may be reasons for human justice to abate of the severity of the law, and deal tenderly with the offender. But this must be left wholly to the judgment of those in authority: and if, in the result of their consideration, they determine to inflict the penalties of the law, their sentence must be acquiesced in, and esteemed even by the offender himself to be legally just. And,

2dly, With regard to the judgment of God upon the action, (on a presupposition of which alone, either the satisfaction of the actor's conscience, or the indulgence of authority to him can rationally be founded,) before his approbation of the man, or his excuse of the action can be presumed, the error must appear such as may consist with an honest, upright, and humble heart, free from pride or obstinacy, and not biassed by any corrupt motive; such as a good man, and a good subject, with due attention, might fall into. But alas! if we look over the pretended martyrologies of late ages, how many instances occur to us, to which charity itself cannot extend these characters! How numerous are the examples canonised for saints and confessors, who have suffered for such crimes, as the first dictates of natural reason, the plain rules of the gospel, and the fundamental principles of human society, condemn! such actions, as the ignorance of their nature must itself be a sin not to be excused. Nay, some of them have gone so far as to acknowledge the actions they have committed to be simply, and in themselves evil, but have pretended the pious ends they sought by them sanctified the villainy, and changed its nature. Our own history furnishes us with instances of more than one kind of enemies who have defended perjury, parricide, assassinations, and rebellion, to be lawful, in order to introduce their own schemes of religion and government, and subvert that established, while the profession has been a zeal to assert the cause, and promote the glory of God; and to those who have suffered in these wicked attempts, has been ascribed the honour of martyrdom. But I trust we have not so learned Christ, and will never be persuaded, that the least evil can be justified by a pretence of promoting the greatest good by it. The religion of the holy Jesus abhors to be assisted by such principles as these; nor will he ever acknowledge those as confessors for him, who suffer under the demerit of such crimes.

But farther; though the principle and end by which we are influenced be good, and the actions by which we endeavour to promote it, be to some persons, and in some circumstances, not only lawful, but a duty; yet if to us, in our stations and circumstances, they are improper and unlawful, whatever we suffer in consequence of such actions, cannot be placed to the account of righteousness.

Thus, for instance, the infliction of corporal punishment, and, in some cases, even of death itself, may be the duty of a magistrate. But if a private person takes upon him to do this, his punishment will be just, neither can he pretend that he suffers for righteousness sake. And so again, it may be the duty of persons in some stations, and who are intrusted with the defence of public liberties, to oppose with zeal the errors or oppressions of public administrations; but in a private person, the same actions would be mutiny and sedition: he acts out of his post and calling, and whatever inconveniences he defies on himself by such a conduct, are but the just consequences of it: he suffers as an evil-doer, as assuming such liberties as are inconsistent with any order or good government among mankind. It is our duty to oppose all unrighteousness, within the compass of our station; but it is not our duty to go out of our station on any pretence, and intrude into an office which does not belong to us.

I may add farther, that whatever may be the occasion of our sufferings, yet unless we suffer like Christians, with that meekness which our religion prescribes; if we betray a spirit of impatience and revenge under our sufferings, we may not assume the character, or promise ourselves the reward, of those who suffer for righteousness sake.

The limits under which the apostle asserts this conclusion of my text in the preceding chapter, will, if duly attended to, direct us in the application of it. This (says he) is thank-worthy, if a man, for conscience towards God, endures grief suffering wrongfully: for what glory is it, if when ye be buffeted for your faults, ye shall take it patiently? But if, when ye do well, and suffer for it, ye take it patiently, this is acceptable to God. From which scripture it is evident, 1st, That unless we suffer really for conscience sake; 2dly, Though we suffer for conscience sake, yet unless we suffer wrongfully, unless the actions, which under that persuasion we are led to, are in their nature such as no punishment is due to; and, 3dly, Unless we take patiently, even what we thus wrongfully suffer, neither the character described by the apostle, nor the encouragement here given to it, will belong to us.

These exceptions being admitted, it will be easy to collect when we may be truly said to suffer for righteousness sake. And here it may be proper to premise that an absolute sinless innocence, in all parts of our life, is not necessary to assure our title to the encouragement of my text ; because if this were the condition of it, it could never be applied to any man living, or to any case that can arise : it must therefore be sufficient to our consolation, if we can apply the character to the particular occasion of our sufferings.

1st, Then, we may take to ourselves this comfort, when the action for which we suffer is such as we are manifestly obliged to, whether it be the general duty of all men, or of all Christians, or the particular duty of our office and station in church or state. For every part of our duty, civil as well as what may strictly be called religious, is enjoined under the sanctions and encouragements of the gospel ; and therefore, he who suffers for an act of civil justice proper to his station, will be intitled to the happiness here promised, as well as he who suffers for professing the Christian faith. And though the Christian religion as such neither prescribes, nor admits any other defence against the oppositions of civil power, than prayers and tears, reason and persuasion, and the influences of a holy inoffensive behaviour ; yet when the laws of that religion are incorporated into, and made a part of the laws of the land, the subject has the same right of being protected by those laws, as by any other laws of that community. The profession of that religion becomes a branch, and surely a most valuable branch, of his legal property. And though his religion will not justify him in doing any thing in defence of this or any other claim, beyond the legal powers of his station ; yet whatever within that compass it is lawful, or his duty to do, in assertion of any other legal right, from public or private attempts against it, it will be equally lawful, or his duty to do, in assertion of this right : and consequently, whatever he may suffer from the resentments of those whom he may be obliged to oppose, will be as truly suffering for righteousness sake in one case as in the other.

2dly, When we suffer under a mistaken persuasion of duty, if the nature of the action be such as a good man might easily apprehend it, and we have dispassionately and attentively considered it, and the motives that lead us to it ; though this plea cannot without the greatest inconveniences be admitted as a sufficient excuse before a human tribunal, because it cannot be discerned by man when this plea is real or pretended ; yet God, who sees the integrity of the heart, and the innocence of the will, will doubtless admit it : and, though he disapproves the particular action for which he suffers, will accept the man as suffering for conscience sake, and for his obedience to that great law of acting according to the best light he had, or in those circumstances could have.

In sum ; however difficult it may sometimes be, to judge for other men in these cases, it cannot be often difficult for an honest man to determine for himself. Others we may perhaps impose on with pretences of conscience, and protestations of innocence, but our own hearts are not easily deceived : we cannot but know whether we are really guilty of the facts charged upon us, or not. And as to the nature of the action, the rules and measures of our duty (in the most considerable parts of it) are plain and legible to the meanest capacities ; and in cases really doubtful, it is neither hard to resolve where we should apply ourselves for information, nor how far we should be governed by it : and as to the motives of our conduct, they must be in every one's view, who observes what passes in our own mind. If then we sincerely examine our actions by these rules, which it is manifestly in every one's power to do, we cannot often mistake a sin for a duty, and consequently cannot often be at a loss to know, whether what we at any time suffer from the public or private resentments of men, be for righteousness sake, or not. Whatever by a due and attentive application of the proper rules of action appears to be a duty of the station we are placed in, we are bound to perform, whatever penalties from our superiors, or whatever inconveniences from the passions of our equals, or inferiors, it may expose us to. And whatever we suffer from either for so doing, if we endure it with that meekness and resignation our religion prescribes, we have the encouragement of the apostle to think it an honour and happiness to us; which is the

2d Point I undertook to prove. This was indeed a doctrine difficultly received at the first proposition of it by our Lord, a hard saying, which the aversions of our voluptuous nature to present pain could not easily be reconciled to; but yet we find the same taught as a conclusion of natural reason. There is nothing more frequently asserted, among the maxims even of heathen morality, than the glory of suffering for virtue. These are the circumstances in which they delight to represent their hero, as the greatest advantage to his character, and in which he shined with the most distinguished lustre. It is true indeed, that if the many fine things they have said on this topic are called to a strict examination, the principles whence they argued appear hardly strong enough to bear the weight laid upon them. The building was beautiful in the structure, but weak in the foundation. The rewarding virtue with itself, and the paradox they advanced upon that scheme, that a virtuous man could not be miserable even in torments, were too visionary and romantic doctrines, to expect much influence on the practice of mankind. The conclusion was useful, and conducive to the happiness of men, if they could be prevailed on to receive an encouragement to great and good actions, and a support under all the distresses that could attend them; but still there was a defect in the principles it was built on, and till this was removed, all the oratory of the preacher amounted only to this, that it was an opinion of good tendency, and that it was worth the while of mankind to be deceived into it. Some few indeed among them ventured farther, and encouraged men to hope a future recompense from the justice of God for all they suffered in the cause of virtue. They were here upon right ground, if they could have maintained it; but their arguments upon this prospect were but conjectural. Natural reason was here at the end of its line; it stood upon the shore, and looked with solicitude into the ocean of eternity. The eye reached but a little way, and was then lost in clouds and darkness: something it was probable might be beyond its present view, but what it was, or whether any thing at all, reason could not with assurance determine. And as it usually happens to persons who look with long attention on a prospect, where nothing is distinctly perceived, that some will fancy they see, and others for the credit of being discoverers will pretend to see various appearances; so it was in this case; the fictions of poets, and the conjectures or vanity of philosophers, undertook to form various scenes of this terra incognita, which were received according to the esteem of the reporters, or the credulity of the hearers; the one served to amuse the superstition of the vulgar, and the other the disputations of the curious, but in the result afforded no rational satisfaction: the certainty of the conclusion depended on the will of God, and could not otherwise be known but by revelation. The presumption indeed of a future state was very great, and general among mankind; but it prevailed not as a firm conclusion of reason, from which few attempted, and none were able to deduce it with clear evidence, but either as a remain of original tradition, or as a persuasion agreeable to the interest and wishes of men. But what I would observe hence to my present purpose is, that if these dark views, and confused sentiments of a future state, were able to infuse into mankind such a consciousness of the dignity of their nature, and the dishonour of a base action, as appeared among some of the heathens; if they could give firmness and courage to the innocent, and patience, and even cheerfulness, to suffering virtue; in how much greater proportion must these effects be derived from the prospects of the gospel? The veil is now drawn, the clouds and darkness which intercepted our view dispelled, and the eye strengthened by faith is enabled to look into the awful scene, is assured of the reality of the vision, by a divine revelation indisputably attested, and beholds in it such rewards and penalties attending human actions, as render all their present consequences trifling and inconsiderable.

The Christian has always before him that sentence of his Lord,—This do and thou shalt live: the rule of his duty, and his encouragement to perform it. And though he is in general assured, that godliness has the promises of the life that now is, as well as that which is to come; and is ordinarily and in its nature our best security from present evils, yet he is prepared to expect many exceptions to this rule. He remembers that it is a condition of his profession, to take up his cross and follow his Master; That whosoever will live godly in this world, must suffer persecution: that iniquity will sometimes abound, and that his religion itself, and the duties it prescribes, will sometimes expose him to the malice and resentments of unrighteous men. But whenever this happens, he is prepared for the shock: he has a firm support in the promises of God, and the distinguished portion of glory which awaits his sufferings. He recollects with unspeakable pleasure those words of his Redeemer—Blessed are you when men hate you, and persecute you, and speak all manner of evil of you, for my sake and the gospel: rejoice and be exceeding glad in that day, for great is your reward in heaven. He looks up to those great examples of his religion, who have gone before him in the same paths of sorrow: to the captain of his salvation, the author and finisher of his faith, who was made perfect through sufferings, far greater and more undeserved than his: to apostles, prophets, and that noble army of martyrs, who had trials of cruel mockings and scourgings, of bonds and imprisonments, of racks and crosses, not accepting deliverance, that they might obtain a better resurrection. Supported by these animating views of his faith, and encouraged by so many glorious examples of the power of it, he can triumph in the midst of torments, and rejoice that he is called to the honour of suffering for righteousness sake.

Upon the whole then it appears to us, from the apostle's reasoning in this scripture, that the promises of God, and the nature and tendency of the duties enjoined by our religion, assure us, that a conduct of life agreeable to it, is our best security from those manifold evils we are exposed to in an unrighteous and passionate world: that it will generally assuage the malice, and restrain the power, of those who would hurt us. And on the contrary it is manifest, that vice and irreligion are far more obnoxious to these evils, offer greater provocations to the resentments of men, and are less defended from the effects of them. But then it is also here supposed, that in the course of human affairs we must expect frequent exceptions to these rules; that it will sometimes happen to the righteous, according to the work of the wicked; that good and godly men may sometimes suffer, yea suffer for righteousness sake. But what, shall we conclude from hence, that there is no profit in being followers of that which is good, and making our way perfect? No, surely: there is still encouragement enough to persevere in duty, since the reflection on our own innocence, and the promises of the gospel, are able to support us under the worst we can suffer in consequence of it. The God whom we faithfully serve, we know to be our friend, a friend who will not leave us nor forsake us; who will either remove our burden, or increase our strength to bear it; or, which is a prospect of still more encouragement, will reward the light affliction that can endure but for a moment, with a more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. A good man under these reflections is fortified against every event of life, his heart is established, and will not shrink, neither will he fear what man can do unto him.

But with the ungodly it is not so: as their vices render them more exposed to these evils; so whenever they befall them, they are without hope or comfort under them; the reproaches of God and man, and their own conscience, combine together to add weight and terror to the affliction, and leave them for their last recourse to blasphemy and despair. But though we should not be thus abandoned to sin, as this character seems to suppose; though we may be able to reflect with pleasure on some parts of our conduct, yet if in the particular instance of our affliction we suffer as evil-doers, we cannot but confess that we suffer deservedly, a conviction which at once takes from us all the consolation of this scripture, the applause of conscience, and the prospect of reward from God. And though we may hope comfortably, that God upon our humiliation will pardon our sins, and through the merits of Christ accept our temporal sufferings in atonement for it, yet the joy that arises to us from this hope is mixed and alloyed with the tears of the penitent, and is not like that joy unspeakable, and full of glory, which shines forth in the triumphs of the martyr.

Let us then be convinced by this scripture, and what has occurred to us in reflecting on it, of what importance it is to our present as well as future happiness, to keep innocence, and take heed unto the thing that is right. This will be our best guard in our passage through this vale of misery, will give us courage and cheerfulness through the several stages of our journey, and support us under the various evils that attend us in it. And though a steady adherence to duty may sometimes itself be an occasion of our suffering: yet in the multitude of these sorrows, the comforts that arise to us from the promises of God, will be able to refresh our souls, will conduct us with patience, and even pleasure, through our trials, and infallibly bring us peace at the last.

SERMON LVII.

By Dr. ROGERS.

The Death and Sufferings of Christ, foretold and described.

Preached on Good-Friday.

ISA. liiii. 5.

—He was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities: the chastisement of our peace was upon him, and by his stripes we are healed.

THE death and passion of our blessed Lord, as it is the great article on which the whole Christian scheme is built, so our reflections on it suggest to us the strongest motives to all those virtues and graces which qualify us to be partakers of the benefits of it. The disciples therefore of the gospel can never too often contemplate this endearing instance of their Master's love: but the piety of the church has particularly recommended this subject to our meditation in the present solemnity; we should now more especially employ our thoughts on what the Son of God endured for the redemption of a sinful world. And I think there is no passage in holy scripture which represents this great event in more affecting terms than the mournful eloquence of the Prophet in the chapter before us. So clear and distinct were the views in which the Holy Spirit revealed this article to the faith of this his servant, that even the chosen witnesses of our Lord's passion, who saw with their eyes their bleeding Master hang upon the cross, are not more passionate in their descriptions of it: He is despised (said he, ver. 3, 4, 7, 8, 9.) and rejected of men: he was stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted. He is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before his shearers is dumb, so he opened not his mouth. He was taken from prison and from judgment. He was cut off out of the land of the living. And he made his grave with the wicked, and with the rich in his death: though he had done no violence, neither was any deceit in his mouth.

The end and intention of these sufferings of the Messiah, the Prophet reminds us of in the words of my text, He was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities: the chastisement of our peace was upon him, and by his stripes we are healed.

This scripture may be considered either,

I. As a prophecy, the manifest completion of which, in the death and sufferings of the blessed Jesus, is one of the strongest arguments to convince our faith that he was that very Messiah which should come into the world. Or,

II. We may consider it as a declaration of the end intended, and the effect obtained by the passion of the Messiah, viz. the atonement of our sins, and the restoring us to a state of peace and friendship with God. I shall treat each of these briefly, and proceed,

III. To what I principally intend in this discourse, to suggest those meditations to our thoughts, and those affections to our souls, which so sublime a subject, and so amazing an instance of divine compassion, requires from us. And,

I. The manifest completion of this prophecy, in the death and sufferings of our Lord, is a convincing argument to our faith that he is that very Messiah which should come into the world.

That the adoration of a crucified God should be difficultly received by the more inquisitive part of the gentile world, we are not so much to wonder, because it was a doctrine that seemed, at first view, contrary to the very idea of the divine nature, and refuted even in its principle by the impassibility of the Deity. And, what particularly discouraged the reception of it among the common people, it was generally treated with ridicule, and exposed them to an obvious and ungrateful topic of reproach from every infidel they met with. And having never been prepared by any previous revelation to expect a Redeemer in so mean and contemptible a character, it is hardly to be imagined that their prejudices should immediately be prevailed on to give the arguments that persuaded their belief a serious and attentive hearing. But the Jews were so expressly directed to look for a Messiah without form or comeliness, a man of sorrows, who should make his soul an offering for sin, and be numbered with the transgressors; and saw all these predictions so evidently fulfilled in the blessed Jesus, that the completion of no prophecy concerning the Messiah can seem more wonderful to us, than that of their rejecting him. His death was typified in every sacrifice they offered, in almost every rite and ceremony of their law, and described in so lively a manner, even in the most minute circumstances of it, by their prophets, that nothing could be wanting to their conviction, but attentively to compare the draught with the original.

To view him only as he was described in the prophecy before us. Was it foretold that he should be a man of sorrows; and was ever sorrow like his sorrow? Was he to be despised and rejected of men? Thus came the blessed Jesus unto his own, and his own received him not, but preferred even a rebel and a murderer before him. Was he to be led as a lamb to the slaughter, patient and resigned as a sheep before her shearers? Behold the Lamb of God, the meek and humble Jesus, who when he was reviled, replied not again. Though he could have commanded legions of angels to his rescue, yet dragged to Calvary without opposition or complaint; no voice was heard from him, either to appease the rage of his persecutors, or implore the pity of the beholders: Weep not for me (says he, to those who attended him with tears), but weep for yourselves, ye daughters of Jerusalem. Was he to make his grave with the wicked, to be numbered with the transgressors, and to make intercession for the transgressors? Behold him expiring in the torments of the cross in the midst of thieves, and praying for his murderers. Other prophets have been so particular as to prefix the very time in which the Messiah should be cut off. (Dan. ix. 26.) The prophet Zachary foretels the price he was to be sold for, and the employment of the money. The Psalmist describes the very manner and circumstances of his death: that they should pierce his hands and his feet. Zech. xi. 12. The very expressions of reproach that should be cast upon him: He trusted in God that he would deliver him; let him deliver him, if he will have him. Psalm xxvii. 8. 16. The parting his garments by lot by the soldiers; and the giving him vinegar to drink. Great part of these predictions have been understood by the Jews themselves to relate to the Messiah; and this relation has been affirmed by the testimony of God, proved by the best direct evidences that were ever produced for any divine revelation, as full and conclusive as it was possible for God himself to give: and the correspondence of the death and sufferings of our Lord to them is so punctual and exact, that they seem rather like a history of events past, than a prophecy of such as were to come: and if they were not fulfilled in the person of Jesus of Nazareth, it is impossible we should ever know when any prophecy is fulfilled. And nothing but the curse of God denounced against that stubborn people, that hearing they should hear and not understand, and seeing they should see, and not perceive, can account for an infidelity that could resist the evidence of so clear a proof. This single chapter of Isaiah now before us, furnished Philip with an argument for the conversion of the eunuch; and has been found effectual in the conviction of some modern examples of infidelity, where other arguments have been heard without impression. But,

II. We are also hence informed in the occasion and end of the Messiah's sufferings. He was bruised for our iniquities: the chastisement of our peace was upon him, and by his stripes we are healed.

That he suffered not for his own sins, the piety and innocence of his life may abundantly assure us. He went about doing good, healing the infirmities, and correcting the errors, of mankind; he gave eyes to the blind, and feet to the lame, and preached the gospel to the poor. It was the public confession of the multitude, that he had done all things well. The declaration of his judges, both Pilate and Herod, that after the strictest examination they found no fault in him. The testimony of the Centurion, an impartial unprejudiced witness, certainly this was a righteous man. Now we could not acquit the justice of God from partiality in suffering so innocent, so exemplary a person to be thus barbarously used and murdered, unless some excellent end were to be promoted by it. And this we are assured from scripture was the redeeming mankind from a state of sin and misery; and that this was accomplished by his taking upon himself the penalties due to our impieties, and bearing the burden of an offending world. For it consisted not with the majesty and immutability of the divine law-giver to remit the penalties of disobedience without some satisfaction paid to his justice. Such a conduct must have appeared rather like tameness than lenity, and have exposed his authority to all the insults of vice and impudence. Some satisfaction therefore was necessary: and what was there which offending man could offer unto his Creator? Could the blood of bullocks or rams take away his sin? With what imaginable reason could it be presumed that God should be appeased by the destruction of his creatures? Should he multiply his oblations before him, and pour out upon his altar rivers of oil? Alas! in all this he could give him but his own, and discharge but a part of that debt, which the common mercies of Providence required from him. Should he sacrifice unto him his first-born, the fruit of his body for the sin of his soul? This were in all the views of reason but adding one impiety to another, and the sacrifice itself must want an atonement. Should he then offer himself to the curse of the law, to undergo the wages of his sin? This were to bear, and not to divert, the punishment: and even in this submission, the utmost any one could suffer could satisfy for no more than his own offences. No, it must cost more to redeem a world of sinners, than man had to pay. But the divine compassion left us not in this despair of redress; himself contrived a method by which his justice should be satisfied, and yet the offender be saved. The eternal Son of his love took upon him the burden and penalties of our transgressions: he who knew no sin became sin for us, and by one oblation of himself once offered, paid a full, perfect, and sufficient satisfaction for the sins of the whole world. For he who offers unto the offended party what he has as great a value for as he has hatred for the offence, may properly be said to satisfy for and undergo the penalties due to that offence. This is implied in the very terms of ransom and redemption, which signify the payment of a price which the offended will receive as an equivalent, for the penalties incurred by the criminal: whether that consists in any thing of value deposited, or some performance which the offended will accept. And thus did our blessed Lord by the innocence of his life, the bitterness of his death, and the dignity of his person, offer unto God what he had as intense a love for, as he had provocation from the sins of the whole world. Thus did he pay down the utmost farthing for our redemption, and thereby rescue the captive into liberty, and restore the rebel into a state of grace and favour. Thus was he wounded for our transgressions, and bruised for our iniquities, and by these stripes of the master was the servant healed. And therefore,

III. Let our devotion employ the present holy season in giving this sublime subject, this amazing instance of divine love, its due influence, in suggesting proper meditations to our thoughts and affections to our souls. And,

1. Let us with trembling and astonishment reflect how dreadful an evil sin must be, which nothing could expiate but the blood of the Son of God. If we consider sin in all the terrible consequences that had before attended it, as the parent and cause of all misery, as what derived a curse on nature, robbed man of his innocence and felicity: that it was sin which provoked the Almighty to descend in so many fearful examples of vengeance on the world; which broke up the fountains of the great deep, and kindled the flames of Sodom: that the extinction of nations, and the desolation of kingdoms; that all the instances of misery and affliction which attend mankind, were but the effects of this destructive evil: and if we add to all this, those terrors which the natural presumptions of conscience open to our prospect beyond the grave; what hatred and aversion should these reviews give us towards this great enemy of our nature, this destroyer of our happiness? With what passion then, with what new resentment of soul, must the Christian behold it, bringing down the Son of God from the bosom of his Father, spoiling him of his glory, and exposing him to the weakness and indignity of mortality, to the shame and anguish of the cross? All the former effects either known, or feared of sin, fatal as they were, yet affected only the sinner. The soul that sinned died, and the offender with the greatest justice suffered the consequence of his own folly. But here we see the Author and Fountain of all good wounded by sin, and bruised by iniquity; the innocent oppressed by the burden of the guilty; the beloved of God slain by the sins of men. With what humility and abhorrence of himself should offending dust reflect on so sad an effect of his impiety? With what loathing and detestation should he fly those crimes which nailed his friend and patron to the cross, and shed the precious blood of his Redeemer? Let us then,

2. Reflect what returns of gratitude we owe to so amazing an instance of divine love towards us: let it inflame our affections to consider distinctly what our Lord and Master did and suffered for our sakes: let us attend him in all the melancholy stages of his passion, and behold him either deserted or betrayed by his servants, dragged by a rude multitude before a partial and enraged tribunal: the Creator and Governor of the world crowned with thorns, contemned, reviled, and spitted on, the scorn of the magistrate, the sport of insolent soldiers. Let us behold him fainting under the burden of his cross; the innocent Jesus numbered with the transgressors, led to a cursed death, with thieves and malefactors. Let it pierce our souls to reflect how his hands and feet were torn by the nails, and his side by the spear; the Prince of life expired in agonies, amidst the blasphemies and reproaches of his own creatures; and let us at the same time remember that he endured all this for our sakes, for rebellious, ungrateful man, his enemy, his betrayer, and murderer. Never was love like this love, nor compassion like that of our God. Greater love than this, says the Apostle (John, xv. 13.), hath no man, that a man lay down his life for his friends; but greater love even than this has God shewn to his creatures, in that while we were yet enemies, Christ died for us. To have restored the rebel to favour upon his submission, to have accepted his repentance, and hearkened to his intreaties of pardon, had itself been an act of mercy, which neither the prayers of men could hope for, nor their obedience return. What heart then can conceive, or what tongue express, the affection of Christ to his creatures; who, before the offender made any overture of submission, while he persisted in his rebellion, disclaimed and rejected the offers of grace, and even reviled and persecuted the messenger of it, not only interceded for the pardon of this unrelenting enemy, but even laid down his own life for the purchase of it? Lord, what is man, that thou art thus mindful of him, or the son of man, that thou so regardest him? Thou madest him lower than the angels, yet them for their disobedience thou hast reserved in chains of darkness, condemned, to a miserable immortality; but unto man equally rebellious, equally apostate from thee and goodness, thou hast given a Saviour; even thine only Son to be the propitiation for our sins. And shall any thing be too severe to be endured, too hard to be performed, or too dear to be parted with for his sake, who thus loved us, and gave himself for us? When the Redeemer of our souls requires us to resign the interests or pleasures of this life; to submit to injuries, reproach, or affliction in his service, can we withhold the one, or decline the other, when we remember that he descended from the right hand of the majesty of God, and endured the shame and tortures of the cross for our salvation? With what readiness should we comply with the requests of so great a benefactor? with what alacrity obey his commands? All that we enjoy or hope for, we owe to his favour, and our very souls are the purchase of his blood. And should the friend to whom we are so infinitely obliged, require some great thing of us, should we refuse to perform it? How much more when he only invites us to pursue our own greatest interest, when he commands us to be happy, when he intreats us to be saved? How monstrous then must be our ingratitude, if we continue in those sins which repeat the agonies of his passion, which make his wounds to bleed afresh, and put him anew to shame? But as the love of our Master and only Saviour Jesus Christ, thus dying for us, should engage our utmost returns of gratitude and obedience, and prevail on us to devote our lives to his service and pleasure, and to fly with abhorrence from whatever will grieve and offend him; so it is farther proposed to our meditations as an example of patience, humility, and charity.

How should it animate us in all the trials of our faith, in all the miseries and afflictions of life, to reflect that our Lord and Master was made perfect through sufferings? Are we grieved with the scorn and derision of the profane? Thus was the blessed Jesus despised and rejected of men. Is tribulation, distress, and persecution, our portion? Thus was the Captain of our salvation a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief. And how should it mortify all our fondness and contention for the pomps and honours of this world, to consider that the Son of God chose to appear in the meanest and most ignoble circumstances of humanity; lived an indigent dependent life, and submitted to the infamous death of a slave? And lastly, how should it calm our resentments, and extend our charity, even to the greatest enemies, to remember that our blessed Lord died for his sinful creatures? Even the agonies of his torments abated not his love, but he expired interceding for his murderers. Are the offences we resent and complain of, to be compared with the provocation of a world of sinners against their God? The fiercest contentions of men are between creatures equal in nature, and capable by the greatest distinction of circumstances and authority of but a very small remove one from another. But the enemies of God are the work of his creation, the dependants of his power, and whom he has endeavoured to oblige by wonders of his love. If therefore God could forgive injuries heightened by so many aggravating circumstances, sins against his power and authority, sins against his mercy and goodness, and sins of his creatures and necessary dependants, and forgive them in a manner so expressive of tenderness and concern, as to substitute his own Son to suffer in their stead, what provocations can we ever receive that ought not to command the same pardon and condescension from us? Ought not we to be merciful, since our Father which is in heaven is thus amazingly merciful? To conclude: The Son of God has washed us in his blood, has cleansed and purified the stains of our nature, and renewed our title to eternal happiness; and shall we again return to our pollution, shall we forfeit the mercies of this second covenant also, and give our own and our Creator's enemy the triumph of a second conquest over us? Let us look back and tremble at the danger we have escaped, and let us remember, that if we neglect the overtures of this grace, there remains no farther sacrifice for our sin, no fresh covenant of grace to be proposed to us, no new Redeemer to be offered for us; even infinite mercy is exhausted, and can do no more than has already been done for our salvation. Let us therefore labour to secure an interest in the merits of this Mediator: let it not be in vain for us that this Jesus, this Saviour, is come into the world; but let his doctrine engage our faith, and his commands our obedience: and let us with a lively devotion join the sacred hymns of those ten thousand times ten thousand voices that surround the throne of God, saying, Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and wisdom, and honour, and glory, and blessing; and therefore blessing, and honour, and glory, and power be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever. (Rev. v. 12, 13.)

SERMON LVIII.

By Dr. ROGERS.

The Certainty of our own Resurrection inferred from the Resurrection of Christ.

1 COR. XV 23, latter part.

Christ the first fruits, afterwards they that are Christ's, at his coming.

THE Apostle in the former part of these words asserts the resurrection of Christ; in the latter part of the words directs us to infer immediately from it the certainty and connection of our own: that as the waved sheaf in the Levitical law sanctified the whole harvest, so Christ, who was sowed in dishonour, even as we are, being raised in glory, should derive the same privilege on all those who are his, at his coming.

The prospect beyond the grave, and what became of this thoughtful busy creature, when he was removed from the scene of this world, has been a speculation that has amused the vulgar, and puzzled the philosophy of the wise, in all ages of the world.

Human nature could not sustain the reflection of having the prospect closed with this life, and all its schemes and expectations to determine with this frail and perishable composition of flesh and blood; and therefore the vulgar supported themselves with fables, and the philosophers with some rational probability of a future state. But their most successful researches upon this subject could never rise higher than to a fair possibility; and the conclusions they came to were such as they rather wished might be true, than such as they could give a firm and confident assent to; and left the atheist room for disputation, and even the best men but a diffident expectation of their immortality.

But for the resurrection of the body, this was such a contradiction to their philosophy, that the Apostle of my text had no sooner proposed it to the great masters of knowledge at Athens, but he himself was ridiculed as a babbler, and his doctrine exploded as an incredible fable. And indeed no article of Christianity met with a more difficult reception in the world, than this of the resurrection of the body.

For that this dissolved and disunited frame should ever be restored to its first strength and beauty, that ever these scattered materials, dispersed through all the elements, should be re-collected into the same form and comeliness; that the urn should restore its ashes, and the sea give up her dead, was an assertion so amazing, and encumbered with so many difficulties and objections, that bare unassisted reason could never get over them. Even the Jews themselves, who had the privilege of a nearer access to God, had yet but very dark notices of this great truth; and the Scripture tells us, that there was a considerable sect even of those who pretended to learning among them (namely, the Sadducees), who believed neither resurrection, angel, nor spirit. No, it was Christianity first clearly proved this noble and important truth to the world, and this life and immortality were brought to light by the Gospel. Christ our Saviour has asserted the strength of our nature in its innocency, and in his triumph over death and hell: he has unbarred the gates of the grave, and set the captive free; and has assured us, that as he the first fruits is risen, so shall they also rise who are his at his coming. It is to be observed, indeed, that the Apostle in this Scripture infers no more from the resurrection of Christ, than the resurrection of the just, those who are Christ's at his coming; because this was what the design of this chapter made it principally necessary he should prove to the Corinthians. The design is evident from the inference he makes from the whole in the last verse, viz. to support their faith under those discouragements and persecutions their profession in that early age exposed them to, that they might be steadfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord. Now the proper argument from which this effect was to be hoped for, was such as convinced them that Christ would certainly raise them, and reward their patience and resolution, and make them an abundant satisfaction for all the afflictions they endured for his sake. He had therefore no occasion to extend his proof farther than the resurrection of the just, since this was sufficient to assure their expectations, and convince them that their labour should not be in vain in the Lord. And the same reasons will always account for those expressions of our Lord himself, which seem to confine the resurrection to his elect, whom he frequently promises to raise up at the last day, without any notice of the rest of the world. But that the resurrection shall be general, we are abundantly assured from other Scriptures: for thus our Saviour tells us (John. v. 28, 29.) that all that are in the grave shall hear his voice, and come forth, they that have done good to the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil to the resurrection of damnation. And St. Paul even in this chapter makes this also to be a consequence of our Lord's resurrection, where he tells us, that as in Adam all (i. e. just and unjust) died, so in Christ should all (just and unjust) be made alive. (v. 22.) I shall therefore consider this subject in general, as it regards the resurrection of the whole race of Adam; in treating of it, I shall at present look upon the resurrection of our Lord as a truth of fact established upon sufficient evidence, and acknowledged to be true; and endeavour from the latter part of the words before us to shew,

I. The certainty and connection of our own resurrection. And,

II. Direct you to those meditations this doctrine ought to suggest to us.

I. That our blessed Saviour, who was himself a divine person, and consequently endued with the power of God, might by his own unbonded activity restore the body he had chosen to its former union, especially within the space of three days, when the balsms and spices which the piety of Joseph had brought, had kept it so entire, that even naturally it could not have seen corruption, seems attended with a great many circumstances that make it reconcilable enough to the natural apprehensions of men, or at least abate much of the difficulties that might withhold our assent: but that a human body dissolved and crumbled into dust, without any trace or feature of the form it once appeared in, when all its lineaments are destroyed, and the whole mass of its materials, bones and blood, and sinews mixed together in an undistinguishable confusion; that (I say) such a disorder as this should ever be retrieved, that this blended mass should resume its former symmetry and proportions; is such an amazing instance of knowledge and power, that our most refined speculations can very difficultly conceive an art or artificer that can be equal to so stupendous an effect. But farther, if we consider these blended materials not only confused among themselves, or with the neighbouring bodies, but scattered and dispersed over the whole face of nature, the sports of winds and rivers, partly evaporated into air, and partly diluted into water, and fortuitously shared between all the elements, who shall find out or recall the wandering particles home, and fix them in their old vicinity? Had we indeed all our different cells and apartments in the earth, did vaults and sepulchres keep all human reliques divided and separated from the confusion of other bodies, it would be but like a curious machine taken into pieces, which, while the parts are preserved together, it is no great difficulty to the artificer to reunite to its former figure and motions; and whatever may be surprising to the ignorant in such a performance, the skill of the workman will easily account for: but what skill, or what power, shall recollect the dust, which winds and waves have dispersed over the face of the whole earth? Who shall discern a human particle disguised perhaps now under the appearance of air, or water, or plant, or mineral, and, when discovered, command it back to the post it once had?

But the difficulty will yet increase upon us, if we consider a human body not only thus dissipated and dispersed, but devoured by fish or beast, and so entered into the constitution of another animal; nay, and perhaps in some periods of the several revolutions it undergoes, become the flesh and blood of another man; whose then shall it be in the resurrection? Who shall be the owner of this straggling dust, and to what proprietor shall it belong?

These are the difficulties that gave the doctrine of the resurrection so cold and diffident a reception in the world, and raised the scruples of the weak, and the contempt and ridicule of the pretenders to more accurate knowledge and learning. But had they duly considered the unlimited extent of infinite knowledge and infinite power, these two attributes had been sufficient to have silenced their scruples, and they had adored and not ridiculed the amazing mystery. He who saw and formed us in the womb, whose eyes beheld our substance yet being imperfect, and in whose book all our members were written, keeps every atom of them still under his eye, and pursues them through all the changes and revolutions they undergo: lost and insensible as they are to us, they are to his all-seeing eye so many distinct beings, in a fair and regular order. For though they fly up to heaven, he is there; or if they are thrust down to hell, he is there also: though they are scattered on the wings of the morning, and remain in the uttermost parts of the sea; even there shall his omnipresence find them, and thence shall his right hand fetch them out, and lead them home to their ancient proprietor. Can the least particle of matter be so small, as to escape the knowledge of omniscience? Can it hide itself from him who created it, by whose appointment it succeeds into various stations, and is applied to serve different ends of his providence, and is employed by the great artificer sometimes in one part, and sometimes in another of the works of his hands? Though it runs through all the variety of bodies in nature, earth or water, plants or animals, or even different men; yet it passes its several stages by the immediate commission and direction of the Almighty, and may by him be commanded to return to the same post it once filled. And as his knowledge is thus sufficient to find out the materials of which we were made, so his power is sufficient to put them together again. We know that the power of God can perform any thing, which does not necessarily imply a contradiction. Now it is certainly no contradiction that the same thing which once was, should exist again; that those particles of matter which were once united in the same body, should be restored to the same union. Can it be difficult to that Almighty Power, which first created man, and the whole world out of nothing; who can with a thought reduce it to nothing, and with a second restore it to the same form and order again, to command any parts of matter, however separated and divided from each other, into what order or appearance he pleases, especially to fit them up into the same symmetry and lineaments they once had? Nature is the art of God, and as he can take a body to pieces, and dispose of them where he pleases, to us perhaps not without the appearance of irretrievable confusion, but with respect to his own knowledge into the most regular and methodical repositories; so he can with the same facility put them together again, and renew their acquaintance with those parts to which they were formerly allied. It is agreed by those philosophers who are most inclined to dispute this article, that matter is unperishable in itself, and that all the destruction it can undergo, is no more than a passing from one form to another. The matter therefore of the body must necessarily remain; and since matter, as such, is equally capable of all forms, those particles which before composed an human body, must at least be as capable as any other of being raised into that figure again. It is plain therefore that the materials must remain, and remain in a capacity of being reunited into the same form; and that the power of God is able to unite them is also evident, because it is no more than he actually has done once before. Since therefore God Almighty is allowed to have knowledge and abilities equal to this great work, the only question that can remain is, whether he has at any time assured us that he will perform it? and for this we appeal to that revelation God has made of himself in Scripture. In the Old Testament indeed the discoveries of this mystery are less frequent and clear, than those he has given us in the New: yet they were such as to those who duly attended to the light they gave, afforded a sufficient conviction of this truth, and a firm reliance on the glorious promises contained in it. I know (says holy Job) that my Redeemer liveth; and though after my skin, worms destroy this body; yet in my flesh shall I see God; whom I shall see for myself, and my eyes shall behold and not another; though my reins be consumed within me. (Job, xix. 25, 26, 27.) To this we may add that of the prophet Isaiah: Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise: awake and sing, ye that dwell in the dust, for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead. (Isaiah, xxvi. 19.) Thus also Daniel tells us, they that sleep in the dust shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt. (Dan. xii. 2.) These are scriptures of such express and unavoidable force, that one would think it impossible for so large a division of the Jews, as the Sadducees were, to resist the evidence of so clear an authority. But the providence of God, designing the last and most perfect declaration of his will under the gospel, has so clearly revealed this article to our faith in the scripture of the New Testament, that no one has ever doubted whether it were an article of Christianity. It is proposed in almost every page to the disciples of the gospel, as their great support under all the difficulties and persecutions they must expect, from the malice of a prejudiced world. Thus we find our blessed Saviour, frequently encouraging his disciples with this promise, that he would raise them up at the last day. (John, vi. 40. 44. 54, &c.) And St. Paul confesses, that without this expectation, Christianity, under the disadvantages it then lay, had nothing engaging enough to recommend it to the world: If in this life only we had hope (said he), we were

of all men most miserable. (1 Cor. xv. 19.) It was the assurance of a resurrection that gave patience to the confessor, and courage to the martyr; and inspired the first Christians with that undaunted resolution, that they not only despised, but even gloried in their sufferings. And the great argument the Apostles appealed to for the proof of this article, is the resurrection of their Lord and Master, who is therefore called the first fruits of those that sleep, and an earnest of the resurrection of the whole human species. Christ has condescended to incorporate us into the same body of which himself is head, and has commanded us to depend on him, with this assurance, that as he himself is risen, so will he also raise up those to be his: as the head is glorified, so shall also the members be glorified with him: and where the head is, there shall the members be also: And as in Adam all died, even so in Christ shall all be made alive. (1 Cor. xv. 22.) But I shall not detain you with a recital of those proofs which might be brought for this article from the writings of the New Testament, but look upon it as allowed by every one to be a doctrine of the gospel. And proceed,

II. To such an application of this subject, as may be in some measure answerable to the great importance of it. And,

1. Let us reflect on that great and terrible day, when the earth shall be again in travail with her sons, and at one fruitful throe, bring forth all the generations of learned and unlearned, rich and poor, noble and ignoble dust, no longer differentiated and distinguished by titles and quality, but by the guilt or innocence of their lives. Let us frequently consider what figure we shall make in that great assembly, and how we are prepared to meet our Judge and our Redeemer. Piety indeed and innocence soften the terrors of this awful prospect, and make even death and judgment a desirable expectation. To the righteous it is the great strength of his hopes, the support and encouragement of his obedience; the hour, in expectation of which he patiently bears the burden and heat of the day, all the difficulties of duty, and the discountenance he meets with from a wicked and profane world. That cloud of witnesses the Apostle mentions, who had trials of mockings and scourgings, of bonds and imprisonment, were stoned, sawed asunder, were slain with the sword, wandered in deserts and mountains, destitute, afflicted, tormented, not only bore their tortures with patience, but would not accept deliverance, that they might obtain a better resurrection. To a soul, supported with an assurance of the divine favour in that day, the honours or afflictions of this life will be equally trifling and contemptible. Is poverty and disgrace his portion? he knows it will determine in a few years, and that an eternity of glory awaits his perseverance. Are the infirmities of the body, pains and diseases, his complaint? his faith reminds him of the day when this corruptible shall put on incorruption, and this mortal, immortality; when this body shall no longer be that burdensome incumbrance it now is, subject to pain, and weakness, and passion; but spiritualized to a state of eternal youth, and strength, and beauty, to a similitude with the glorified body of Christ our Saviour. With what lively impressions of gratitude does he reflect on that unwearyed care of Providence which conducts man from the womb, and gradually leads him to an immortality of glory; who protects him when alive, and guards him when dead, and makes even his grave but a repository to preserve the relics and treasures of his body; and from thence, as from a wardrobe, re-apparels the new man framed out of the materials of the old, and fitted for the fruition of himself in glory? With what joy does he share in the triumphs of his Redeemer, and behold the bonds of death broken, and the power and malice of hell defeated, our nature again cleansed and purified from the stains of original pollution, and restored to that felicity, that life and immortality, which the sin of Adam had spoiled us of? To the ungodly indeed, and the sinner, the prospect is not thus easy and entertaining: it is with confusion and astonishment he must reflect on that day, when every secret impiety of his life, the sins of his chamber and his closet, shall be produced before men and angels, and an eternal irreversible sentence be pronounced upon the actions of men. Eternity is in itself a prospect that human nature cannot look into without a religious awe and concern; our thoughts are lost in the endless view, and return to us weary and unsatisfied, without finding either bounds or place to fix on. Now to him who may reasonably expect to pass all this endless duration in torments, as great as an offended God can inflict, how dreadful must the approach of it be, and the terrors of it who can bear? He is tormented even before the time, and his damnation is begun on this side hell. Let us then in this our day suffer these reflections to have their proper efficacy, in exciting us to due preparation for that decisive hour: let it influence every thought, word, and action of our lives, to remember that the Judge standeth at the door; that the day approaches when all that are in the graves shall hear the voice of God, and come forth to judgment. And above all things, let us offer incessant prayers to the Divine Majesty, that he would vouchsafe us the assistance of his grace, which alone can direct our course through this troublesome and sinful world, that when our Lord shall appear he may find us intent on the duties of our stations, may own us for his servants before his Father and the holy angels, and call us to the possession of that eternal and heavenly inheritance he has promised to those whom when he comes he shall find so doing.

A good Life the best Ornament of the Christian Profession.

Titus, ii. 10, latter part.

That they may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things.

THOUGH the Apostles of Christ applied themselves to the conversion of mankind, principally by such arguments as proved the reasonableness and credibility of their doctrine; though they asserted the authority of their mission, and that they were preachers sent from God, by those demonstrations of the Spirit, the miraculous effects of divine power which attended their ministry, and might challenge the greatest enemies of the gospel to object any thing to the morality of its precepts; yet still they appeared farther solicitous to enforce these arguments with that great recommendation to the esteem of the world, a correspondent purity in the lives of its disciples. This was a part of their ministry, in which they required their proselytes to concur with them: and particularly the apostle of my text commands Titus, not only to be a pattern of good works himself, but to use his episcopal authority in exhorting every rank and order of men, the young and the old, the husband and the wife, the master and the servant, to be exemplary in the duties of their several stations, and in every part of their conduct to adorn the doctrine they professed. By this expression of adorning the doctrine of our Saviour, it is obvious to understand advancing the credit and esteem of it in the world; behaving ourselves in such a manner, that the beauty of that holiness it prescribes may appear in our lives; and even the enemies of our religion may be forced to acknowledge the power and excellence of so venerable an institution. I shall endeavour to recommend this apostolical precept to your attention, by shewing,

I. That it is the duty of every Christian to be concerned for the reputation or discredit his life may bring on his profession.

II. I shall consider what conduct will acquit us of this obligation.

And, I. It is the duty of every Christian to be concerned for the reputation or discredit his life will bring on his profession.

For though this epistle be particularly directed to Titus, and in him to the bishops and pastors of the flock of Christ, yet this consideration is here rather suggested to him as a proper argument to persuade the obedience of those under his care, than a special direction to himself. The apostle had employed the former part of this chapter in prescribing the duties which it would be proper for him to recommend to every condition and relation of life; and then subjoins this, as an universal reason for their compliance, that they might adorn the doctrine of their Saviour. He had before exhorted Titus himself to be an example of good works; and he is here commanded to press the same regularity on his whole charge from this consideration, that the honour of their religion depended on it. The ministers indeed of the gospel are especially required to shine as lights in the world, because the distinction of their station renders their conduct more observable; and the presumption of their knowledge, and the dignity of their office, gives a peculiar force and authority to their example: but the light of inferior Christians is also to be visible: and as no circumstances of life can place a man so far below the notice of the world, but that his virtues or vices will render him, in some degree, an ornament or disgrace to his profession, so none are below the obligation of this precept, to promote the credit of it.

For shall we all think ourselves bound to consult the reputation of our friend, or our family, and of the laws and constitutions of our country; and shall the honour of that God whom we serve, and the religion by which we hope to be saved, have no share in our concern? Can we with indifference hear the word of God, and the sacred name of our Saviour blasphemed; and at the same time reflect that the scandal of our lives gives the occasion for it? For, after all we can say to disparage the argument, men do and will judge of a religion, by the influence it has on the lives of its disciples; and be inclined to think contemptibly of that faith which has no apparent moral effect on the professors of it. Not all the subtle objections of sophisters and rabbies, against the truth and credibility of the gospel, so much prejudiced the reception of it in the world, as the reproach of those infamous crimes with which they aspersed the assemblies of Christians. And therefore the apologists of the church, in their vindications, appeal not so much to the purity of the rules and precepts of their religion, as to the innocence of their lives; and defy the malice of their adversaries to produce one impure, unjust, or intemperate person, among all who were called by the name of Christ. Thus was the gospel adorned in the innocence and simplicity of its infancy; and thus were they of the contrary part made ashamed, having no evil thing to say of them. And let us not imagine that the reasons or design of this precept were confined to the primitive state of the church, or that the first converts only of Christianity were concerned to defend the honour of their religion from the spite and detraction of a heathen world. That spirit of unbelief, of reproach and blasphemy, which at first opposed itself to rising Christianity, continues still, and will always continue, to revile and persecute the servants of Christ. Even in these days of security and establishment, when the gospel has the defence and protection of national laws, have we not seen our holy religion exposed to public scorn as a farce or fable, every order of its ministry vilified, and the articles of its faith not only opposed, but ridiculed? Have examples been wanting, who have owned, and even gloried in profaneness and infidelity? And are we not encompassed by multitudes, who have hatred and evil will at our Sion; who watch every careless word, every unguarded action of our lives; who are ready to aggravate all our faults, to expose our infirmities, and traduce even our virtues themselves? And if the number and malice of their enemies was an argument to the first Christians for such a prudent and regular behaviour as would silence their calumnies, and procure esteem and reverence to the gospel, the same reasons should enforce this duty on us under the same obligations as the apostle enjoined it on them.

Christianity indeed will always demand this tribute from its disciples. It is implied in every one of its commands, that we should not only obey them ourselves, but use our best endeavours to recommend the same performances to others also. And since an exemplary deportment in the duties of our station, is the most probable method to produce this effect; to reclaim the dissolute, convert the infidel, and win the greatest enemies of our faith to a respect and veneration for it; this is an obligation which will never cease, but remain a necessary duty in all ages and circumstances of the church. Proceed we then,

II. To consider what particular conduct will acquit us of this obligation. In general there is something lovely and endearing in every single instance of duty prescribed by the gospel: a beauty which the most dissolute are forced to acknowledge, and the libertine himself to applaud and admire. How irresistible then are the charms of virtue, when the obedience is universal? when the graces of religion shine with an united lustre, and no crime can be objected to darken the character, and sully the perfection of the example? But I shall content myself at present to recommend the practice of some particular duties, of a more especial tendency to procure respect to ourselves, and honour to our religion; and those are,

First, An extensive love and charity, the bond of peace, and foundation of all the comforts of a social life. It is this most christian grace of our religion which softens our passions, appeases our resentments, and extends our beneficence to the miseries of our brethren; which inclines us to support the needy, compassionate the fatherless, and relieve the tears of the widow; which renders us the blessings and ornaments of the age in which we live, and the veneration of those which come after. And so lovely and obliging a disposition of soul cannot fail of endearing both us and our religion to the gratitude and affections of men. Let the fierce and implacable spirit of revenge be the character of our enemies; let them slander and traduce the innocent; let them rage, and persecute the poor and the helpless; but let it be our glory to be pure and peaceable, ready to forgive, and easy to be intreated; compassionate to the sorrows, and bountiful to the wants, of our greatest enemies. By this shall we vindicate the honour of our religion; by this shall all men know that we are the disciples of Christ.

A second virtue I would recommend as of peculiar efficacy to incline men to venerable thoughts of our religion, is firmness and resolution: a behaviour which, even in the moral accounts of virtue, has always commanded the highest respect from men. And as no institution of life has ever furnished its disciples with so powerful and generous motives of courage as the Christian, so nothing can derive so much honour on our religion, as on all occasions to act up to the spirit and principles of it. Let a man's pretences to religion be never so great, and his conduct in other respects be never so regular, yet if he faint in the day of trial, if we see him shrink from an unacceptable duty, betray the cause of God, and prevaricate with the most avowed principles of his conscience, is it not natural to suspect that there is an evil heart of unbelief, a secret reserve of infidelity at the bottom? Especially if he be a man of any eminence, of the knowledge or station; one who is presumed to have formed his principles upon calm and deliberate inquiries; and to be a master of all the arguments that can plead for religion: when such an one shall fall away, and act contrary to his most professed convictions, with what shame and confusion must all good men behold the example? what scandal must it give to the weak, and what triumph to the infidel? With what confidence will he conclude, that either our religion wants arguments to convince a reasonable inquirer, or encouragements to support its converts in perseverance. On the contrary, when we see even the meanest Christian stand firm in his duty, and hold fast the integrity of his profession; when we see him renounce his interest, his pleasure, and even life itself, in obedience to the commands of his religion, the most indifferent spectator must applaud the courage, the honesty, and sincerity of the man; and confess the power of that institution, which can infuse so much bravery and spirit into the souls of its disciples. It was the zeal and resolution of the first Christians, it was the patience of confessors, and the courage of that noble army of its martyrs, that procured respect and honour to the gospel; and prevailed more in the conversion of the world, than either the arguments, the oratory, or even the miracles of its preachers.

A third duty which will be always necessary to secure the credit of our religion, is a due obedience to the authority of our superiors. It was an early objection, and too successfully urged by the adversaries of Christianity, that it was an enemy to civil government; that it pretended to exempt the servant from obedience to his master; and the subject from his prince. And as nothing could raise a greater prejudice against any religion, than an imputation of inconsistency with the laws and subordinations of government, so there is no reproach Christ and his apostles are more careful to obviate than this. Thus we find our Lord on all occasions disclaiming all pretensions to a temporal kingdom; commanding his disciples to render to Cæsar the obedience that was due to him: and though in strictness he tells us he might have pleaded an exemption from the Jewish tribute required of him, yet rather than countenance the aspersions that would attend his refusal, he exerted his divine power in a miracle to pay it. And as the same calmness pursued his apostles, so we find them equally solicitous to clear themselves and their religion from the scandal of it; inculcating the doctrine of subjection for conscience sake; and, in their own persons, submitting to the most unjust and tyrannical inflictions from the heathen tribunals. And though it was some ages before the jealousies of the civil powers were thoroughly reconciled to the assemblies of Christians, yet we find them at length so perfectly acquitted from this slander, that even Julian himself, the most implacable enemy that ever appeared against the gospel, reproaches his heathen subjects with the infidelity of the Christians. This was the ancient, and is, I hope, yet the unforfeited glory of our religion. The malice of its adversaries has in all ages laboured to deprive it of this honour; to expose it to the resentments of the magistrate as an encourager of sedition; and improve the particular miscarriages of some few into a general charge of disloyalty upon the whole church. But wisdom will still be justified of her children. That pure and peaceable wisdom, which always was and always will be the character of the church of Christ, will in the end refute the aspersions of its enemies; and the meek, the humble, the patient servant of Christ will be found the truest friend to Cæsar. And, purity and sincerity of the heart that principally recommends us to the Searcher of spirits : but since God has also left it upon us as a duty to render his service amiable to others, these external decencies and ornaments of our conduct become a very important part of our morality. It is in these, the visibility and example of our virtues will chiefly consist. The great and more observable occasions of exercising our courage, our justice, or our charity, occur but seldom ; but these are of daily and constant use, to preserve a general benevolence, and endear our common intercourse between one another. Without this care, our best actions will lose much of their influence, and our severer virtues be often discredited with the appearance of evil. But how bright and lovely does every grace of our religion shine, when adorned with an humble and obliging behaviour ? beautiful as a jewel set in gold ; which, though it adds little to the intrinsic value, yet improves the lustre, and attracts the eyes and affections of the beholder. And therefore the apostles of Christ have not failed to make it a constant part of their instructions to their converts, to avoid all unseemliness and asperity of carriage ; to do nothing that may argue a peevish or froward spirit ; not rendering railing for railing ; on the contrary, to be gentle and condescending : if any man asks us to go a mile, to go with him twain ; to be modest and unassuming, in honour preferring one another : to be tender and compassionate, to weep with them that weep, and rejoice with them that rejoice. In general, to be studious of the peace and interests of our neighbour, and endeavour, by an affectionate deportment, to leave impressions of esteem and benevolence on all we converse with : whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report, if there be any virtue, any praise, to think of these things. Our duty only must be too valuable an interest to be given up in a compliment, or sacrificed to the applause of men. If indeed we thus please men, and can be persuaded to any criminal compliances to avoid their resentments, or engage their favour, we cannot also be the servants of Christ. There are proper occasions, on which we may be angry without sin. Somewhat of warmth and severity will become us when we rebuke the vicious, and discountenance the prophane ; and we are expressly required to appear with zeal and earnestness, when we are contending for our faith. But these duties may be complied with, without offending against that gentleness prescribed by the gospel. We may reprove the libertine, without rudeness or bitterness ; defend the articles of our faith, and resist those who oppose them, with a meekness and humanity, which will equally convince the world of our affection to the persons, and our zeal against the errors, of our brethren. But if passionate and unreasonable men will, notwithstanding our best care, be offended with us for doing our duty, God and all good men will applaud our integrity, and shame and contempt will be the portion of our enemies.

4. Let us crown these virtues with a prudent, affable, and courteous behaviour towards all men. It is indeed the inward

Let me then, in conclusion of this discourse, exhort you seriously to reflect on the great engagements we are under to assert the honour of that religion we profess, by an exemplary practice of the duties I have recommended. Let me address you not only as Christians, but as members of the purest and most apostolic church in the world ; a church, whose doctrines are derived from the clear fountains of the scriptures ; whose polity and discipline are formed upon the most uncorrupted models of antiquity ; which has stood unshaken by the most furious assaults of popery on the one hand, and fanaticism on the other ; has triumphed over all the arguments of its enemies, and has nothing now to contend with but their slanders and calumnies. The reproach of immorality is indeed a charge will always lie heaviest against an established religion ; because those who have no religion will generally profess themselves of that which has the encouragement of the law. But it is surely very unreasonable to infer any thing to the disadvantage of any church, from the practice of those who are really of no church and no religion at all. But whatever title we may have to this, or any other excuse, let us re-their endeavour to want none. Let us strive to vindicate the honour of our religion, by a pure and unspotted obedience to the rules and precepts it enjoins: this will more effectually secure the interests, and promote the credit of it, than either the eloquence of our preachers, or the authority of our laws. And, blessed be God, the righteous are not so failed from the earth, but we can still appeal to bright and numerous examples of virtue among us. The number and devotion of those who frequent our altars, and the many great and excellent works of piety and charity promoted among us, are a burning and shining light, such an evidence of the internal power of our religion on the minds of its disciples, as must command reverence from all who behold it, and ought to be allowed in balance against those examples, with whose crimes our adversaries are so ready to reproach us. But let us not content ourselves with being better than our enemies represent us; let us go on unto perfection, and improve in every grace of our religion. Let us add to our faith virtue, to virtue knowledge, to knowledge patience, temperance, and charity. Let us by a meek and quiet behaviour cut off all occasion from those who seek occasion, that they may have whereof to accuse us. And though we have all encouragements to hope that the evil day of persecution is far from us, yet let us always live in such a preparation of mind, that if God shall at any time call us to a trial of our faith, we may acquit ourselves with a courage becoming the hope and spirit of Christians. In sum; let the beauty of our religion appear in the holiness of our lives. Let our virtue shine forth as the light, and our just dealing as the noon-day. Then shall our Zion appear fair and comely to her lovers, and to her enemies strong and terrible, as an army with banners. Then shall the righteous resort unto her assemblies, and even sinners be converted unto her: and every one that is near, and every one that is afar off, shall be induced to give praise unto God, and seeing our good works, to glorify our Father which is in heaven.

SERMON LX.

The Advantages of conversing with good Men, and the Evils of a contrary Conduct.

By Dr. ROGERS.

PSALM CXXIX. 63.

I am a Companion of all them that fear thee, and of them that keep thy precepts.

THAT the temper, the sentiments, the morality, and, in general, the whole conduct and figure of men, is influenced by the example and disposition of those they converse with, is a reflection which has long since passed into proverbs, and been ranked among the standing maxims of human wisdom, in all ages and nations of the world. And mankind seem to act with conviction enough of this truth, in the care they take to deter those whose welfare they are concerned for from the company of such, the expence or infamy of whose vices may endanger their fortunes or reputation. But because the generality of men appear much less solicitous for the purely religious consequences of conversation, it is my present design to recommend to your imitation the conduct which the Psalmist here ascribes to himself, both as it is itself a part of religion, and as an effectual method to secure us in the true profession, and encourage and improve us in the practice of it. In order to this it will be necessary for us,

I. To ascertain what measure of acquaintance or familiarity is implied in this notion of being a companion. I shall then,

II. Represent to you the advantages that will attend our conversing with good men. And,

III. The dangers and inconveniences we are exposed to by a contrary conduct, by being engaged in familiarities with wicked men.

I. Then, by being a companion of good men, may either be meant simply choosing persons of virtue and sound religion for our friendships and intimacies, or assisting them in the promotion of any pious or righteous design: but the latter of these is so natural and almost necessary a consequence of the former, that we may comprehend them in one view; and understand the reflection in my text as advising us to confine our conversations, as far as it is possible, to men of this character; and on the contrary, not to indulge ourselves in any confidence, or familiarity, with impious and profane men; but especially not to communicate with them in their vices, not to concur in any unjust, irreligious, or unmerciful action, and, as far as it is in our power, to avoid all intercourse with them, and, as the apostle commands, from such to withdraw ourselves. Not that we can imagine ourselves prohibited all manner of conversation with wicked men, for this would exclude us from performing the charitable office of private admonition or instruction, the most successful and almost the only method we can take for their reformation. Persons of that character generally keep themselves out of the reach of the public reproofs and exhortations of the ministry, or hear with such inattention or contempt, as renders them of very little effect to them, and consequently will either not be applied to at all, or, if at all, yet without much hopes of success; unless we are permitted so far to converse with them as the discharge of this office requires. This duty, indeed, lies with special obligations on the ministers of the church, who are bound to watch over every soul in their flock, and to be instant with them as well in private applications, and from house to house, as in the more public offices of instruction. But since the prepossessions these sort of men have generally conceived against us of the ministry, the reproaches of design or impertinence, with which they are apt to treat us, give other good Christians, against whom they are less prejudiced, greater probabilities of success with them, it is to be hoped they will think themselves not only permitted, but obliged to this sort of friendship and conversation with them.

But it is farther to be considered, in abatement of this restraint, that the great mixture there is in the business and affairs of life, the nearness of relation, or our acquaintance with such persons as may have these occasions of correspondence with wicked men, will sometimes engage us in necessary, and frequently in accidental conversations with them. But these we cannot reprove as criminal, because they are altogether unavoidable. If we would absolutely decline the wicked, we must abandon human society, must retire into a desert, and, as the apostle says, go out of the world. What we are forbid, therefore, is receiving such persons into our confidence and intimacies, choosing their alliance for our friendships, or their company for the ordinary entertainments of conversation; these are acts of choice, and our own free election; and to these, therefore, it is reasonable the prohibition should extend. And even with regard to that unavoidable correspondence with wicked men, to which the business or accidents of the world may sometimes oblige us, we are certainly under thus much restraint, not to enter into any farther familiarity than the occasion requires, and to take care of our behaviour under them, lest we countenance the sin, while we caress the sinner.

But I must observe one instance, in which we are restrained from joining with wicked men, even in such offices of common life and civil intercourse, which might otherwise be indifferent and allowable; and that is, when the person is judicially separated from the communion of the church; with such an one it is the apostle's express command no not to eat; and the reasons of this prohibition are very obvious, because the design of this sentence will in a great measure be defeated, unless the whole congregation concurs in the execution of it: for neither will the sinner be reclaimed, nor others deterred from the like commissions, nor the infection of the flock be prevented, if the criminal be permitted the same freedom and correspondence with Christians, as before; his punishment will have no outward effect that can lead him to reflect on his sin; and when he meets with the same countenance and friendship from the rest of the world as formerly, both he, and those he converses with, will be encouraged to despise the authority that inflicted it: and it is plain, that under the advantage of such a reception, he has just the same opportunity of corrupting others, as he had before. It may perhaps be imagined, that this exclusion from the ordinances of religion will answer all these purposes: but first, as to his corrupting others, unless he be deposed from some public office in the church, he is by this part of his sentence deprived of no opportunity he had before; secondly, as to himself, if he be a hardened sinner, as it must be supposed he is whom private and more gentle applications could not reclaim, this sentence only excludes him from what he had very little regard for before; or, if his crime was schism or heresy, his punishment is no more than he voluntarily chose. Now nothing can affect him in the nature of a punishment, but what deprives him of something he esteems and values, and the loss of which will render him uneasy; when therefore he finds himself avoided and neglected by his familiars, this affects him with a penalty the most sensible to human nature: this, if he has any principle of shame left in him, will awaken him to more serious thoughts of his condition, and give such considerations as are properly religious, a more easy access, and a more lively impression on his mind. It is therefore, I say, not only an obedience which we owe to the authority of our superiors, and the express command of an apostle in support of that authority, but a charity which is due from us to the souls of our brethren, thus to restrain our conversation from an excommunicated person, and by such a behaviour as will express abhorrence and detestation of his crime; both deter others from the like commissions, and humble him to such a sense of his guilt as will lead him to repentance, and save his spirit in the day of the Lord Jesus. The measure of our acquaintance or familiarity thus limited, I proceed,

II. To represent the advantages derived on us by observing these limitations, and confining our conversations to good men.

As to the religious restraint I last mentioned, the interdiction we are under from the society of persons cut off from the church, and consequently our confinement to such as persevere in the terms of its communion, since this is expressly enjoined us by a divine command, we might assure ourselves without further inquiry, that the most beneficial effects will attend our compliance with it. But the advantages intended in this institution are obvious to the least degree of reflection; and even those I have already suggested are so great, and so naturally result from it, that nothing further need be added to convince us of our interest, as well as duty, in observing it. I shall therefore consider, in a more general view, some common advantages we may hope for while we confine our conversation to men of virtue and religion. And,

First, I would recommend this choice as an evidence of our own virtue: for it will always be presumed, that men associate with persons of like dispositions with themselves. It cannot well be imagined, how friendship can long subsist between opposite tempers and inclinations: when men are so widely different in their sentiments and principles, in their pursuits and aversions, as the good and the vicious, it is impossible but they must soon grow burdensome and uneasy to one another; those things which are the mirth and pleasure of the one, provoke the indignation and abhorrence of the other; and under these perpetual occasions of disaster, familiarity must grow cold, and each be inclined to seek his entertainment in more agreeable company: and accordingly it is found in fact and experience, that the sentiments and inclinations, the virtues and vices of men, are what range and sort out mankind into their several clubs and societies. It will therefore, I say, be always, and with reason concluded, that he who herds with wicked men is himself of the same character. Whatever virtues may appear in him, they will be esteemed an hypocritical imposture on the world; and in his more retired pleasures, he will be presumed as much a libertine as the rest of his company; and consequently, we can by no other conduct avoid this appearance of evil, and preserve the reputation of our virtue, but by confining our conversations to good men. This argument, which dissuades an intimacy with wicked men from its effect on our reputation, may perhaps seem rather prudential than religious. But if we reflect what scandal we give to many weak men, by so offensive a conduct: how it unqualifies us for the instruction or reproof of others; how it corrupts our example, and gives countenance to the vicious and profane, we shall be convinced that this motive is properly Christian, and ought to be regarded from considerations of great importance to religion. But,

Secondly, Our associating ourselves with good men, is not only a proof and evidence of our virtue, but the most effectual method both to retain and improve it. Our advantage from the conversation of good men may be considered more particularly with respect to their discourse, and their example. The mind of the righteous (says the Psalmist) will be exercised in wisdom, and his mouth will be talking of judgment. From him we shall learn, and by just arguments be confirmed in true principles of faith and morality: the maxims that govern his conduct are such as equally tend to promote private and public happiness; and even his mouth is bounded by innocence and purity; and the sense of his own duty will engage him to cultivate the same just sentiments and good dispositions in those he converses with, to instruct their ignorance, reform their errors, and as the Apostle says, minister grace unto the hearers. Perhaps, indeed, the gentle admonitions wherewith good men will rebuke the imperfections of their friends, may be uneasy to the pride of some tempers; but these precious bulms (as the Psalmist calls them) are freedoms which wise and virtuous men will esteem rather favours than affronts. Holy David, though a prince, was sensible that his failings and miscarriages would make this consequence inseparable from his choosing the society of good men; but yet, rather than he would take refuge with the men that wrought wickedness, he makes it his request to God, that the righteous should smite him friendly, and reprove him. Psalm cxli. 6. And indeed there is no surer argument of a good understanding, and a Christian disposition, than being sensible of the friendship of a proper reproof. But the instructions and reproofs of good men can hardly fail of these beneficial effects on those who converse with them, when we consider how they are enforced by a correspondent example. When we find a man prescribe nothing to us but his own constant practice, we can have no suspicion of disguise or insincerity: he is himself what he desires us to be, and therefore gives us the greatest security that he intends our happiness in the methods of life he advises, since he pursues his own by the same.

Example is confessed to have this advantage over all other methods of instruction, that it not only teaches us our duty, but convinces us of the possibility of our imitation. When we see a man of like passions and weakness with ourselves, and no otherwise assisted than we either are, or may be, going before us in the paths of duty, it confutes all lazy pretences of impossibility; it reproaches our imperfection; and if we have any thing generous in our temper, it shames us into emulation. Nay, I would observe farther, that the example of a good man is, generally speaking, the best direction we can follow in the performance of our duty: the most exact rules and precepts are subject to be misunderstood; some capacities at least will mistake their meaning; and though they sincerely endeavour to obey, will act far from the intention of those who delivered them. But the example of a wise and good man ascertains the sense of the precept, and shews plainly how it is to be obeyed: and the meanest capacity, when he sees a rule practicably applied before his eyes, can no longer be at a loss how it is to be performed. It may be observed also under this head, that self-love is a very partial interpreter. We are apt to be fond of our opinions and practice, and perhaps without perceiving it to bend and accommodate the rule in favour to them: but when we apply it to the actions of other men, we judge with less interest, and consequently with more impartiality; whence it often happens that the notions of duty which we form from the example of others, is more correct and just than we derive from the rule itself.

To these advantages of conversing with good examples, we must add one which I think still greater, and that is the encouragement we receive in the performance of our duty. The shame of being singular is a weakness which has debauched the best and most ingenuous dispositions; but now by a constant view of good examples, we find that we are not alone, that we have numbers enough on our side to countenance us in our profession; and especially when we see wise men, persons of character and esteem, examples of duty, we are convinced that piety is no un reputable qualification, and that we need not be ashamed of our virtue; it will confirm our resolutions against the raileries or reproaches of the profane, and give us courage and confidence in our religion.

I might farther recommend the conversation of good men to our choice, from reasons of prudence and discretion. As that while we confine our intercourse to persons of this character, we are in no danger of treachery in our friendships, of fraud or injustice in our commerce: we have a security firmer than that of bonds and covenants, in their conscience and integrity: we are assured of a ready assistance in all our exigencies, from a conviction of their own duty: we have the satisfaction of conversing with men whose passions are under government and discipline; not to be affronted with trifles, nor provoked to any unreasonable resentment; difficultly moved, and easily appeased; men who are just and good-natured out of principle, in whose conversation we are secured from the slanders of the malicious, the envy of the spiteful, the censures of the impertinent, and the contempt of the proud: and in general, since so great a part of the uneasiness we complain of in this world is derived on us by the villainies and passions of unrighteous men, we can by no conduct more probably secure our happiness, than by confining our intercourse to men of virtue and religion. But my design being chiefly to insist on the religious advantages attending this choice of our acquaintance, I only mention these considerations as a collateral motive, and go on to engage you to it.

Thirdly, by representing the dangers and inconveniences we expose ourselves to, by being companions of wicked men.

Evil communications (says the Apostle) corrupt good manners. The best resolved virtue cannot long defend its integrity against the continual solicitations of a vicious acquaintance. As to our principles, the natural pride of men will make them restless and uneasy, till they get their sentiments and opinions received by those they converse with, and, till this is obtained, it is not society, but endless wrangling and controversy. And as to practice, the desire we have to endear ourselves to those we converse with, will insensibly engage us in the same pleasures and aversions with them: and it must be observed, as a farther circumstance of our danger, that the loose and dissolute are very industrious in communicating their principles, and gaining proselytes to sin. The natural shame and diffidence that attends vice, makes them zealous to encourage themselves by numbers, and form a party against religion: it is with pride they survey their increasing strength, and begin to think themselves a match for virtue. But it is with more than ordinary triumph they corrupt a man of pious and virtuous principles. It soothes their fears, and gives some ease to their scruples, to gain a convert who seemed to have all the conviction that religion could afford: this they are ready to look upon as a determination on their side, and decisive of the controversy between vice and virtue: and this is a conquest they never fail to attempt with the greatest application. For a virtuous man, while he preserves that character, is uneasy to their conversation. They look upon him, as the Wise Man describes their sentiments, as grievous to their eyes to behold (Wisd. ii. 15.); as one made to reprove their thoughts, to upbraid them with their offending the law, and object to their infamy the transgressions of their education: and therefore they never fail of their most artful and indefatigable address to silence this impertinent adviser, whose severity awes their excesses and restrains their freedom. And, alas! it is but too often and too easily they prevail. For though a well-directed conversation be one of the best methods to secure and improve our virtue, yet it is the misfortune of our fallen state that this principle acts with the greatest force in the worst application, and the familiarity of wicked men more successfully debauches than that of good men reforms. For it is a work of labour and assiduity to form and preserve a virtuous disposition; it is a plant not to be raised without culture and management, and requires care and attendance to give it vigour, and defend it from a thousand accidents that may make it miscarry; but vice is the natural growth of our corruption; remit but our care and it soon roots itself, and spreads over the neglected soil. How irresistibly then must it prevail, when the seeds of it are artfully sown, and industriously cultivated!

What power less than an uncommon measure of divine grace can preserve even a well-inclined temper from the infection of a loose and profane conversation, where vice appears with the advantages of fashion and reputation, and virtue, on the contrary, is traduced and ridiculed? If he behaves with that sobriety and reserve, which his religion requires from him; if he either reproves the immoral freedoms, or but refuses his applause to the profane mirth of his company, he is either quarrelled with for impertinence, or reproached for affectation and singularity. And how few instances have we of a courage, that can stand the shock of being the jest of his familiars: even modesty and good manners will help to corrupt him, and good-nature itself will endanger his virtue. In sum, what advantages can we expect, or rather what consequences are too terrible to be feared, from mixing in conversations where irreligion and profaneness, where a defiance of all rules, and a contempt of all that is holy, are the principles, and lewdness, intemperance, and vanity the diversions of the company; where the modest sinner is taught to ridicule Providence, conscience, and duty, and dispute himself into infidelity: his reluctance to disobedience will gradually wear off under these impressions, and sin become every day more familiar and less formidable: he will advance from one degree of wickedness and impenitence to another, till at last he becomes hardened without remorse or concern, and past hopes of recovery. Give me leave then to make some short application of what has been offered on this subject, to the common occasions of life and practice.

If then our virtue and integrity have so close a dependence on the choice of our friends and familiars; if the society of good men be so necessary to direct and confirm us in duty, and the conversation of wicked men so destructive of our principles and morality; as we value the favour of God and good men here, and the inestimable rewards of duty hereafter, let us with our utmost care make the important choice, and let us remember that we are choosing vice or virtue.

This caution indeed was always necessary, even in the purest and most virtuous ages, but it becomes us to recommend it with more than ordinary warmth and concern, when the numbers, the figure, and the insolence of wicked men have almost established sin as a fashion; when every enemy of religion appears openly and undisguised; when infidelity, schism, and heresy, are esteemed arguments of good sense and a superior understanding, and vice and profaneness are the polite entertainments of the world. So melancholy a prospect should inspire us with a more than ordinary zeal to oppose some stop to the rising torrent, and check this overflowing of ungodliness; and, as the most effectual remedy that can be applied, to deter others and withdraw ourselves from the conversation of wicked men. By this alone we shall be able to fix a mark of shame and ignominy on vice, and recover its just honour and esteem to virtue. And this conduct is the more necessary in private Christians, because it has been one deplorable effect of these corruptions, and the miserable confusion of our religious divisions, to bring the public discipline of the church into a sad, and, it is to be feared, irretrievable decay: good men should be therefore the more zealous to supply this unavoidable defect, to distinguish such persons as the censures of the church (if duly executed) would exclude from their society, by marks of abhorrence and detestation; and, as far as their private conversation reaches, excommunicate the enemies of virtue and religion.

Thanks be to God, the world is not yet so bad, that we need fear a solitude; from the practice; the righteous are not so failed from the earth, but we may still find men of virtue and piety enough for the intimacies of friendship, and the entertainments of conversation: or whatever we may want in the numbers of our acquaintance will be abundantly made up to us in their value. Nay even this complaint will every day lessen upon our hands; the credit and honour we shall retrieve to virtue by this conduct, will irresistibly gain it converts, and we shall have at the same time the satisfaction of making and enjoying good men.

To conclude: Let neither the power nor quality of the great, or the wit of the pleasant; let neither interest, vanity, nor fear prevail with us, to court the favour to flatter the vices, or applaud the profaneness of wicked men. Virtue and religion, heaven and eternal happiness, are not trifles to be given up in a compliment, or sacrificed to a jest. And if we are either ashamed or afraid to assert the cause of religion, and give countenance to the servants of Christ here, of us shall the Son of Man be ashamed, before his Father and the holy angels.

SERMON LXI.

The great Advantages of good Discourse, and the Mischiefs of the contrary.

By Dr. ROGERS.

Eccl. iv. 29.

Let no corrupt communication proceed out of your mouth, but that which is good to the use of edifying, that it may minister grace unto the hearers.

In application of another scripture, I endeavoured to represent the obligations we are under to choose good men for our friendships and intimacies, what limits this duty admits of, and what advantages would attend our compliance with it. The words I have now read to you lead us into an argument of great affinity with that subject, and direct us to the matter that should employ our common conversations: a direction indeed absolutely necessary to render the choice of our acquaintance, I before recommended, effectual to the advantages proposed from

it. The matter of our conversation comprehends that share of our words, for actions, by which we support our common intercourse one with another. As to actions, because they are not expressly included in this direction of the Apostle, I shall only observe in few words, that they must be limited by virtue and innocence. Actions of civil business are not only permitted under this character of innocence, but, when governed by justice and honesty, oblige us as necessary duties; but in actions of pure diversion, nothing farther is to be considered, than whether they are innocent: and with this restriction they are not only consistent with the sobriety of the gospel, but in many cases useful, if not necessary, to ease our cares, and relax our mind from the fatigue of intent applications, and recruit our spirits for a more vigorous return to duty. Thus feasts have been the unproved practice of the greatest examples of piety, in all ages; and our Lord himself honoured them more than once by his presence, and added to the provisions of one of them by a miracle: and as to the amusements of play, while they go no farther than a diversion, it must be too great severity absolutely to condemn them. But then these indulgences are abused, when our feasts, either by their excess or too great frequency, break in upon our temperance when play, either by our too constant or too long engagement in it, becomes like an employment or profession; or by our too great intention on it, betrays us to passion or avarice, and rather tires than relieves our mind. When diversions are either in their nature, or by such prevailing abuses as cannot well be separated from them, rendered dangerous to our virtue; when they expose us to the influence of evil examples, to the temptation of opportunity, and all the provocations that can solicit men to lewdness or intemperance; it is not only unsafe, but sinful, to join in them: with such unfruitful works of darkness, no virtuous or good man will have fellowship, but rather with abhorrence avoid them, and with a Christian zeal reprove them. But I go on to that branch of conversation which the Apostle here expressly directs, our words and discourse. This is a part of our conversation of much greater extent, and consequently liable to more irregularities, than our actions either are or can be. For our actions are confined to the present objects, either the entertainments of the company, or the persons who compose it; but our discourse is no more confined than our thoughts, extends to all subjects, present or absent, past or future, and may be criminally employed on all, and therefore requires much greater care to keep it within the bounds of innocence and virtue. The Apostle in the words of my text has given us a general, but very full direction for our behaviour in this particular. In which we observe,

I. A prohibition from such subjects or expressions, as may shew a corrupt disposition in ourselves, or tend to infuse it into others.

II. A positive direction to such a communication, as is agreeable to the spirit of the gospel; such as is good to the use of edifying, that it may minister grace to the hearers. I shall consider each of these distinctly, and then,

III. Exhort you with the Apostle to conform to this excellent rule, by representing the advantages of a conversation so directed.

I. Under the forbidden head, we are to rank all profane, irreligious, or immodest discourses; all that may discover or encourage a contempt, or even a slight regard to things holy (for all these come under the character of blasphemy). God and his service, and whatsoever relates to it, are subjects of too serious importance to be treated with mirth and levity; ought always to command our respect, and never be mentioned without awe and reverence: his holy name must not be appealed to on trifles, but be reserved sacred for the most weighty and solemn occasions of life. Our assertions and negations should be yea and nay, for whatsoever is more than these, in ordinary conversation, we are told is sin. Neither can filthy communication, i. e. lewd or immodest subjects or expressions, be esteemed proper entertainments for the mouth of a Christian. These are subjects which the Apostle commands should not be so much as named among us, as becometh saints. Eph. v. 3. And indeed, he who can treat offences so provoking to God as jests and trifles; must have very little sense of the heinousness of them, and be under very slender restraints from the commission of them.

Another sort of discourses I would here mention as forbidden by the Apostle, are such as are injurious to our neighbour. The former offences indeed are so far reducible to this head, as they tend to introduce libertinism, and corrupt the manners of men, and consequently injure them in their most valuable properties, their virtue and religion. But the discourses I would here more expressly dissuade, are such as affect our neighbour with more immediate and direct, though, perhaps, not more dangerous injuries; such as reproaches, which provoke the passions of the present, or slanders, which traduce the reputation of the absent. When we sport ourselves with the imperfections or misfortunes of our brethren; when we entertain our company with scandal or detraction; when we either asperse the merit or aggravate the faults of our neighbour; we are guilty of an offence against this prohibition of the Apostle: these are effects of those unsociable passions, that anger and malice, he excludes; liberties forbidden our conversation, and irreconcilable to the temper of Christianity. And to these we must add, lastly, lying one to another; a vice subversive of the very ends and designs of conversation, the most odious to the God of truth, and equally the contempt and abhorrence of men. It is true, the greater part of these irregularities may seem provided against by the common rules of decency and good manners, and sufficiently discouraged by the neglect and reproach they expose men to; but it is evident, that in a general corruption of manners, these restraints are in many instances without effect; the notions of decency are then changed, and every vice becomes reputable and applauded, which is agreeable to the prevailing taste and corruption of the age. The laws of the gospel therefore are the only standing, immutable rule of morality; and the penalties affixed by God to the breach of those laws, the only guards that can effectually restrain men within the true bounds of decency and virtue. But I proceed,

II. To the positive part of the Apostle's direction. The subjects that should employ our conversation, we are told are such as are good to the use of edifying, and which may minister grace to the hearers: Let your speech be always with grace, seasoned with salt (Col. iv. 6.); that is, such as may shew forth the grace of God dwelling in us, be an evidence of the soundness of our own hearts, and be of efficacy to preserve those we converse with from corruption. Now we shall comply with this precept, and may hope for these good effects from our discourse, when we entertain our company with observations either on the mercies or judgments of God, or the works of his Providence; when we encourage one another in a firm adherence to duty, either by the arguments and prospects of religion, or by the examples of those who have gone before us in perseverance; when we instruct the ignorant, direct the doubtful, commend the virtuous, or reprove the sinner. In short, as God and our duty should be always before the eyes, and have a share in the thoughts and regards of a Christian, in every period and hour of his life; so they must by no means be thrown by for so large a proportion of our time, as is employed in conversation with one another. On the contrary, our Saviour has assured us that these subjects must enter into our most familiar intercourse, and has left it as a standing rule, by which our virtue and grace should be judged of, that a good man out of the good treasure of his heart will bring forth good things, and the wicked evil; for out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh. (Luke, vi. 45.) Where a zeal for the honour of God and the happiness of mankind is the governing passion of a man's heart, the effect of it will naturally appear in such discourses as tend to promote these ends: and as there is scarce any incident of life and conversation, but what is capable of being applied to some purpose of morality or religion; so a mind thus disposed will immediately perceive and improve the occasion, and be fond in engaging the company in such reflection.

tions, as to, itself are most agreeable and entertaining.

Not that I would exclude the common accidents of life, and much less the business and affairs of it; nay, nor even things of a pleasant and divertive nature, so they are modest and innocent, from being sometimes the subject of conversation. For as with respect to actions, though we are commanded to pray always, and the like; yet the rule is not to be so understood as to forbid our attendance on necessary business, or sometimes on the diversions of life: so though this precept of St. Paul for religious discourse, be delivered without any reserve for business or entertainment; yet the necessities of human life will oblige us to infer, that the Apostle left it to the common sense of mankind to make the exception: and all we are to conclude from it is, that virtue and religion should be subjects always in our view, and what we should chiefly labour to promote, in every part of our conversation. When we are engaged on different subjects, we converse only as men; but when the truths or duties of religion are our argument, we then appear in a higher character; we then converse as Christians, as men whose conversation is in heaven, as persons of great and generous pursuits, and whose ambition is raised above the little prospects of this world. But let us proceed,

III. To what I principally intended in this discourse, to enforce this exhortation of the Apostle, by observing the advantages of a conversation so directed.

I know nothing can be more justly charged with the slight and contempt which is put upon religion by some, and that coldness and indifference with which it is entertained by others, and in general that visible decay of true zeal and piety we observe and lament in the world, than the disuse of serious and instructive discourse in conversation. It is a very great, and, in its consequences, a very fatal point gained by the libertine, when he could not prevail on men of virtue and sobriety wholly to give up their religion, but to persuade them to confine it to the temple or the closet; to limit it to set times, to certain and those narrow bounds, out of which our it should be improper and ridiculous, and for when once men had banished religion in gion from so large a share of their time, as is taken up in conversation, the more solemn returns of it not only grew burdensome and disaffecting from the intermission; but the vicious and profane liberties, which assumed its place in discourse, left such a stain on the minds of men, as indisposed them for the good effects of our public assemblies; and by degrees introduced in some a total disregard of all religion, and in many debased the remains of it with such a mixture of vicious habits and principles, as rendered it no better than a superficial pretence, unacceptable to God, and ineffectual to the great ends proposed in the gospel. The first therefore and principal benefit we may expect from restoring religion to our conversations, is the reviving the declining sense, and retrieving the power of it; and that this conduct may be as effectual to the reformation, as the contrary has been to the corruption of the world.

That these are no unreasonable hopes will appear, if we consider the peculiar advantages by which this application is fitted to instruct our ignorance, correct our errors, and improve our inclinations to duty, more than either our public instructions, or the private applications of our retreatments, which, if we exclude religion from our conversations are the only methods left for these effects. As to public instructions, it is observable that what we hear in conversation has this general advantage over set discourses, that in the latter we are apt to attend more to the beauty and elegance of the composure, than to the matter delivered; to look upon them as the effects of labour and art, and to consider ourselves rather as judges of the skill and abilities of the preacher, than as receiving directions for our life and actions. These are indeed great abuses of such excellent means of grace and spiritual improvement, but such as I am afraid will never wholly be removed, while men have the common passions and vanities of human nature about them: but now the instructions we receive in conversation, are infinitely less subject to these abuses: we are there with an expectation of an accurate performance; the person who speaks is not as distinguished by any station or office, but as upon a level with the rest of the company, and prepared as well to receive as to give instruction: and as every one is permitted and expected to reply in his turn, the attention is unavoidably engaged to the matter and argument, and not diverted by fruitless criticisms on the skill or address of the orator. It is to be observed farther in this comparison, that public instructions are liable to be mistaken, or not understood by the hearers. That which is plain to one capacity may be intricate and unintelligible to another. He has a great many objections to propose, doubts to be resolved, and questions to be answered, before he can apprehend or submit to the force of the argument. Now in conversation we have opportunity of satisfying all our scruples, of having what is obscure to us explained, what is doubtful confirmed, and being delivered from all possibility of error or mistake. Neither can our private applications to reading or meditation supply these defects in our public instructions, but are liable to the same inconveniences that they are. An author cannot answer our objections, or be more particular in the explication of his meaning, than he that speaks from the pulpit. But I go on to observe farther, that in one very important part of instruction, the reforming the loose and vicious, private admonitions are without comparison the most effectual method; for public reproofs of sin delivered from the pulpit are, and for many necessary reasons ought to be; general, though by this they lose a great deal of their effect to particular men; for even well-disposed minds are contented to apply very little of them to themselves: but in private conversations the application may be more personal: the reproofs when so directed come home, and cannot be declined; the sinner is, as it were, taken in the fact, and cannot avoid the charge. Nay, if it be considered how seldom men of wicked principles and dissolute lives can be prevailed on to attend our public assemblies, and by how many strong prejudices their ears are stopped, and their hearts hardened against any impression from what is there delivered, we can have very little hope of reclaiming them by this method of instruction. But if religion were once generally introduced into our conversations, as they could not avoid sometimes hearing their duty and their faults, so the friendship of the company would give the application a favourable access to their minds, unobstructed by those aversions which prepossess them against the public ministry. To which let me here add, that if religion were restored to its proper share in our conversations, that secret confidence of the sinner that others are as wicked as himself, though better concealed, and which perhaps is the greatest support to infidelity, would be entirely taken off. He has been taught to ridicule our public assemblies, as things only of form and fashion, as a trade in the preacher, and either custom or hypocrisy in his hearers; and in these sentiments he has been very much confirmed, by observing that at other times they can forget their piety, and appear as little confined in their mirth as the rest of the company: from hence he has been tempted to believe, that they had really as little religion as himself, but only less courage to own their infidelity. But when such a man shall observe us at all times the same, and that we carry our religion always about us, he must acquit us of disguise and hypocrisy, and be convinced that we are in earnest in our profession, that our virtue is the first principle and constant habit of our minds. And when he sees men of as fair titles to sense and reputation as himself, behave themselves as seriously convinced of their duty, it must shock his infidelity, and make him suspect his confidence, and think it worth his while to re-examine the arguments of religion, and consider more attentively whether he be not mistaken.

To close this argument: In conversation the tempers of men are open and accessible, their attention is awake, and their minds disposed to receive the strongest impressions; and what is spoken is generally more affecting, more apposite to particular occasions; and though less accurate, yet expressed with more life and spirit than is usually found in the compositions of the closet. And it is pity, opportunities so improvable to the greatest and most important purposes of religion, should be either thrown away on trifles, or abused to the promotion of vice and immorality; and the things which might be so much to our advantage, be made the occasion of our falling. Give me leave then, in conclusion of what I have offered, to exhort and intreat you with the Apostle, to let your communication be agreeable to this excellent rule he has here prescribed us.

Let us then reflect that we are Christians, that we are called by the name of the Son of God, and baptized into an irreconcilable enmity with sin, the world, and the devil: that therefore neither the suggestions of our spiritual enemy, nor insinuations of the world, should prevail with us to do or comply with any thing, how customary soever, which may prejudice the interest we have sworn to promote, and reflect dishonour on our holy profession. If either the wit, the figure, or the friendship of wicked men can engage us to assist or acquiesce in immoral freedoms of a vicious conversation: if either the fear of offending, or the care of pleasing men, can make us applaud the lewd, or laugh with the atheist; if we can sit tamely and hear fools make a mock at sin, affront the God whom we serve, and vilify the religion by which we hope to be saved; be we assured that by whatever mannerly names we may palliate the offence, this is not modesty, but cowardice, and a traitorous desertion of our allegiance to Christ; that it is crucifying the Son of God afresh, and putting him to an open shame: a crime for which we shall one day be told we are unworthy of him.

Let us further reflect, that religion is not the business of some fits only and intervals of our life, to be taken up at certain days and hours, and laid aside for the rest of our time, but a system of precepts to be regarded in all our conduct, to direct us in public and private; in our business and diversions, in our retirements and conversations; and that all our thoughts, words, and actions, should either promote, or at least be consistent with our observance of these rules.

Let us remember, that God is present in all our assemblies, that he remarks and treasures up against the day of our account every word and expression, and every circumstance of our behaviour in them. By your words (says our Saviour) you shall be justified, and by your words you shall be condemned. And, if every idle word shall be strictly accounted for at the tribunal of Christ, where shall the dissolute and profane, the liar, the slanderer, and the malicious appear? And lastly, let it not be thought that religion is too barren or too melancholy a subject for the entertainment of a Christian. It is indeed a stranger to those follies which usually pass for the diversions of company. It affords nothing to flatter the corrupt passions, amuse the impertinence, or sport with the vanity of men. But the subjects it offers us, as they are great and noble in the theory, and every way suited to the dignity of our understanding; so every step we take in the consideration of them, discovers so wise and so affectionate concern in God for our happiness, and opens such animating views to our faith, as must fill the mind with a manly and rational pleasure, a joy unspeakable and full of glory. And if discourses on these subjects are burdensome or insipid to men, it is a strong suspicion their lives are such as render religion and futurity uneasy prospects to their fears. It is no wonder indeed if wicked men prefer the light flashes of a wanton mirth, which for a while suspend reflection and hide the sinner from himself, to such discourses as awaken conscience, and prophesy no good concerning them, but only evil continually. Or if men of virtue are at any time guilty of so much weakness, as to appear displeased with a serious and instructive conversation, it cannot be from an aversion to the argument; for it is impossible they should really be offended with such subjects, as are the great entertainment of their retirement: but it must proceed from too great a concern for the uneasiness of the company, and want of courage to oppose a corrupt and unreasonable custom. But if men had resolution enough to attempt it, these foolish discouragements would soon be removed. If good men with the liberty of an honest zeal opposed and reprov'd all profane or immodest freedoms in conversation, veneration and respect would attend them, and would soon improve itself into a

The libertine would retire to the stews, and profaneness be confined to the brothel. Joy, and peace, and esteem, would bless the dwellings of the righteous; and the purity and holiness of his conversation here, would prepare him for that heavenly society, into which nothing unclean shall enter.

SERMON LXII.

By Dr. ROGERS.

The great Duty of redeeming Time, and the Danger of neglecting it.

Eph. v. 16.

Redeeming the time because the days are evil.

IN the preceding parts of this epistle the Apostle reminds the Ephesians of the guilt and misery of their former unconverted estate, when they were aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, dead in trespasses and sins, having no hope, and without God in the world. This review he makes use of, as an argument of great force to quicken them in the improvement of those advantages to which the mercy of God had called them by the gospel. They were now the children of light, had a clear prospect of happiness and immortality opened to their faith, and were directed to the duties by which they might attain it. It therefore highly concerned them to reflect, how great obligations both the memory of their past misconduct, and their present advantages, laid on them to act as new creatures, to walk with care and circumspection, not as fools who trifle away life in a thoughtless security, but as wise men who have the noblest and most important end in view, and with the greatest attention watch every opportunity that may be improved to the attainment of it, and retrieve, as far as they are able, every mis-spent or unprofitable hour which has slipped from them. And to strengthen the influence of these reflections on their past and present time, he carries their view also forward, and observes to them, that the days were evil, that the prospect before them was full of danger, and temptation, and therefore there was no time to be lost in the application he recommended, but they should immediately set about the grand work of redeeming their time.

That this comprehensive precept may have its due influence on us, it will be of use to us to consider,

I. The extent and import of it.

II. The motives which recommend it to our observance. And,

1. This precept in the first view of the expression carries a regard to time past, and directs us to retrieve, as far as we are able, our former miscarriages.

2. With great care and attention to improve the present opportunities of life, to set a due value upon our time, and not suffer it to pass unprofitably from us.

3. To be provident for the future, and with wise resolution to guard against every thing that may lead us into misapplications of it.

1. This precept admonishes us to regain and retrieve the time past. Time indeed, in a natural sense, is irrecoverable, the moment that is but just fled by us it is impossible for us to recall; but in a moral sense we may be said to regain or redeem our time that is past, when we correct the mistakes of our former conduct, and repair the damages we may have received from it. And this, blessed be God, through the mercies of the gospel, is very much in our power: by a sincere repentance, and a more vigorous application to duty, the stains we have contracted by sin may be washed out, the penalties we have incurred be averted from us, and the innocence we have lost and forfeited be regained. This inestimable privilege Christ has purchased for us. He has paid down the price of this redemption of our time; and if we comply with the terms of the contract he has made for us, if by a sincere sorrow and contrition for our past offences, and a steady resolution of new life, we qualify ourselves for the favour, the veracity of God has assured it to us. By these applications and these only, it is in our power to retrieve the years we have spent in vanity, and revive our title to happiness. But then this implies,

2. That we use our utmost care and diligence to improve the present opportunities of life, and not suffer a day to pass unprofitably by us. For the way to regain the past time is, to make a double use of the present. If he to whom ten talents were committed has squandered away five, he is concerned to make a double improvement of the remainder, if he would give a just account to his master. Every moment must be precious in his eyes, every advantage it offers be attended to and cultivated, and every danger it brings with it be guarded against with the greatest circumspection. Should we apply this precept only to those who are concerned to recover time they have lost, it would doubtless extend to the whole race of mankind. For who is there so righteous among us, as to be able to reflect even on one day of his life, in which he has done nothing which he ought not to have done, or left nothing undone which he ought to have done? But let him who is most without concern for the days that are past, remember, that sufficient unto the present is the evil thereof. Math. vi. 34. The duties that every hour brings with it, the dangers and temptations that attend it, will minister full employment for our greatest vigilance; and he who makes the best improvement of his time will find he has none to spare. Not that the duties of religion, strictly so called, require so entire a devotion of our time, as to allow none to be otherwise employed. The proper business of every one's peculiar station must have a large allotment made to it; and he who conducts himself in the common affairs of life according to the rules prescribed by religion, is at that time obeying God in duties the most acceptable to him. Indeed, as a great part of our sins consist in some irregularities attending the ordinary pursuits of life, so our reformation must appear not in our laying those employments aside, but pursuing them within the boundaries of duty. Nay, some part of our time may lawfully and innocently be engaged in actions purely divertive. Some indulgence must be made for the recruit and refreshment both of body and mind, which under long attention are apt to sink and grow unactive, and lose that vigour and cheerfulness which are necessary to fit them for duty; and these intermissions, if moderately used, and properly chosen, will be allowed us by God in the account of our time. But when diversion is made the business and study of life, when it engrosses either the whole or the greater part of our time, though the actions chosen be in themselves never so innocent, yet the excess will render them criminal; and the tenderest reflection we can make on a life so spent, is, that it is one great blank, which, though not blotted and deformed with sin, is yet without any of those characters of grace or virtue to which the promise of happiness is made. But as it concerns us carefully to improve the present time, so is it,

3. Our duty to be provident for the future, and wisely to guard against whatever may lead us into misapplications of it. He who at present stands is cautioned by the Apostle to take heed lest he fall; the difficulties and temptations which attend our course will more easily be borne or avoided, if with prudent foresight we arm ourselves against them. And in this conduct of spiritual wisdom, we shall be very much assisted by reflecting often on our past miscarriages, by observing what are the sins that most easily beset us, by what illusions they have prevailed, and what circumstances of life have most usually led us into them. By such a review we shall be enabled to discern and strengthen our weaknesses with good resolutions, and so to dispose and order our future conversation as may render us least exposed to the occasions of our falling. And of equal use will it be to look also forward, to consider what evil the next day may probably bring forth, and with wise presumption of the enemy prepare and fortify ourselves against our conflict with him. If we thus guard our future, and thus carefully improve our present time, we shall assuredly redeem all that we have lost, and lay up in store a good foundation against the day of necessity. I go on then,

II. To consider the motives and inducements which recommend this conduct to us.

As the precept in the first intention of it carries a retrospect to time past, so the first argument from which the Apostle recommends the observance of it, is taken from that review. When we reflect on our former transgressions, that we have provoked the Author of our being, on whose pleasure all our happiness depends, to whose bounty we owe those very faculties by the abuse of which we have offended him, what shame and indignation must it raise in our breast, what zeal to retrieve the miscarriage, and by the most vigorous application to duty to atone for our past ingratitude? And when we recollect the infinite danger to which we have been exposed, that we have perhaps for many years walked upon the edge of a precipice, while nothing but the slender ward of a human life has held us up from sinking into endless misery; with what trembling eagerness should we seize the important present, and labour to rescue ourselves from this state of terror? These reflections on our past miscarriages, the Apostle enforces,

Secondly, By reminding us of the present graces and indulgences vouchsafed us, for the improvement of which we are accountable to God. It is an instance of mercy which demands the utmost returns of the sinner, that the divine compassion has hitherto spared him, and not cut him off in the midst of his iniquity; that he has given him one day more to provide for his salvation, and flee from the wrath to come. But his gratitude must be under still further obligations, when he reflects on the various means of grace that are offered him; the clear light and direction to duty which he enjoys; the noble encouragements proposed to his obedience; the many calls of God by his word, by his ministers, and by the secret whispers of his Spirit, to close with these overtures and be saved. How sore a burden must it add to our account, if we are unprofitable under so many applications? How shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation? To the redemption of the past, by a due improvement of the present time, and a wise provision for the future, we are farther persuaded by the Apostle from this consideration, that the days are evil. This reflection might, perhaps, especially regard the difficulties and distresses to which the early profession of Christianity was exposed: but surely there is no age of the church to which this argument may not be applied in a very persuasive sense. Difficulties and temptations will never be wanting in the prospect of Christians, which will require their greatest care and attention to guard against them. They have an adversary strong and subtle, whose malice will never cease to attempt their subversion, against whom our utmost precaution and the most powerful weapons in the armoury of God are represented as defence little enough to enable us to stand. And if at the same time we consider the number of wicked men in the world, with what assiduity they are ever labouring to corrupt our religion, and ensnare our virtue; some to pervert the faith by heresies, others to break the communion of saints by schism, and others by libertine principles and vicious examples to debauch our morals, we shall conclude that this argument of the apostle will at all times deserve our attention, and enforce the precept it is here applied to. Our whole life, indeed, in this world may properly be described under this character of evil days; a state of danger, temptation, and infirmity; a pilgrimage through a difficult and perilous wilderness, which requires us to attend diligently to our way; if we have gone wrong, to redeem the mistake; if we have loitered, to quicken our pace, and make the most of the present opportunity; and at the same time to look carefully forward, and with wise circumspection guard against the numerous evils which on every side beset us.

The several duties implied in this precept of redeeming our time, and the arguments used by the apostle to recommend it to our observance, I beg leave farther to enforce by these general considerations.

1. These duties cannot but appear of infinite concern to us, when we reflect how short and uncertain our time is. This may, perhaps, be thought so trite and obvious a reflection, that none can want to be reminded of it; and indeed in the affairs and pursuits of this life, it seems to be enough attended to. The man intent on the world need not be persuaded to make haste to be rich, nor the ambitious to seize the first opportunity of advancing himself to honour; and the great maxim of the libertine is, let us eat and drink, and enjoy as much pleasure as we can to-day, for to-morrow we die.

And yet in the pursuit of our immortal interests, where it ought to have the greatest influence, this obvious indisputable truth is little regarded by us. In this respect the children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light: admitting their principles to be true, that the only portion of man is in this life, they act wisely; they keep their end, evil as it is, steadily in view; improve every incident to the promotion of it, and leave nothing to be done to-morrow, which may be executed to-day in advancement of it. But how often shall we see men, professing themselves Christians, acknowledging the doctrines, and valuing their hopes in the promise of the gospel, and yet with strange inconsistency putting off all concerns for the attainment of them from day to day, and from year to year? Every interest or pleasure of life, even the most trifling amusement, is suffered to postpone the one thing necessary. Some time or other the man resolves to set about it, but it is soon enough yet: he must first acquire such a degree of fortune, place himself in such a station of life, and then he will give over all farther pursuits of this world, and make provision for another. This also is the foolish scheme of the epicure. He cannot yet disengage himself from the company, the mirth, and the pleasures he has been used to; but in a few years his circumstances of life will be altered, and his desires be more easily governed, and then he will apply himself in earnest to works of penitence and religion. But when this projected time comes, some new illusions arise, which deter the intended reformation a little longer. Our later vanities succeed into the same power and dominion over us that the former had, and the answer to religion continues still the same: Go thy way for this time, at a more convenient season I will send for thee. Acts, xxiv. 25. But what season can be so convenient as the present? How know we that a day, that an hour longer will be granted us? that our souls shall not this night be required from us, laden with those unpardoned sins to which we proposed to repent even to-morrow? Methinks this is a reflection which, if attended to, should strike terror and amazement into the securest sinner ; engage him with fear and trembling to lay hold on the present moment, and not suffer it to pass without improvement by him. Even he who has the fairest prospect of life before him, who rejoices in the strength and beauty of youth, yet if he considers by how precarious a tenure he holds these advantages, that a thousand accidents may before the next dawn lay all these glories in the dust ; and, if this very possible event should happen, he must immediately enter upon an eternal unalterable state of happiness or misery ; that if he has made no provision for this great change, the omission can never be repaired, the time misspent never be redeemed ; that he is lost and undone for ever, condemned to everlasting anguish and despair ; can he stand against the terror of so awakening a reflection ? Can he go calmly on, and leave so important, so irretrievable an interest at so much hazard and uncertainty ? When a near and certain approach of death sets this prospect before us, it seldom fails of its influence on us. With what regret will the wounded soul then look back on the years it has wasted in pursuits of vanity ? How will he wish to recal the precious hours he has spent in trifles, loitered away in idle, unprofitable diversions ? And if by due reflection we at any time bring this prospect to be equally present to us, it will have the same effect and impression on us. And what charm is it that can thus draw a veil before the eyes of men, and hide this important conclusion from them ? What ! though the lamp of life be full of oil, and burn strong, yet when we consider that a blast of air may blow it out, that a shower, a drop of rain may extinguish it, and that it is every moment exposed to these accidents, shall we defer a work on which our eternal happiness or misery depends ; a work which cannot be done but by this light, in a vain confidence of its burning down to the last possibility of life ? Rejoice, O young man (says Solomon in a severe sarcasm), and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, and walk in the ways of thy heart, and in the sight of thine eyes : but know thou, that for these things God will bring thee into judgment. Eccles. xi. 9. To those surely who have gone far and long in the ways of sin, we need only observe, that the day is far spent, and the night is at hand ; that they have much time to redeem ; have already spent the fairest part of their portion, and therefore are concerned with the utmost solicitude to husband the poor remainder. It is something peculiarly shocking to see gray hairs, and the infirmities of age, squandering away the last stake of life in sin and folly, without remorse for the past, and thoughtless of the future. With whatever delusions we may flatter our own security, such examples are not looked on without terror and concern. And I question not but each beholder resolves to be wiser for himself, long before that age to abstract from the world and reform, and not leave the whole task of the day to be wrought out at the last hour ; at least to devote that period wholly to religion, and the care of eternity. But alas ! how few are prevailed on to make the proper inference from these observations, to reflect that it is not only uncertain whether they shall arrive at that period, but uncertain also whether they shall employ that last reserve better than others have done before them ? That though the day of their natural life may continue to that time, yet their day of salvation may expire before ; and from these just apprehensions to conclude the wisdom of attending to the present calls of grace, lest they be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin, and the slighted mercy be withdrawn from them ?

To this consideration of the shortness and uncertainty of our time, let us farther add the greatness and difficulty of the work we have to perform in it. To subdue the lusts and passions of our corruption, to correct the evil propensities of our nature, to possess the soul with the reverence and love of God, to sow and cultivate in it the seeds of grace, and improve them into settled habits of piety and virtue ; in short, to prepare it to be a fit inhabitant of that holy place to which we aspire, is a work not to be accomplished in a moment, but to be brought to perfection by slow and gradual advances, through several hard and laborious stages of discipline. Various mortifications must be undergone, many difficulties and obstructions conquered, many strong attacks of the enemy withstood, before we can arrive at a just maturity in religion, at the firmness of an able and faithful soldier of Christ. A work thus difficult can never be begun too soon; it is the business of our whole life, and he who sets earliest about it, will find his time little enough for the finishing of it; but the longer it is deferred, the more difficult it becomes: he who begins late is not only obliged to learn to do well, to form anew the whole disposition of his soul, to acquire new habits of life, to practise duties to which he is utterly a stranger; but, which is a much harder task than this, he must unlearn all his former life; renounce gratifications he has long been used to; divest himself of habits which by custom have grown up to be a part of his constitution, and are become a kind of second-nature to him; contend with an enemy that has long subdued him; resist the strongest temptations from the violence of his own desires, the importunity and reproaches of his old companions in sin, and, which perhaps is not the least mortifying part of his discipline, he must humble himself to an acknowledgment of his own folly. And when we consider that all this is to be performed under the pangs and remorse of a wounded conscience, and a continual dread lest the evil day overtake him before he has finished his work and made his peace with God, how great must the labour, how severe the conflict be? Since then the burden of the work increases with the delay, with what persuasion should this argument recommend to us the immediate dispatch of it? The question of Nicodemus, Can a man be born again when he is old? may not improperly be asked even in that spiritual sense meant by our Saviour. Through the grace of God this is not impossible: but when we reflect how unfit we are for any weighty performance in that unactive part of our life, how often the faculties of the mind are as much decayed as those of the body, how many imperfections will attend even the best we are able to do, the diffidence we must be under whether God will accept our poor defective services, whether he will regard our sacrifice when we have nothing to offer him but the dregs and refuse of life, the days of loathing and satiety; and the years in which we have no pleasure; what amazing folly is it to defer the great business of life to a time the least qualified for a due performance of it? Each of these arguments, one would think, were sufficient to recommend to us the wise advice in my text; but when they are collected together, and set before us in one view; when we consider how short and precarious our time is, the difficulty of the work to be accomplished; that every day both adds to the difficulty of the service, and takes away from our strength to perform it; how uncertain it is whether the years we propose to ourselves shall be indulged us; uncertain whether we shall have power or even inclination to improve them better than those we now squander away; and uncertain whether God will accept so maimed and defective an offering; and lastly, that the stake we leave to the hazard of so many uncertainties, is nothing less than our eternal salvation; when, I say, these important considerations are brought together, and set before a rational being intent on happiness, and acknowledging the truth of every article, could it be imagined that a bare single possibility should be of weight enough to overbalance them all? And yet thus it is; this is the whole strength of the sinner's confidence; it is possible he may live to be old; it is possible the grace of God may then enable him to redeem the years he has lost, and receive him to mercy: but how much more possible is it that all these schemes may miscarry, and how dreadful is the event if they do so!

Whoso is wise will ponder these things, will understand the loving kindness of the Lord, and learn to value and improve the opportunities before him. He who has lived with the greatest care, will find upon a review of his time that he has something to redeem; but he who has mispent much, has still a greater concern upon him: hard is the task he has to perform, and short the time in which it must be performed; yea, the greater the work, the shorter the time; and therefore with the greater diligence should he apply himself to the improvement of it. In sum, he who has wasted much of his stock, is concerned attentively to improve the little that is left; and he who has been most frugal, need not be at a loss for the employment of it all. May God give us grace seriously to regard these important truths; so to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom; by a prudent management of the present day, to retrieve the errors of those that are past; and lay up something in store which may support us in the evil day, and abide with us for ever.

I beg leave only farther to observe how peculiarly the present holy season suggests these reflections to us. We are now more disengaged from the pleasures and divisions of life, that the mind may cool, and be at leisure to attend to its domestic concerns, to consider what habit wants to be corrected, what inclination to be subdued, what weakness to be strengthened, and what virtue to be confirmed and improved. Spiritual revelation is, indeed, at all times a duty, and there passes not a day but gives us occasion for it; but since what is left to be done at any time, is very apt to be wholly omitted, the ancient usage of the church has with great piety and wisdom appointed certain seasons for this exercise, and recommended such restraints as may dispose us for it. The more bodily exercise of abstinence, or retirement from pleasure, the apostle determines to profit little, is of no other real value in religion than as a ministerial cause of moral effects: as it recalls us from the world, gives a serious turn to our thoughts, and disposes us to an attentive revival of our conduct.

Pray God give us grace to improve every call and opportunity to these excellent purposes, by a wise employment of the present time to retrieve the errors of our past life, and lay up in store such good resolutions as may strengthen us against the evil day of temptation, and enable us so to pass the waves of this troublesome world, that we may finally come to the land of everlasting life, where our labours and our tears shall cease, and sin and sorrow shall be no more.

SERMON LXIII.

By Dr. ROGERS.

The Scripture Doctrine of Regeneration, or a New Creature, explained.

2 Cor. v. 17, former part.

If any man be in Christ, he is a new Creature.

ALL the privileges of the gospel relating to our present state, are comprehended in the promise of the Holy Spirit, who regenerates and sanctifies all the elect people of God. The effects of this promise every good man feels and experiences in the comforts, assistances, and direction he receives from him: neither will any true Christian deny that it is he who works in us both to will and to do; that without him we cannot so much as think a good thought; that it is he who enlightens our understandings, corrects our vills, and enables us to subdue our affections to the law of God. By these effects and operations of the Holy Spirit, the man is so much altered from what he was in his corrupt state, that he is said in my text to be a new creature: and in other places to be regenerated, born anew, to have killed or crucified the old man, and to have a new man raised up in him. From which expressions some have conceived and taught, that in this work of the Holy Spirit, on every sincere convert of the gospel, there is something literally killed and destroyed in him, and an act of real new creation exerted by God; a new being produced by his almighty power, and raised up in him. Now this notion might be let alone and despised as a piece of harmless unintelligible enthusiasm, if no evil consequence to the faith or practice of Christians had followed from it. But when it is farther inferred, that man in the work of his conversion, in receiving or obeying the gospel, is merely passive, contributes no more, and can contribute no more, than he did to his natural birth or preceding creation, or than he shall do to his resurrection from the dead at the last day; the obvious and natural consequence hence is, that it is to no purpose for any man to labour and apply himself to the works of conversion, to convince his faith by attending to the evidences of the gospel, or to regulate his affections and actions by the laws of it. He has nothing to do but to sit still, and wait till this almighty creating Spirit comes, and irresistibly infuses this new principle into him. A doctrine which so manifestly tends to discourage the endeavours of men, to introduce a lazy inactivity and neglect of the ordinary means of grace, and even to quench the Spirit; and suggests such an excuse for all sin and infidelity, if it be false, as it certainly is, cannot but require our utmost zeal in opposing and refuting it. I shall therefore endeavour,

I. To shew that this doctrine cannot be the proper exposition of my text, nor of any other scripture whose authority may be pretended for it.

II. I shall offer and assert what I think the true meaning of this and the like expressions.

III. I shall observe what sentiments and duties this scripture, in its true import, ought to suggest to us. And,

I. I am to shew that this doctrine cannot be the proper exposition of my text, nor of any other scripture whose authority may be pretended for it.

The Scriptures being acknowledged to be the word of God, and therefore infallibly true in every part of them, we are assured,

1. That no proposition contradicting any evident truth, natural or moral, can be the intended sense of them. For we rationally may and ought rather to reject any pretensions to a divine revelation, however supported, than believe that God can affirm to us an evident falsehood.

2. That where two propositions contradict one another, one of them must be false, and consequently cannot be affirmed by God: when, therefore, a sense of scripture is given which contradicts another scripture, one of the places must be misunderstood. And, as a corollary, hence I add,

3. That where the expression in one such place is plain, and the sense affixed to it agreeable to the proper force of the words, and no negative objection requires us to depart from it; and the expression in the other is figurative or allusive, and the doctrine deduced from it liable to great objections, it is reasonable in this latter place to restrain the extent of the figure and allusion to a consistency with the plain affirmations of the former.

Let us then apply these rules to the scripture in question before us: I say then,

First, that the exposition which I reject offers us a doctrine irreconcilable to those attributes which the natural idea of God implies, viz. that man is purely passive in the work of his conversion to God, contributes nothing to it by any endeavours of his own, but only submits to an irresistible act of God. Some of the first attributes which occur to us in the divine idea, are perfect justice, and perfect goodness: whatsoever doctrine represents God as unjust or unmerciful, cannot be from God, because it contradicts a manifest truth, and indeed subverts the very foundation of religion. And for the same reason we cannot admit such a doctrine to be the intended sense of any book, or words, which we acknowledge to be a divine revelation. Now if man is purely passive in his conversion and regeneration; if, as this doctrine supposes, no man can be converted but by such a new creation, such an overpowering work of the Spirit as no man can resist, then all men are equally capable of being converted; for there can be no difference in the subject, where the application is almighty and irresistible, as in creation; and consequently, according to this doctrine, it must be resolved wholly into the absolute irrespective will of God, that some to whom the means of conversion are offered, are converted and saved, and others perish in unconversion. But how can this be reconciled to divine justice? Can it be just in God to condemn a man for not being converted, when it was impossible for him to be so? for not being new-created, when he alone could new-create him, and would not? Much less can this doctrine consist with the perfect mercy and goodness of the divine nature. Can goodness, perfect goodness, condemn his creatures to eternal misery, for not complying with conditions which he knows it impossible for them to comply with? Surely we can hardly draw a more consummate image of cruelty than this doctrine ascribes to God, which represents him as calling to these poor devoted helpless creatures, pretending the greatest concern and compassion for them, offering them terms, and prescribing means of attaining eternal happiness, though he knows at the same time that it is impossible for them to comply with those terms, or use those means, without such an irresistible operation of his Spirit as he resolves to withhold from them. This is representing God not only as unjust and cruel, but as solemnly sporting himself with the misery of his creatures. If this doctrine gives us the true and proper sense of these scriptures, this is the image in which God must appear to us, an image repugnant to the natural idea of the Deity; and therefore we may with assurance conclude that this cannot be the meaning of them. But,

Secondly, This doctrine is also manifestly inconsistent with the plain declarations of God in other scriptures, and therefore cannot be admitted to be the sense of these. He frequently professes that he has no pleasure in the death of him that dies, and that he would have all men to be saved. He calls upon the sinners to turn themselves and live. He tells us that he has set before us life and death, and referred it to our own election, which we will chuse. He prescribes laws and ordinances, and pronounces, This do, and thou shalt live. And wherever we find our own abilities too weak for the performance, he assures us of the assistance of his Holy Spirit. Ask and you shall receive, seek and you shall find, knock and it shall be opened unto you. Is God sincere in all these declarations? Or is he only mocking the weakness of his creatures? This must be his character, if we believe that at the same time he knows it is, and resolves it should be, impossible for those he thus addresses, to comply with the overtures he makes to them. Shall we thus conceive of a wise, a just, and a good God? Shall we ascribe to him the levity of forgetting himself, and at other times teaching us a doctrine contradictory to all these gracious professions? God forbid! yea, let God be true, and every man a liar. When we hear him in express terms affirming, that every man shall be judged according to his own works (John, v. 29. Rev. xx. 13.), and receive according to his deeds, can we doubt but there is a sense in which the works of every man, good as well as bad, are properly his own? When our blessed Lord asks (Luke xii. 57.) Why do ye not of yourselves judge that which is right? does not the question necessarily imply, that we have in ourselves a power of judging what is right? Nay, does not every precept, exhortation, or command of scripture, suppose these faculties in us? To what purpose, for instance, did our Lord preach and offer the motives of conversion to those who heard him, if they had no power to discern their force, or comply with them? God is able, indeed, out of stones to raise up children unto Abraham. But would infinite wisdom use arguments and rational persuasions to these stones? would he encourage their faith by promises of reward, and threaten their infidelity with his severest resentments? Would he thus address beings which were perfectly passive, and could be nothing else but what he by an Almighty irresistible act must make them? And what is yet more unaccountable, would he complain of their resisting his omnipotence, and lament over their infidelity, in those expressions of regret and disappointment; How often would I have gathered thee under my wings, and thou wouldst not? Matt. xxiii. 37. Nothing is more evident than the force and import of these scriptures, and nothing more contrary to the conclusions I am opposing. Either therefore these scriptures, and those whose authority is pretended for these conclusions, contradict one another, which cannot be supposed of a divine revelation; or else we must find a sense in which they are reconcilable, which can only be done by assigning some other exposition to one of them. And when the doctrine affirmed by one, is the plain and necessary import of the words, a doctrine without any objection from reason, agreeable to the natural sentiments and perceptions of every one's own mind; and the expression in the other manifestly figurative, the doctrine raised from them shocking to reason, repugnant to the idea of God, and in its consequences subversive of all religion; in which is it most reasonable to suspect the mistake? Surely in the exposition of the latter. And if the expressions in these figurative places are capable of any sense free from these absurdities, it ought without any hesitation to be admitted: such a sense I am to endeavour,

II. To propose and assert.

That the expressions of being born again (John, iii. 3. 1 Pet. i. 23.) having a new man raised up in us (Eph. iv. 24. Col. iii. 10.), and in my text, of being a new creature, are figurative, I have affirmed, and think it cannot be disputed; for that is a figurative expression, where the words are used in a different sense from what they signify in their first and ordinary intension. Now it is plain that he who is converted from a state of sin and death by the preaching or application of the gospel, is not born again, raised from the dead, or created anew, in the first and ordinary sense of those words; they must therefore be understood only in a sense of resemblance and analogy.

If it be said, that the new creation here asserted, is of a principle, a new spirit which is infused into and actuates the man, I observe,

1. That the expressions will not bear this construction: for it is said that the man, the same man, is born again, is a new creature, &c. The man therefore is the subject of whom this new creation, whatever it means, is affirmed. Now it is evident that the converted man is personally the same he was before, and is neither born nor created anew in a proper literal sense. I would ask,

2. What is this spirit, this principle which is supposed to be created? All the effects which this principle is said to produce, are in scripture ascribed to the Holy Ghost: it is he who guides, sanctifies, and comforts the elect, and works in them both to will and to do, according to the good pleasure of God. Phil. ii. 13. And the human nature is certainly a subject very susceptible of these operations.

Since this new creation and all the effects of it are in scripture ascribed to the Holy Ghost, and it is plainly affirmed that it is the man who is the new creature; and it is evident to common sense that the man is not in a literal propriety new created, the expression is manifestly figurative; and the natural and obvious sense that arises to us from it is, that by the influence of the Holy Ghost, a great moral alteration is produced in him. And what we are to understand by them, is plainly this, that the fall of Adam having derived on human nature an universal corruption of all our faculties, on the understanding a darkness and indisposition to acknowledge spiritual truths, on the will and affections a violent bent and propensity to evil; our blessed Lord, who was manifested in the flesh to destroy or undo this work of the devil on our nature, has promised to all who with a sincere faith embrace his gospel, and are partakers of the seals of that holy covenant, that he will by the powerful assistances, of his Holy Spirit raise them up to a capacity of discerning his saving truth, enable them to mortify every corrupt affection, and to attain such measures of holiness and virtue, as he will accept and reward. Now the change is so great, in this restoration of the man from a state of spiritual darkness to a capacity of perceiving divine truth, from a life of sense and passion to the love of holiness and purity, and a submission of all his appetites to the will of God, that the most exalted figures of speech have been chosen by the Holy Ghost to represent it to our conceptions and gratitude: it is like a new creation, a second birth, a being raised again from the dead. And agreeably it has hence ordinarily obtained in common language; when a man is reformed from a course of vice and irreligion, to a life of virtue and piety, to say he is become a new man, or a new creature. From these sublime images we truly collect the greatness of the work wrought in us, and the necessity of the divine concurrence to the production of it: we could no more effect this change by our own unassisted activity, than we could create ourselves, or rise again to life after we were dead.

But the analogy in these, as in other figurative expressions, will not hold in all circumstances, and may be carried too far in application. Thus in the present case, when from these similitudes it is inferred that man, in the work of his regeneration or conversion, is as purely passive as he is in the instances alluded to, the resemblance is manifestly overstrained, and carries to a doctrine which (as I have observed) can neither be reconciled to reason, sense, or the plain declarations of other scriptures. We acknowledge it then to be implied in these expressions, that in the regeneration or conversion of a man, the greatest moral change is wrought in him; that the influences of the Holy Spirit are a cause, without which this change could not be effected, and therefore it ought principally to be ascribed to him. It is he points out to him the way of life, enlivens his affections towards it, strengthens his weaknesses, restores his losses, and enables him to walk and persevere in it. Take away this assistance, and he relapses into a state of darkness and corruption. But then we say that he co-operates with grace, and by the strength he receives from this assistance, is enabled to will and to do according to God's good pleasure.

The manner, indeed, the special acts and impressions by which the divine Spirit introduces this change, and how far human liberty co-operates with it, are subjects beyond our reach and comprehension, and not discovered to us by revelation. Our Lord compares this work of the Spirit to the wind: we hear the sound thereof, and perceive its effects, and are equally assured they proceed from it, whether we can explain the physical process of the operation or not. In like manner, the change wrought in a man by conversion is manifest and certain, and revelation assures us it is wrought by the Spirit of God; but how, we cannot tell. We acknowledge the effect, though we cannot explain the operation of the cause. At the same time we are assured (as I have said) by sense, by reason, by the attributes of God, and by the whole tenor of scripture, that it is not by an irresistible operation; that we are not merely passive in this work of grace; that God addresses us as rational creatures, and requires a voluntary application of our faculties to his service.

The original powers of our nature still remain with us, though grievously weakened and impaired by the fall. A thirst after truth, and a desire of good, are principles which still act with a great and universal force. The understanding, indeed, is dim, and cannot by its natural light discover spiritual truths; and the corruption of our will and affections renders them tasteless and insipid to us. The defect of light God supplies by a distinct proposal of these truths in the gospel: his grace strengthens our faculties to a capacity of discerning them, and removes the defect of inclination by taking off our natural deadness and disaffection towards them. The proposal of these truths is wholly from God; and we conclude from his goodness, and justice, and his veracity in the professions of his word, that all to whom they are proposed are by his grace sufficiently moved to attend and assent to them: sufficiently, I say, but not irresistibly; for if all were irresistibly moved, all would embrace them; and if none were sufficiently moved, none would embrace them; and if they only could embrace them who are irresistibly moved, then they who are not so moved, could be guilty of no crime in rejecting them. But when God has by a sufficient measure of grace supplied the natural corruption of our faculties, he then leaves us to act freely in embracing or rejecting the truths he proposes to us.

So likewise God in the gospel points out to us our proper good, and directs to the means by which we may attain it. He sets before us life and death, and represents to us the motives which ought to engage us to make a wise choice, and assists us with a measure of grace sufficient to overbalance the corrupt propensity of the will and affections to evil: but then he leaves us to choose with the liberty of reasonable beings; they who comply with his grace, comply with it freely; and they who reject it, do also freely reject it.

Thus, then, I understand the new creation asserted in my text. God by his grace supplies those inabilities and aversions from spiritual truth and spiritual good, which our faculties had contracted by the fall: this is a great change, a great restoration of our nature: neither can any expressions give us too high conceptions of the power, mercy, and goodness of our Creator and Redeemer in effecting this for us. But then this implies no new creation, no production of any faculties in us, but only a restoration of the decays, a removal of obstructions from those with which we were created. Thus restored by the grace of God through Christ, he leaves us to act freely, without any irresistible force upon our wills: he proposes to us our duty, with the strongest inducements to comply with it, that can be offered to reasonable nature; and if we miscarry under these advantages, the fault is wholly in ourselves.

As the exposition I have given of this scripture, makes a full acknowledgment of the power of God, and the necessity of his concurrence to our regeneration and conversion; so it is agreeable to the attributes of the divine nature, to the necessary import of other scriptures, and to the clear and evident perceptions of every man, who observes what passes in his own mind, and therefore it may safely be admitted by us. And since the sense I oppose is attended with such gross irreconcilable absurdities, I presume I need not offer any thing farther in support of one, or in disproof of the other. I proceed then,

III. To observe what sentiments and duties this scripture in its true import ought to suggest to us.

The first sentiment that arises hence is, a conviction of the deplorable state of nature to which sin had reduced us; a weak, ignorant creature, alien from God and goodness, and a prey to the great destroyer. In man naturally dwelleth no good thing, but the imaginations of his heart are only evil continually. But then we are ~~here~~ taught, and with humble gratitude are bound to acknowledge, whence our strength and our redemption come: that it is God, who by his grace purchased for us by Christ, and communicated to us by his Spirit, lightens our darkness, out of weakness makes ^{us} strong, able to contend with those enemies who war against the soul, and subdue the reluctances of our own corruption. Let him therefore who glories, glory in the Lord. To him let us ascribe the merit and praise of all our services; and with humble supplication entreat this necessary assistance, that, by his renewing, preventing, and supporting grace, he would lead us from strength to strength, till we come unto the perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of fulness in Christ. But then it is to be remembered,

Secondly, That thus renewed, thus assisted, God demands a voluntary service from us: without this inspired strength, indeed, we could do nothing, but by it we are raised to a capacity of turning to God, and performing such an obedience as he requires. We are restored to the liberty of reasonable beings, and may either quench the Spirit, resist his grace, and harden our hearts against his impressions; or we may attend to his holy motions, follow the trace of light he opens to us, and pursue the paths of duty and happiness to which he invites us. Our ability is from God, but the neglect of improving that ability to its proper ends is from ourselves, and the fatal consequences that will attend that neglect, the result of our own choice. God has done all for us that the tenderest father could do for his children, the most indulgent creator for the work of his hands. Through the mediation of Christ he pardons our original apostacy, supplies by grace the defects of our corruption, and puts it in our power to choose and obtain eternal salvation: more than this neither will infinite goodness require, nor infinite justice permit to be done for us. It is our part and duty to co-operate with this grace, vigorously to exert those powers, and act up to those advantages to which it restores us. He has given eyes to the blind, and feet to the lame: he shews us the way of life, and persuades and encourages us to walk in it, and promises to accompany us through all the stages of our passage, with supports equal to the difficulties that may attend us. If we are not wanting to ourselves, if we diligently use and improve the abilities he has given us, and is ready at all times to afford us, it is in our power to run the race that is set before us, and so to run as to obtain. But if we will sit down sullen and inactive, in expectation that God should do all, and irresistibly carry us to our journey's end, we shall find ourselves miserably deceived in the event. Grace is not intended to excuse our labour, but to qualify us for it, and consequently to oblige us to it. And agreeably the apostle observes to the Philippians, that God's working in them both to will and to do (Phil. ii. 13.), was so far from excusing their own applications, or encouraging them to presume on their security, that he assigns it as the very reason for which they ought to work out their own salvation with fear and trembling. His grace is a talent committed to us, and if we neglect to employ it in use and action, it will not only be taken from us, but the abused favour will be imputed, and increase our damnation.

Upon the whole, God has, through the mediation of Christ, and by the operation of his Spirit, made us, in a moral sense, new creatures; strengthened the infirmities, and repaired the ruins of our nature; opened to us the gate of life, and enabled us, if we strive, to enter in: a mercy to be acknowledged by us in the most devout returns of praise and adoration. But unless we strive, this grace will profit us nothing, this strength will be given us in vain, we shall not enter in. It is a presumption of equal danger to our happiness, to imagine we can do all, and to imagine we need do nothing for the attainment of it. The medium between these extremes is the true Christian doctrine. Of ourselves, as of ourselves, we could do nothing; but we can do all things through Christ strengthening us.

Let us then give continual thanks unto him for the love wherewith he hath loved us; praying always with all supplication, that being strengthened with all might according to his glorious power, we may work together with him, and make our calling and election sure.

Domestic Love and Union recommended and enforced.

PROVERBS, XV. 17.

Better is a dinner of herbs where love is, than a stalled ox, and hatred therewith.

IT is hard to form a true estimate of any man's happiness; because happiness depends most upon those things which lie most out of sight. Those joys, like those sorrows, are most real, deep, and strong, which run on in a silent stream without making any noise; such are the joys, which arise from easy reflections, moderate desires, and calm content.

We see the false glare of greatness, which surrounds some men, and are apt to gaze at it with a foolish face of wonder; but we see not those miseries, which sometimes lurk beneath these pompous appearances.

What avails all the pomp and parade of life, which appears abroad, if, when we shift the gaudy flattering scene, the man is unhappy, where happiness must begin, at home? Whatever ingredients of bliss Providence may have poured into his cup, domestic misfortunes will render the whole composition distasteful. Fortune and happiness are two very distinct ideas: however some, who have a false idea of life, and a wrongness of thinking, may confound them. For Better is a dinner of herbs where love is, than a stalled ox and hatred therewith. That is, it is better to have peace without plenty, than plenty without peace: that, where there is but a slender subsistence, yet an uninterrupted interchange of mutual endearments, among those of the same family, imparts a more solid satisfaction, than to fare sumptuously every day, or to live in great and pompous buildings, great and noble apartments, every thing great, but perhaps the owners themselves.

Those that are curious observers of mankind, love to consider them in the most familiar lights. When men are abroad they choose to appear (whatever they really are) to the best advantage: but at home, their minds as well as their persons are in a perfect undress and dishabille. The world is the great theatre on which they act a part; but behind the scenes, they may be seen in their proper persons without any studied appearances. Our domestic behaviour is therefore the main test of our virtue and good nature.

In public we may carry a fair outside; our love may be not without dissimulation, nor our hatred without disguise: but at home, nature left to itself shews its true and genuine face, with an unreserved openness; and all the soul stands forth to view, without any veil thrown over it. There we see men in all the little and minute circumstances of life; which however they may be overlooked by common observers, yet give a man of discernment a truer opening into a man's real character, than the more glaring and important transactions of it: because, as to these, they are more upon their guard; they act with more of caution and of art, than of plain simple nature. In short, our good will or ill breeding is chiefly seen abroad, our good or ill nature at home.

It were to be wished that we had more family-pieces preserved and transmitted down to us. The good public magistrate is an example of use to few only; but the prudent and affectionate father of a family is of a more general and extensive influence. For my part, I more admire Cornelius the centurion for that short sketch of his character in the Acts of the Apostles, viz. that he was a devout man, and one that feared God with all his house; than if he had been represented as the most victorious general, that had enlarged the bounds of the Roman empire: for we learn from it this useful lesson, that the influence of a pious example, like the precious ointment from Daron's head, descends downwards from the head of the family, diffuses itself over the main body, till it reaches the very skirts, the lowest members of it.

Our blessed Saviour had indeed no family to take care of; the whole world was his family, and all mankind, that heard and kept his sayings, were his mother, and brethren, and sisters. Yet some of his last thoughts were employed upon a subject, that will be sometimes rising uppermost in the minds of tender-hearted persons in their last moments, viz. "What will become of my poor defenceless relations? Who will keep them unspotted from the contagion, and preserve them unhurt from the injuries of this world, after I am departed out of it?" At the very instant that he expressed an unexampled love to mankind in general by dying for them; yet he exemplified a particular tenderness to his nearest relation. When Jesus saw his mother, and the disciple whom he loved, standing by, he saith unto his mother, Woman, behold thy son. Then saith he to the disciple, Behold thy mother (whom you are henceforth to treat and honour as your mother). And from that hour that disciple took her unto his own home.

The pains that he sustained, the generous concern that he felt for the world, could not swallow up all his regards of a more private nature. As a man, he felt the sensibility of a son, and the soft and tender workings of nature within him; as a great and a good man, he restrained them within proper bounds, nor suffered them, at that great crisis, to break out into any inordinate agitations of grief. He shewed us, that those affections which nature has implanted, may be innocently cherished, till we are about to pay the last debt to nature; and even then exert themselves, provided they do not wound the peace of the mind, and shock the soul in her last moments, when she should be as much as possible rid of all the incumbrances of this world, to take her journey, with more ease and freedom, to another.

These examples, as well as my text, point out the reasonableness and advantages of domestic love and union, which shall be the first head of my discourse.

II. I shall lay down some rules to prevent disunion.

First, then, I am to shew the reasonableness and advantages of domestic union.

Quietness under one's own roof, and quietness in our own conscience, are two substantial blessings, which whoever barters for shew and pomp, will find himself a loser by the exchange. Abroad, we must more or less find tribulation; yet, as long as our home is a secure and peaceful retreat from all the disappointments and cares which we meet with in that great scene of vexation the world, we may still be tolerably happy; but if that which should be our main sanctuary from uneasiness, becomes our principal disquietude, how great must our uneasiness be! There cannot be a greater curse, than to have those of one's own household one's greatest foes; when we neither can live happily with them, nor must think of living apart from them. It was wisely ordained by nature, that whereas, if our benevolence should be equally strong to all mankind alike, it would be lost in a multiplicity of objects, and distracted in its choice; therefore our benevolence should be the strongest, where there were the closest ties of relation. Our benevolence is like attraction, "which increases as the distances diminish; and then operates most powerfully, when bodies make the nearest approaches to one another." It is the voice of nature, which calls within us, and reason seconds that call, when all other circumstances are equal, to love our near relations better than our neighbours, and our neighbours than mere strangers.

We then counteract the design of nature, and consequently of the Author of nature, when we do not endeavour to contribute as much as in us lies to their ease and happiness, with which our own is often essentially interwoven. "Is it not strange," (says an ingenious writer,) "that some should be so delicate as not to bear a disagreeable picture in the house, and yet force every face they see about them, to wear a gloom of uneasiness and discontent?" Yet this is no uncommon character. Nay, there shall often be a certain shyness, coldness, and sullenness, in families, where there is no material ground of domestic animosities: and these differences shall be often the most lasting. For when anger or uneasiness immediately vents itself in words, the malignity of the passion is soon discharged; then it is most fatal and pernicious, when the wound rankles and festers within, when the mind preys upon itself, without disclosing the subject of its grievances.

The affronts, that are put upon us by strangers make but feeble and languid impressions in comparison: but those that proceed from persons endeared to us by the closest relation of blood and kindred, wound us in the most tender and sensible part. There are two things, that affect the heart of every ingenuous man most deeply, viz. good-natured and generous offices from those to whom we have been injurious; and an ill-natured and unchristian treatment from those to whom we have been very kind and affectionate. As for the former, we can make a shift to bear their hatred, because we have deserved it: but we cannot bear their love; it quite confounds and overpowers us. And, as to the latter, it is certain, we can endure the utmost rancour and malice of others, much better than the least coldness and indifference from those whom we have made it our constant endeavour to please. Very beautiful in this light are the words of the Psalmist: For it is not an open enemy that hath done me this dishonour; for then I could have borne it: neither was it mine adversary that did magnify himself against me; for then peradventure I would have hid myself from him. But it was even thou, my companion, my guide, and mine own familiar friend.

Love is a tender plant, it must be kept alive by great delicacy, it must be fenced from all inclement blasts; or it will soon droop its head and die. Indeed, in general we ought to be very tender (we can scarce be too much so) as to what may affect another. otherwise we do we know not what. For no man can tell, unless he could feel for him, how much another may suffer by any unkind thing we say or do. An angry word shall give a deeper wound to some minds, than an injurious action shall to others, who are of matter too hard to make any impression at all upon them: and perhaps most men feel more in the whole of their life, from the scornful reproofs of the wealthy, the spitefulness of the proud, taunting sarcasms, and little instances of ill-will, neglect, and contempt, than they do from the more solid evils of life. These are the little thorns and briars, which (though men of a rougher make may make their way through them without feeling much) extremely incommode persons of a more refined turn in their journey through life, and make their travelling irksome and unpleasant: though they do not distress them so much, as the deep waters, that threaten to swallow them up.

But the unkindly behaviour of bosom-friends and dearest relations gives the most exquisite sensations of distress; as, on the other hand, a grateful humane deportment from them gives the finest and most delicate touches of pleasure. Every trifling service, that is an evidence and expression of their love is received by us, as if it were a substantial obligation; and nothing can come from their hearts; but what proportionably affects ours.

To see a well-regulated family acting as if they were one body informed by one soul, where if one member suffers, all the members suffer with it; to see those who are embarked together in one bottom, whose interests are inseparably united, and therefore whose hearts can't but be so too, dearer to us than any other particular objects in this world, and only not dear as the good of the world in and our own happiness in the next; acting in concert, adopting each other's cares and making them their own, uniting their friendly beams, and jointly promoting the common happiness: is a beautiful scene, and amiable even in the sight of that Being, who maketh men to be of one mind in a house. How joyful a thing it is for brethren to dwell together in unity! To have those who will receive us with an open-hearted cheerfulness, to whom we can discharge the fulness of the soul, to whom we can unburthen our cares; and by unburthening we lessen them (for sorrow, like a stream, grows weaker by being divided into several channels): to have those with whom we can share our joys (and joy like light by communicating grows greater, and burns brighter); this, this is a happiness, which a forlorn individual must be in a great measure a stranger to, who stands single in life, without any support to lean upon.

But the greatest advantage of a friendly behaviour to domestics is, that thereby we contract and cultivate that habit of benevolence, which is a necessary qualification for everlasting happiness. We are apt to overlook and disregard our daily behaviour to one another in company, and the common occurrences of life, as little and trivial: whereas, though they are little in themselves, they are not so in their consequences: they are the very foundation upon which we must build an habit of benevolence. For an habit of benevolence must be contracted and kept alive, as all other habits are, by constant exercise. Now, our daily behaviour to our domestics gives us an occasion for an uninterrupted exercise of benevolence; and scarce any thing else does so. It is not then enough to say, or think, we will serve our friends and relations upon any material occasions; but, as for a constant complacency and obligingness in our common behaviour, to imagine we may be dispensed with from observing it. For these acts of solid and substantial kindness we are seldom empowered to do; they are extraordinary emergencies, which do not constantly occur; and a settled bent of good-will must be acquired, not by what is occasional, not by what seldom occurs, but by repeated and numerous acts, by a daily and uninterrupted discharge of the common offices of humanity; by saying a thousand obliging things, and by doing, if possible, more obliging things than we say. It is not in every body's power, because he has not a fortune answerable to it, to form a standing habit of charity by redressing the injured, relieving the distressed, and cherishing men of merit; but it is in every body's power to beget in himself this lovely disposition of mind, by studying to adjust his temper to theirs with whom he lives, by complying with their humours as far as he innocently can, by soothing their distresses, bearing with their infirmities, and by incommoding himself in some points to gratify others. On the contrary, the indulgence of an occasional fit of ill humour paves the way to an habitually bad temper. And to those who think it a small matter, Solon's answer is a very just one: "Yes, but custom is a great one." Did we seriously consider, that as often as we are exerting a spirit of needless contradiction, or venting an ill-natured wit to mortify those about us, we are cherishing a principle of ill-will, the very temper of the damned; it would, it is to be hoped, put some stop to this practice. But b

the misfortune lies : men are more ambitious to display the abilities of the head, than to cultivate the good qualities of the heart : though the latter are in every body's power ; the former few have any title to.

The habitual sweetness of our temper, or the habitual badness of it, does not then depend so much upon the great and surprising reverses of fortune, when the scene is suddenly shifted from prosperity to adversity, or from adversity to prosperity ; as upon our behaviour under little and minute accidents, which befall us every day.

It may be observed, that (generally speaking) men of a generous education have a more refined humanity, passions more softened and civilised, than those in very low life, where rudeness, ill-manners, and brutality too often prevail. Mankind in this respect (some think) resemble Nebuchadnezzar's image ; the head whereof was of fine ductile gold, but the lower parts of stubborn clay and inflexible iron. This observation does not always hold true ; there being often great humanity and good-nature among the common people, and great cruelty among those of higher rank. But, as far as there is any foundation for this remark, it consists in this, that the gentry are obliged by their character, as such, to shew affability and complaisance in their outward deportment ; and these outward acts by degrees enter into, and refine, their very temper and frame of mind ; and an obligingness in their whole behaviour, which is or ought to be their distinguishing characteristic, begets a corresponding sweetness of disposition within.

Be that as it will, did we often reflect, that to withhold from our domestics in the ordinary passages of life, and our daily intercourse with them, to withhold from them common civility, that debt, which we must be always owing, and always paying one another ; is to withhold from them, what they have as much a right to, as they have to any property whatever ; that every person, whether above us or below us, has as well-grounded a claim to good manners from the laws of reason and religion, as he has to his estate from the laws of the land ; and did we act agreeably to such reflections, our minds would be secured to humanity ; the virtues of patience, long-suffering, mutual-forgiveness, would be every day called into action, and ripen into habits ; till at last we arrived at a thorough good temper. From hence we may learn, how little reason any have to complain, that they have it not in their power to do good. Whereas, if we would act agreeably to those relations, some of which we must bear to those about us, viz. those of parents, children, married persons, superiors, equals, inferiors, friends ; there is not a day passes over our heads, but we might contribute something to lessen the uneasiness, or promote the happiness, of those with whom we have to do ; and by studying to promote their happiness, we mould ourselves into those habits, which are productive of our own, both here and hereafter.

SERMON LXV.

PROVERBS, xv. 17.

Better is a dinner of herbs where love is, than a stalled ox, and hatred therewith.

THAT is, a moderate subsistence, where love is among domestics, imparts a more unallayed satisfaction, than all the high and genteel enjoyments of life without that material ingredient of happiness. Sensual pleasures would be very flat and insipid, unless they were quickened by a mixture of social, friendly, and liberal pleasures, by the thoughts of imparting them to, and sharing them with, those whom we love and esteem. It is this that takes off or qualifies their grossness, and gives them their most enlivening charm. One can scarce believe, that a rational man can love himself, without loving somebody besides himself. For he could find nothing in himself worth loving, if he were of that unloving and unlovely temper. He would despise that little thing the heart, if it were entirely ingrossed by self, without a capacity to harbour any other guest, however deserving ; just as he would a poor narrow cottage which could barely accommodate its sorry owner, but wanted room to lodge and entertain a friend. He who feels within himself a dull indifference for all mankind, must, one would imagine, have a thorough disrelish of himself.

In a former discourse I thereforeshewed the reasonableness and great advantages of union, love, and a friendly behaviour among domestics. And in pursuance of this design,

I shall now proceed to suggest such considerations as may beget, preserve, and cultivate, such an union.

In the first place, do not delude yourself with any visionary notions of perfection. Consider men as they really are, with all their numerous imperfections; and not as you could fondly wish them to be. The philosophers have remarked what a joyless unsightly figure the material world would make, if it were divested of all its adventitious ornaments, of all its lights and colours, which are appearances only, and not the real properties of matter. I am apt to think the moral world would make as unlovely an appearance, if we could view it in a true light, stripped of all disguises, and men should appear naked and unveiled, just what they are, with all their imperfections, all their little sinister views, and their follies which they industriously cast in shades, exposed to public view. But God, who knows whereof we are made, and has ordered all things for the best, has wisely ordained, that our minds should not be transparent, nor our thoughts visible to one another, till we arrive at that place, where we shall have no paltry thoughts, no vain and senseless follies, nothing that need poorly skulk, and shun the light. The generality of men are like the generality of books, which we may often be obliged to have recourse to, and consult, upon particular occasions, but will not bear several views and reviews, and to be scanned over minutely by a critical eye: there are few men, as there are few books, whom the more we look into, the more we shall admire; the more we study them, the more graces and beauties, which escaped us before, we shall discover in them. Even those whom nature has shewn to the world as patterns of what it could produce, have yet some certain failures that reduce them, in some things, to the common level. If they have several excellencies to shew they are great men, they have several defects to shew they are but men. It is vain to imagine, we may meet with a person that shall please us in every thing: but this we may do, we may find out something that will please us in every person. A man is not fit to live in the world, who does not see several things, without seeming to see them; who does not see through the little by-ends and selfish views which men may have; against which he must use all the reality of caution and distrust, with as little appearances of it as possible.

There are not many who can stand the test of a close inspection. Their virtues shine upon us at a distance: it is upon a nearer approach that we descry their failings. The distant ground, which is adorned with variety of flowers, seems to be all in flower, and to glow with one continued and unmixed lustre; but if we were upon the spot, we should discover several weeds interspersed amidst such a beautiful assemblage of colours. We may admire upon a slender acquaintance the saint, philosopher, and hero: it is upon a closer survey we always discover some tincture of the mere man to sully the brightness of these exalted characters. And familiarity, though it does not beget contempt, where there is true worth, yet always takes off admiration: admiration and wonder, always the property of raw unfurnished minds, unacquainted with, and unpractised in the world. Those who look into, and see through things, find nothing wonderful, but One; and that is he, who is great, wonderful, and holy: nothing is truly marvellous, but what he is, and what he doth. Nay the follies of men are often so strongly interwoven with their virtues, that we cannot gather up the tares, without rooting up at the same time the wheat.

Let us therefore, in the second place, learn to make proper allowances, and to represent their failings with all the softening of humanity. Those that are continually complaining that things run cross, that the world is much worse than it should be, have very great reason to complain, that there is one individual person in it much worse than he should be; who cannot bear the accidents of life with tolerable patience, nor look upon mankind with common charity. Men are uneasy in themselves, and then shift the blame off from themselves upon the persons they converse with, and the times and places they live in.

Other men's follies and vices are always insupportable to those that are entirely devoted to their own. The fuller of imperfections any man is, the less able he is to bear with the imperfections of his fellow-creatures. True, regular, solid virtue, is not easily provoked; but when provoked, easy to be intreated, knows how to connive at little follies, and to pardon even considerable errors: whereas, false virtue is peevish, exceptionous, magisterial, hating to be put out of its own way; disconcerted with trifles, and unhinged by solid misfortunes.

Bear then with the faults of those about you, as you expect they should bear with yours; faults, which frail nature cannot well guard against, and which therefore good-nature should overlook; be just to their merits, charitable to their failings, and tender to their misfortunes. All other ornaments fade and decay, and sorrow or age makes beauty consume away like as it were a moth fretting a garment: there is one only unfading beauty, one undecaying ornament, which is infinitely more worthy than all the rest, and that is the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit.

Which brings me to observe, thirdly,

There is a particular tenderness due to persons under any recent affliction, not only that we may not seem to vex them, whom God hath wounded, and persecute them, whom he hath afflicted; but because men are more susceptible of resentment, in proportion to the greatness of their distress. Men of a mind involved in melancholy, like objects of a dark and black colour, are more apt to take fire, than any other. Their distempered souls take umbrage sometimes, where none is given. All this we must bear with, and place to the account, not of their natural temper, but of their adversity, which imbitters their spirit, and discolours every object. Handle then gently a wounded mind, as you would do a wounded body, with all the tenderness you can; it will not bear too rough a hand. Remember, that a good-natured man cannot give pain, without feeling, in some measure, the pain which he gives. Nay, he cannot even see a person in pain, though he does not give it, without feeling, in some degree, what he sees. As the ancients held those places sacred, that were blasted with lightning;

we ought to pay a tender regard to those persons who are visited with affliction; their persons are in some measure sacred, they claim a kind of reverence from us, and are to be privileged from any ludicrous or inhuman deportment. The very sight of them should strike us with a thoughtfulness on the changes of fortune in general, and in us the delicate feeling of their own case in particular, which we would wish for, if in the same disadvantageous circumstances. A general civility is a debt to all mankind: but an extraordinary humanity and a peculiar delicacy of good breeding is owing to the distressed, that we may not add to their affliction by any seeming neglect. The scripture, which is very particular in recommending every instance of fine humanity, gives us to understand how we are to behave to the unfortunate, in the words of Job, chap. xvi. 4, 5. I also could speak as you do: if your soul were in my soul's stead, I could heap up words against you, and shake mine head at you: but I, instead of doing this if you were afflicted as I am, would strengthen you with my mouth, and the moving of my lips should assuage your grief.

In the fourth place, Be sure to observe and practise the rules of good manners. By good manners I do not mean an insignificant punctuality, and a frivolous exactness in the observation of little ceremonies. I mean something of an higher nature, I mean an assemblage of moral virtues expressed in our outward demeanour; a combination of discretion, circumspection, and civility, submission to our superiors, condescension to our inferiors, and affability to all; more especially a strict regard to decency in all our actions. For the rules of decency are the very outworks of respect, and when they are once broke through, the rest will soon be delivered up as an easy prey; and affection is oftener lost by little violations of the rules of decorum, than by any scandalous and enormous faults. The queen of Sheba, it is observed, was so amazed at the great decorum of Solomon's table, at the order and economy of his servants, the attendance of his ministers and their apparel, and his cup-bearers, that there was no more spirit left in her.

If you have any talent for saying keen and satirical things, be superior to the talent you possess, by shewing how little stress you lay upon it, when it comes in competition with your good-nature. Have no recourse to low stratagems, at once to cover, and yet discharge your little spite; which some do after the following manner: To attack men in public, without any provocation, for gross and palpable vices, is what they care not to do; because their good-nature would be called in question, and their company shunned: there is a more artful way at once to gratify their ill-nature, and to avoid the odious imputation of it; which is, to dwell upon the indiscretions and unguarded follies of those they are conversant with, or to play upon subjects that require a very delicate hand to touch them so as to give the party concerned no pain.

And yet these are the subjects which leave the most lasting sting behind. For such is the nature of men, they had rather be thought vicious, than ridiculous. They can bear you should hate them for their vices: they cannot endure you should ridicule them for their follies. For you do not place in the most insignificant light him, whom you do not look upon as beneath your hatred: then you must exasperate a man, when you scorn and make a jest of him, as thinking him not of consequence enough to be hated.

The province of ridicule is very narrow. Vice is the object of our hatred; natural folly of our pity; acquired or affected folly is the only object of ridicule; when not content with what we really are, we are ambitious of being thought what we are not, or aspire at what we cannot be. We should be out of humour with ourselves, if we thought ourselves insignificant, and of no consequence: and can it be wondered at, that we are out of humour with others, when they give us to understand by their behaviour, that we appear such to them?

Fifthly, Never make any reply to a person, till his passion abates, and the ferment subsides. For to what end should you expostulate with a man in a passion? That he may hear reason? But how can you expect he can hear reason, as long as his passion has got the better of his reason? How can you expect he should hear the voice of that charmer, whom anger has made deaf to all its remonstrances? Wait but till reason resumes its empire; and then speak to him, in the softer seasons of address, if there be any necessity for it, if the affair be of such an importance as to require a fair hearing. Otherwise, it is a matter of discretion to drop it entirely, lest his passion should rekindle; for reason is often retained on the side of passion, and is set at work, in our cooler hours, to find out specious excuses for what we said or did in the heat and warmth of temper. And as you are not to reprimand any person during the emotion of his passion, so neither are you to do it during the emotion of your own. What the philosopher said about punishing, you may apply here, and say, "I will chide you, if I were not angry."

For you will be apt to carry things too far; or if you did not, yet what you say will have less weight, as it will be looked upon as the result of rage and fury, not the product of cool sedate reason.

Forearm yourself with this persuasion, and keep it present upon your mind: that whatever any occasional fit of the spleen suggests, is either wholly or in some measure wrong; that what is really bad, it seems doubly bad, and what is not bad, it represents so: that you no more see things as they are, in a settled melancholy gloom, than you do in a dazzling glare; that it is very hard and undistinguishable apt to discharge itself upon friend or foe indiscriminately. We then the least suspect ourselves or our cause to be wrong, when our passions are the warmest; and yet then we ought to suspect both the most. A probability, that we are in an error, arises in proportion to the violence of those passions which hinder us from discerning the truth. But an apprehension or distrust, that we are so, lessens in the same proportion. Nothing is more common, than to hear persons, who have very material things to say in their own behalf, injuring themselves and their cause by mixing trifles with them: the reason of which is, that, though they are trifles in themselves, and appear so to every indifferent person, yet the warmth of passion in the party concerned magnifies them into substantial injuries.

which cometh contention. Persons of sense and virtue will seldom differ about things that are plainly essential to the happiness of the family: the greatest danger is, that they should disagree about trifles, where each will think they cannot give up the point without yielding the other the superiority: and the disagreement is often the sharpest where the difference is the smallest. Do not imagine that every person must exactly adjust their temper to yours in every point, so as to be your exact counterpart. If men recede in some particulars from their own inclinations to comply with those of others, there is some prospect that differences may be adjusted, and a good understanding kept up; like irregular stones that must have their unevennesses filed off, and their rough corners smoothed, before they can come together, and join to make a compact building, where there shall be harmony and symmetry of parts. There is but one Being, whose will we ought to submit to entirely and unreservedly; and his will is perfect unallayed reason, without the least mixture of caprice or humour. Vain is all strife for superiority, where the only strife should be, which should oblige each other the most; and the only power that should be lodged in any person, should be a greater power of doing good. Never strive to gain an absolute sway over any thing, but your own passions.

Be not ashamed to confess you have been in the wrong. It is but owning what you need not be ashamed of; that you now have more sense than you had before, to see your error, more humility to acknowledge it, and more grace to correct it.

We double the greatest part of our faults, by the excuses which we make use of to justify them: excuses, which are a kind of patches, when a rent is made; far more unseemly and mi-becoming than the rent itself. It is a sign a man is generally in the right who has the ingenuity to own himself sometimes in the wrong; that he is one of those whose fund of reputation is so great, he is not afraid of impoverishing it, by taking or losing a little from it: whereas those whose stock of credit and esteem is very inconsiderable, care not to own any thing at the expence of it. Observe what sin most easily besets you, whether it be moroseness, pride, passion, covetousness, &c. and place there the strongest guard, where your nature is weakest. Few persons have more than one predominant great vice: nature has guarded them very well in other respects; here they must take care to guard themselves. Particularly guard against any inequality of temper: for no man can have a true sweetness of temper without steadiness and a sedate way of thinking: they that seem to have it, have only, as one observes, a certain easiness, that quickly turns peevish and sour. Yet, when our affections begin to fall off, and cool gradually and insensibly towards any person, we are apt to imagine his are abating towards us. Just as the land seems to voyagers in a ship to be retiring from them when they are retiring from the land.

Seventhly, Take care to distinguish between a person's general standing sentiments of you, when he is perfectly calm and undisturbed; and his occasional sentiments, when some cross accident may have soured his temper. Consider what he is for a constancy towards you; and not what he may be now and then, when his spirits are ruffled and over-heated. Unkindly thoughts of us, which vent themselves in unfriendly expressions, may be only occasional visitants, which tarry but an hour; whereas tender and endearing ideas may be the constant inhabitants of his mind. You must reflect, that there is no such thing as maintaining a friendly intercourse without overlooking things of this nature. He who thinks he has discharged every duty without any failure in point of kindness and friendliness to his domestics, has forgotten one duty respecting himself, that of self-examination. For the least reflection upon himself will serve to shew, that he has sometimes said things that had been better left unsaid; that he has been out of humour, when there was not a sufficient reason for his being so; and has gone too far when there was. A wise and a good man will therefore make proper allowances, and think, that, as a generous enemy may sometimes, through a flush of good humour, say an handsome thing in our behalf, and deviate into praise; so a firm friend, through a surprise of ill-humour, may let fall a disobliging expression. And whereas an hasty temper is immediately for proceeding to extremities, a prudent man goes more leisurely to work, and advises a friend; perhaps he has not said what has been reported; and if he have, that he speak it no more. And indeed, without such a procedure, all friendships would be precarious; they would lie at the mercy of those who were malicious enough to do us an ill office.

But above all, lastly, religion is absolutely necessary to preserved domestic union. For families are but little societies, as societies are larger families; and therefore religion, which is confessedly the best bond and cement of union in states and larger communities, is likewise so in little domestic governments: and family prayer is as much a duty in this smaller sphere of action, as public worship is a national concern. It is therefore incumbent upon those who preside over a family, to impress a sense of religion upon those who are beneath them: but to do that effectually they themselves must be first affected with a serious and hearty sense of it. Their domestics will every day be witnesses of their ill qualities, such as anger, impatience, &c. It were to be wished, therefore, that they would let their good qualities, if they have any, shine forth before them. It must be with very ill grace they can complain of the disobedience of servants to them, who let them see by their whole behaviour, that they are regardless of their great and common master, their Master which is in heaven. Why should they, whom much nobler motives have no influence upon, expect that the fear of offending them should restrain their dependents? People may complain of the badness of servants, the undutifulness of children, and the universal depravation of morals; but such complaints come better from any, than from those to whom that depravation is in a great measure owing by their carelessness and unguarded levity of temper, to say no worse; not having the prudence to keep their follies to themselves, but scattering the infection among their inferiors and attendants.

Be then seriously and solidly good yourself; and others, if they are susceptible of it, will learn goodness from you; and obey you more out of a principle of love than fear. Revere yourself, if you would have your inferiors revere you:—revere yourself—by exemplifying such a steady and regular practice of every branch of virtue, as will command their inward homage, the homage of the mind; and then outward marks of respect will follow of course without reluctance or constraint. Every one will reverence and acknowledge that worth, of which you seem insensible; and acknowledge and reverence it the more, because you seem insensible of it. We insensibly slide into the manners of those with whom we daily converse and constantly live; we catch the flame of virtue from them, by being always near to them. For goodness does not only communicate favours and kindnesses, it even in some measure communicates itself. Just as those who have been long among the most fragrant objects, not only are delighted with the odour that breathes from them; some of the very fragranciness cleaves to, and remains with them; they become fragrant themselves, by staying long among objects that are so.

Carry then their minds upwards from yourself, who are the head of a small family, to him, of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is called. Consider that the joint prayers of a family are as necessary to derive a blessing upon, or avert a calamity from, a family, as public prayers are to deprecate the judgments, or conciliate the favour of the Deity to a nation. So may he, who maketh me to be of one mind in an house, preserve you from all the miseries that must fall upon a family embroiled, and a house divided against itself!

Thus, when you have tinctured their minds and your own with religion, you will find that the union of souls was but begun here; it will be perfected above, where love and charity never fail. And death, which dissolves the union of soul and body, cannot dissolve the inviolable union of virtuous hearts joined together in pure unsullied friendship. Those who were lovely and loving in their lives, shall not be, even by their deaths, divided for ever. Separated for a while, they shall meet again, where there shall be no second separation, where they shall continue to be of one heart and of one mind.

SERMON LXVI.

'The Case of Diversions stated, and the Necessity of an early Application to Wisdom shewn.

[Preached before the University of Oxford,
March 2, 1739-40.]

PROVERBS, xviii. 1.

Through desire, a man having separated himself, seeketh and intermeddleth with wisdom.

DULL and insipid is every performance, where inclination bears no part; but a strong desire to do our duty overcomes the difficulties that lie in the way to the doing of it, and the very labour of love is a pleasure. The heart will set every engine at work, when it is thoroughly engaged on the side of knowledge. No social diversion, no pleasure, will interrupt its pursuits; because then it will be its greatest pleasure to seek and intermeddle with wisdom.

A total separation, however, from society, and the pleasures thereof, cannot be the meaning of my author, because that is contrary to the main tenor of the book of Proverbs; and, besides, it is obvious to observe, that any one man's sense, however excellent, unless it mixes in society with that of others, always degenerates into singularity and caprice.

In the following discourse I shall therefore,

I. Attempt to shew how far social diversions are allowable.

II. Point out the necessity of an early and close application to wisdom.

III. Subjoin some reflections connected with the subject.

I. Then, I am to shew how far social diversions are allowable.

In the first place, when there is no reason against any social (or indeed any other) pleasure, there is always a reason for it, viz. that it is a pleasure; just as when there is no reason to undergo any pain, there is one always, why we should not, viz. that it is a pain. To suppose the Deity would abridge us of any pleasure merely as such, when it does not interfere with higher and nobler delights, is a notion highly derogatory to his goodness, who, in forming the world, seems, in some things, to have consulted our pleasure only, without any other apparent end in view.

Secondly, Diversions are necessary to deceive the cares, sweeten the toils, and smooth the ruggedness of life. Man is a strange compound of greatness and littleness. There is something so great in our frame, that we cannot be happy without such substantial pleasures as will stand the test of our severest reflections; and yet withal something so little in our composition, that we cannot do altogether without such innocent amusements as may take our minds off from their abstractions, and gently lead them into the more familiar traces of thought. And he who applies himself to his studies, or any other employment, with proper intervals of refreshment to recruit his spirits, will upon the whole do more good, as he bids fairer to prolong his life; than he, who, by too eager and uninterrupted an application, deadens his spirits, impairs his health, and wears out the very springs of life.

Further, diversions are necessary under any affliction. For the first step towards a recovery of happiness, is to steal ourselves gradually from a sense of our misery; and this is to be done, not by putting or keeping our thinking faculty upon the stretch, but by lulling our unquiet and too active thoughts to rest. And, let men say what they will, those hours which are wasted away in indulging an idle sullenness, or a moping melancholy, are no less placed to our account, than those which fly away unperceived in unthinking mirth and gaiety. It is the same thing, as to all religious intents and purposes, whether our time is misspent in vanity, or in anguish and vexation of spirit.

Thirdly, Diversions are requisite to endear us to one another. For it is a mistake to think, that the solid and material services we do one another are the only cements of social love and union; because we seldom have it in our power to do them; and, besides, they are expensive to the giver, and often uneasy to the receiver, who would not, perhaps, be obliged for very liberal gifts, to any but him, who giveth liberally and upbraideth not. But to comply with men's tastes, as far as we innocently can, in the little incidents and daily occurrences of life, to bear a part in their favourite diversions, and to adjust our tempers to theirs; it is this that knits men's hearts to one another, and lays the foundation of friendships. On the contrary, the want of the little arts to render a man pleasing and agreeable, shall do him more disservice, than an hundred substantial and manly accomplishments can counterbalance or repair. And the reason is obvious. Few have perhaps understanding to discern, or candour to acknowledge, or generosity to reward, superior and solid merit: but the bulk of mankind can easily see, be affected with, and offended at, little singularities and incompliances in a man's behaviour, which lie exactly level to their capacities. It is an easy matter for a person of superior sense to soar above the common sphere. His chief difficulty is to let himself down to the common level, without which all his great knowledge will be, in some measure, useless. It is a sign of an undistinguishing judgment to imagine, that every thing that is small, is also trivial: that is trivial, which is of no consequence: whereas small matters may be the foundation of great ones, and by our behaviour in them, we form the mind to good habits, as I have shewn in a former sermon, or contract habitually bad dispositions.

But this puts me in mind, fourthly, That diversions are requisite to enlarge the usefulness and influence of a good character.

The man, who, though generally intent on great matters, yet can occasionally condescend to little things, without making himself little, singular in nothing but goodness, and uncomplying in nothing but vice; the man, who is in all things like unto us, sin only excepted, takes the most effectual method of making us like unto him in virtue. Whereas a person, who looks upon all pleasntry as criminal, whatever other duties he may practise, forgets one of the most material of all, that of gaining over others to the interests of virtue, by making it appear to be, what it really is, a lovely form. It is true, that, instead of paying, an implicit obedience to custom, and blindly following a multitude to do evil; it is our duty to be humble enough to follow a good example, where it is, and yet brave enough to set one to the world, where it is not. But singularity in matters of no moment discredits a man's virtues, and disqualifies him from being useful in affairs of consequence. It is natural for persons to imitate those whom they love: it would be therefore worth the while for the good to endear, by little compliances, their persons to the affections of mankind, that they might recommend their actions to their imitation.

Our blessed Saviour was so far from giving religion a gloomy appearance, that the first miracle which he wrought was at a scene of festivity, where he turned the water into wine. And he, who gave and exemplified the strictest rules of life, gave a sanction to the innocent comforts and refreshments of it. His life was indeed the very beauty of holiness, a faultless form, finished, regular, and exact; yet softened by an easy sweetness and humility; an unaffected grace, without any forbidding mien, gave a powerful and endearing charm to it. When he was asked, why his disciples fasted not? his answer shews, that he was far from putting, at first, hard and rigorous duties upon raw and tender minds; the obvious meaning of not putting new wine into old bottles; a rule, which, if it had been observed by some well-meaning reformers among us, might have prevented that religious despair and frenzy, of which we have seen some shocking instances among their followers. Religious severities are certainly necessary in some degree, and under proper regulations; but an excess of them, as we must have observed in some late examples, however it may have blunted the edge of the sensual appetite, has set a much keener edge on the spirits, and embittered the temper. If it has mortified the deeds of the flesh, and damped the inclination to animal pleasures, it has produced far more incurable vices, viz. spiritual pride, rancour, and an uncharitableness, equal, at least, to that of the Papists. The same temper, which, in a continued high enjoyment of life, would discharge itself in sudden eruptions of rage and fury, in too low and reduced a state of body, settles into a lasting peevishness, acrimony of spirit, and a splenetic disrelish of every thing in this world, which surely is not very consistent with an affectionate love to the Maker of it. A dissipation of thought may be sometimes as requisite for the overpensive and thoughtful, as a recollection of thought is for men of quite another turn. That retirement, that application to meditation and reading, which may be necessary to reduce the volatile and airy into a sober and composed way of thinking, might drive others of a melancholy cast of mind into despondency, or even despair; as the same diet, which would be very fit to reduce a pampered and over sanguine constitution, might be prejudicial to a thin, meagre, and consumptive person.

This caution, however, in general, is highly necessary; That we ought to guard most against that extreme to which human nature leans the most; which is, by no means, that of an over-strict application to wisdom. For we are rather apt to lessen, than enlarge, the bounds of our duty; and on the other hand to extend too far, than to shorten, the line of our liberty.

'If it be asked, when we exceed the bounds of reason in pursuing our diversions? I answer, If, after having made a party in some entertainments, the soul can recal her wandering thoughts, and fix them, with the same life and energy, as is natural to us in other cases, upon any subject worthy of a rational creature; it is plain we have not gone too far. Under these regulations, we may be gay without folly, and virtuous without moroseness. But, if they leave behind them a disrelish for, and an indisposition to better things, if the thoughts of what we have seen, heard, or done, intrude into our minds, quite dissipate our attention, and demand an audience of the soul; we have acted contrary to the end of diversions, which is to unbend, and not to enfeeble, the vigour of the soul.

It is farther to be considered, that though certain amusements, the little playthings of life, may not seem entirely foreign to a more youthful age; they certainly trifle away this life with a very ill grace, who stand just upon the verge of another: it shocks one almost as much as to see a man playing and dancing upon the brink of a precipice, from which he is every moment in imminent danger of falling:—that, though some men place their chief happiness in diversions, yet they are, in themselves, strong proofs of human misery: for, if we were happy in ourselves, there would be no occasion to divert our thoughts from ourselves. And which of the two is the most pitiable object; he who goes to other men's doors to beg his daily bread, or he who goes thither to beg his daily happiness, being too poor to furnish out his own entertainment? He, whose company is an insupportable burthen to himself, is very much obliged to the good-nature and easiness of his companions, that it is not an insupportable burthen to them too.

There is such a principle of activity in human nature (especially in youth), that there is no great danger we should fall into an habit of doing just nothing at all. The greatest hazard is, that we should contract an habit of doing nothing to the purpose, and of fooling away life in an impertinent course of diversions. An entire state of inaction is not to be dreaded; what we are to guard against is, that we do not fall into an easy insignificance of action, persevere in it, and then go out of the world with this melancholy reflection. That we have scarce done one action for which it was worth coming into it: our lives being like a tale that is told; a tale harmless, it may be, inoffensive, and far spun out, but very insipid, trifling, and unmeaning, containing no useful moral, or rational entertainment, scarce worth the minding, while the thread of it was carrying on, ending as poorly as it began, and forgotten almost as soon as over.

II. But this brings me to my second head, viz. the necessity of an early and close application to wisdom.

It is necessary to habituate our minds, in our younger years, to some employment, which may engage our thoughts, and fill the capacity of the soul at a riper age. For, however we may roam in youth, from folly to folly, too volatile for rest, too soft and effeminate for industry, ever ambitious to make a splendid figure, and to shine before men, but never endeavouring to glorify our Father which is in heaven; yet the time will come, when we shall outgrow the relish of childish amusements. And, if we are not provided with a taste for manly satisfactions to succeed in their room, we must of course become miserable at an age more difficult to be pleased. While men, however unthinking and unemployed, enjoy an inexhaustible flow of vigorous spirits, a constant succession of gay ideas, which flutter and sport in the brain, makes them pleased with themselves and with every frolic as trifling as themselves: but, when the ferment of their blood abates, and the freshness of their youth, like the morning dew, passes away, their spirits flag for want of entertainments more satisfactory in themselves, and more suited to a manly age. And the soul, from a sprightly impertinence, from quick sensations, and florid desires, subsides into a dead calm, and sinks into a flat stupidity. The fire of a glowing imagination (the property of youth) may make folly look pleasing, and lend a beauty to objects which have none inherent in them: just as the sun-beams may paint a cloud, and diversify it with beautiful stains of light, however dark, unsubstantial, and empty in itself. But nothing can shine with undiminished lustre, but religion and knowledge, which are essentially and intrinsically bright. Take it therefore for granted, which you will find by experience, that nothing can be long entertaining, but what is in some measure beneficial; because nothing else will bear a calm and sedate review.

You may be fancied for a while, upon the account of good-nature, the inseparable attendant upon a flush of sanguine health, and a fulness of youthful spirits; but you will find, in process of time, that, among the wise and good, useless good-nature is the object of pity, ill-nature of hatred; but nature, beautified and improved by an assemblage of moral and intellectual endowments, is the only object of a solid and lasting esteem.

There is not a greater inlet to misery and vices of all kinds, than the not knowing how to pass our vacant hours. For what remains to be done, when the first part of their lives, who are not brought up to any manual employment, is slipped away without an acquired relish for reading, or taste for other rational satisfactions? That they should pursue their pleasures. But, religion apart, common prudence will warn them to tie up the wheel, as they begin to go down the hill of life. Shall they then apply themselves to their studies? Alas! the seed-time of life is already past; the enterprising and spirited ardour of youth being over, without having been applied to those valuable purposes for which it was given, all ambition of excelling upon generous and laudable schemes quite stagnates. If they have not some poor expedient to deceive the time, or, to speak more properly, to deceive themselves, the length of a day will seem tedious to them, who perhaps have the unreasonableness to complain of the shortness of life in general. When the former part of our life has been nothing but vanity, the latter end of it can be nothing but vexation. In short, we must be miserable, without some employment to fix, or some amusement to dissipate, our thoughts: the latter we cannot command in all places, nor relish at all times; and therefore there is an absolute necessity for the former. We may pursue this or that new pleasure; we may be fond for a while of a new acquisition; but when the graces of novelty are worn off, and the briskness of our first desire is over, the transition is very quick and sudden, from an eager fondness to a cool indifference. Hence there is a restless agitation in our minds, still craving something new, still unsatisfied with it when possessed; till melancholy increases, as we advance in years, like shadows lengthened towards the close of day.

Hence it is, that men of this stamp are continually complaining, that the times are altered for the worse, because the sprightliness of their youth represented every thing in the most engaging light; and when men are in good humour with themselves, they are apt to be so with all around; the face of nature brightens up, and the sun shines with a more agreeable lustre: but when old age has cut them off from the enjoyment of false pleasures, and habitual vice has given them a distaste for the only true and lasting delights; when a retrospect of their past lives presents nothing to view but one wide tract of uncultivated ground; a soul distempered with spleen, remorse, and an insensibility of each rational satisfaction, darkens and dis-colours every object; and the change is not in the times, but in them, who have been forsaken by those gratifications which they would not forsake.

How much otherwise is it with those who have laid up an inexhaustible fund of knowledge? When a man has been laying out that time in the pursuit of some great and important truth, which others waste in a circle of gay follies, he is conscious of having acted up to the dignity of his nature; and from that consciousness there results that serene complacency, which, though not so violent, is much preferable to the pleasures of the animal life. He can travel on from strength to strength: for, in literature, as in war, each new conquest which he gains empowers him to push his conquests still farther, and to enlarge the empire of reason. Thus he is ever in a progressive state, still making new acquisitions, still animated with hopes of future discoveries.

Some may allege, in bar to what I have said, and as an excuse for their indolence, the want of proper talents to make any progress in learning. To which I answer, that few stations require uncommon abilities to discharge them well: for the ordinary offices of life, that share of apprehension which falls to the bulk of mankind, provided we improve it, will serve well enough. Bright and sparkling parts are like diamonds, which may adorn the proprietor, but are not necessary for the good of the world: whereas common sense is like current coin: we have every day, in the ordinary occurrences of life, occasion for it; and if we would but call it into action, it would carry us much greater lengths than we seem to be aware of. Men may extol, as much as they please, fine, exalted, and superior sense; yet common sense, if attended with humility and industry, is the best guide to beneficial truth, and the best preservative against any fatal errors in knowledge, and notorious misconducts in life. For none are, in the nature of the thing, more liable to error, than those who have a distaste for plain sober sense and dry reasoning; which yet is the case of those, whose warm and elevated imagination, whose uncommon fire and vivacity makes them in love with nothing but what is striking, marvellous, and dazzling. For great wits, like great beauties, look upon mere esteem as a flat insipid thing; nothing less than admiration will content them. To gain the good-will of mankind by being useful to them, is, in their opinion, a poor low grovelling aim; their ambition is to draw the eyes of the world upon them by dazzling and surprising them; a temper which draws them off from the love of truth, and consequently subjects them to gross mistakes. For they will not love truth as such, they will love it only when it happens to be surprising and uncommon, which few important truths are: the love of novelty will be the predominant passion; that of truth will only influence them when it does not interfere with it. Perhaps nothing sooner misleads men out of the road of truth, than to have the wild dancing light of a bright imagination playing before them. Perhaps they have too much life and spirit to have patience enough to go to the bottom of a subject, and trace up every argument, through a long tedious process, to its original. Perhaps they have that delicacy of make, which fits them for a swift and speedy race, but does not enable them to carry a great weight, or to go through any long journey. Whereas men of fewer ideas, who lay them in order, compare, and examine them, and go on, step by step, in a gradual chain of thinking, make up by industry and caution, what they want in quickness of apprehension. Be not discouraged, if you do not meet with success at first. Observe (for it lies within the compass of any man's observation), that he who has been long habituated to one kind of knowledge, is utterly at a loss in another to which he is unaccustomed, till, by repeated efforts, he finds a progressive opening of his faculties; and then he wonders how he could be so long in finding out a connection of ideas, which, to a practised understanding, is very obvious. But by neglecting to use your faculties, you will in time lose the very power of using them; according to that of our blessed Saviour, from him that hath not any additional improvement, shall be taken away even that which he hath, the original talent intrusted to him.

Others there are, who plead an exemption from study, because their fortune makes them independent of the world, and they need not be beholden to it for a maintenance. That is, because their situation in life exempts them from the necessity of spending their time in servile offices and hardships, therefore they may dispose of it just as they please: it is to imagine, because God has empowered them to single out the best means of employing their hours, viz. in reading, meditation, in the highest instances of piety and charity; therefore they may throw them away in a round of impertinency, vanity, and folly. The apostle's rule, that if any man will not work, neither should he eat, extends to the rich, as well as poor; only supposing, that there are different kinds of work assigned to each. The reason is the same in both cases, viz. that he who will do no good, ought not to receive or enjoy any. As we all are joint traders and partners in life, he forfeits his right to any share in the common stock of happiness, who does not endeavour to contribute his quota or allotted part to it; the public happiness being nothing, but the sum total of each individual's contribution to it. An easy fortune does not set men free from labour and industry in general; it only exempts them from some particular kinds of labour. It is not a blessing, as it gives them liberty to do nothing at all; but as it gives them liberty wisely to choose, and steadily to prosecute, the most ennobling exercises, and the most improving employments, the pursuit of truth, the practice of virtue, the service of that God, who giveth them all things richly to enjoy; in short, the doing and being every thing that is commendable, though nothing merely in order to be commended. That time, which others must employ in tilling the ground (which often deceives their expectation) with the sweat of their brow, they may lay out in cultivating the mind, a soil always grateful to the care of the tiller. The sum of what I would say is this: That, though you are not confined to any particular calling, yet you have a general one; which is to watch over your heart, and to improve your head; to make yourself master of all those accomplishments, viz. an enlarged compass of thought, that flowing humanity and generosity, which are necessary to become a great fortune; and all of those perfections, viz. moderation, humility, and temperance, which are necessary to bear a small one patiently; but especially it is your duty to acquire a taste for those pleasures, which, after they are tasted, go off agreeably, and leave behind them a grateful and delightful flavour on the mind.

Happy that man, who, unembarrassed by vulgar cares, master of himself, his time and fortune, spends his time in making himself wiser; and his fortune in making others (and therefore himself) happier: who, as the will and understanding are the two ennobling faculties of the soul, thinks himself not complete, till his understanding be beautified with the valuable furniture of knowledge, as well as his will enriched with every virtue: who has furnished himself with all the advantages to relish solitude, and enliven conversation; when serious, not sullen; and when cheerful, not indiscreetly gay; his ambition not to be admired for a false glare of greatness, but to be beloved for the gentle and sober lustre of his wisdom and goodness. The greatest minister of state has not more business to do in a public capacity, than he, and indeed every man else, may find in the retired and still scenes of life. Even in his private walks, every thing that is visible convinceth him, there is present a Being invisible. Aided by natural philosophy, he reads plain legible traces of the Divinity in every thing he meets; he sees the Deity in every tree, as well as Moses did in the burning bush, though not in so glaring a manner: and when he sees him, he adores him with the tribute of a grateful heart.

III. I shall now, as I proposed, draw towards a conclusion, by subjoining some reflections which have a connection with the subject.

First, Let us set a just value upon, and make a due use of those advantages, which we of this place enjoy, who are here separated from the busy, out a firm seek and intermeddle with a practice

One considerable advantage is, that regular method of study, too much neglected in other places, which obtains here. Nothing is more common elsewhere, than for persons to plunge at once into the very depth of science, far beyond their own, without having learned the first rudiments : nothing more common than for some to pass themselves upon the world for great scholars, by the help of universal dictionaries, abridgments, and indexes ; by which means they gain an useless smattering in every branch of literature, just enough to enable them to talk fluently, or rather impertinently, upon most subjects ; but not to think justly and deeply upon any ; like those who have a general superficial acquaintance with almost every body ; to cultivate an intimate and entire friendship with one or two worthy persons, would be of more service to them. The true genuine way to make a substantial scholar, is what takes place here, viz. to begin with those general principles of reasoning upon which all science depends, and which give a light to every part of literature ; to make gradual advances a slow, but sure process ; to travel gently, with proper guides to direct us, through the most beautiful and fruitful regions of knowledge in general, before we fix ourselves in, and confine ourselves to, any particular province of it : it being the great secret of education, not to make a man a complete master of any branch of science, but to give his mind that freedom, openness, and extent, which shall empower him to master it, or indeed any other, whenever he shall turn the bent of his studies that way ; which is best done, by setting before him, in his earlier years, a GENERAL view of the whole intellectual world ; whereas an early and entire attachment to one particular calling narrows the abilities of the mind to that degree, that he can scarce think out of that track to which he is accustomed.

The next advantage I shall mention is, a direction in the choice of authors, upon the most material subjects. For it is perhaps a great truth, that learning might be reduced to a much narrower if one were to read none but

authors, those who write chiefly from their own fund of sense, without treading servilely in the steps of others.

Here, too, a generous emulation quickens our endeavours, and the friend improves the scholar : the tediousness of the way to truth is insensibly beguiled by having fellow-travellers, who keep an even pace with us : each light dispenses a brighter flame, by mixing its social rays with those of others. Here we live sequestered from noise and hurry, far from the great scene of business, vanity, and idleness, our hours all our own. Here it is, as in the Athenian torch-race, where a series of men have successively transmitted from one to another the torch of knowledge ; and no sooner has one quitted it, but another equally able takes the lamp to dispense light to all within his sphere. But the greatest commendation of these seminaries is, that they have been constantly blackened by the enemies of religion and goodness. Those who have planted their batteries against the Christian religion, have always singled out the universities as the mark of their hostilities : which is virtually to confess, that they are the bulwarks of religion, and that they can never succeed in their audacious attempts, till they have brought them into discredit.

Others there may be, who censure them without just grounds. For it is a fault, to which men are very subject, to dislike what is confessedly good ; because their crude conceptions, never reduced to practice, may suggest something in their opinion better. But, in fact, where is there a better method of education to be found ? It is easy to form fine Utopian theories ; it is easy to govern and manage our own ideas, the world within ; for nothing is more pliant and obsequious, than our own ideas : but to govern the world without, far more stubborn and uncomplying than our ideas, and new model it to our schemes, this is the great difficulty. If they were to proceed from theory to fact, they would find several difficulties start up, which they were not aware of ; and that things upon experiment never fully answer the flattering notions which they may entertain in their imaginations.

Dismissing, therefore, these visionaries, let me proceed to tell you, that our hopes are placed upon you ; that, whatever clamours may have been raised against you by men, who weakly or wickedly could find the innocent with the guilty, by a judgment directly contrary to that of the last day (for that severs the one from the other) ; yet we look upon you for so considerable a part, as the most uncorrupt part of the nation, in principles at least ; and, I think, in morals too. And may you long continue so ! for the universities have been justly called the eyes of the nation ; and if the eyes of the nation be evil, the whole body of it must be full of darkness, ignorance, and vice.

May none of us, therefore, dally, complain, that the discipline of the place is too strict ; when all the world besides are complaining of the remissness of it. May we rather reflect, that there needs nothing else to make a man completely miserable, but to let him, in the most dangerous stage of life, carve out an happiness for himself, without any check upon the sallies of youth. Those to whom you have been over-indulgent, and perhaps could not have been otherwise, without proceeding to extremities, never to be used but in desperate cases ; those have been always the most liberal of their censures and invectives against you ; they put one in mind of Adonijah's rebellion against David his father : because his father had not displeased him at any time in saying, Why hast thou done so ? It is a certain sign men want restraints, when they are impatient under any ; too headstrong to be governed by authority, too weak to be conducted by reason.

It were to be wished, that they who claim greater indulgences would seriously reflect, that the glaring irregularities of two or three members bring an undistinguishing censure upon a whole body, make a noise in and alarm the world, as if all flesh here had corrupted their ways : whereas the sober modest worth of a much greater number, who here in private attend the duties of the wise and good, must, in the nature of the thing, escape the notice of the world. Notorious disorders, how few soever are concerned, strike upon the senses of some, and affect the passions of many more ; by which (their senses and passions) the gross of mankind generally judge of things : but it requires some experience of reflection, to which the bulk of mankind will never put themselves, to consider, that great numbers must have spent their time profitably, formed habits of just thinking here, and laid in that stock of knowledge which they have produced into view, in a more public sphere : that those vices which they complain of may not be the native growth of the place ; but imported from irregular and undisciplined families, from schools, and from the worst of schools, the world at large, where youth are entered into it too soon.

Lastly, consider that it is a sure indication of good sense to be diffident of it. We then, and not till then, are growing wise, when we begin to discern how weak and unwise we are. An absolute perfection of understanding is impossible : he makes the nearest approaches to it, who has the sense to discern, and the humility to acknowledge, its imperfections. Modesty always sits gracefully upon youth : it covers a multitude of faults, and doubles the lustre of every virtue which it seems to hide ; the perfections of men being like those flowers which appear more beautiful when their leaves are a little contracted and folded up, than when they are full blown, and display themselves, without any reserve, to the view.

We are, some of us, very fond of knowledge, and apt to value ourselves upon any proficiency in the sciences ; one science, however, there is worth more than all the rest, and that is the science of living well ; which shall remain, when, whether there be tongues, they shall cease ; whether there be knowledge, it shall vanish away. As to new notions, and new doctrines, of which this age is very fruitful, the time will come, when we shall have no pleasure in them ; nay, the time shall come, when they shall be exploded, and would have been forgotten, if they had not been preserved in those excellent books which contain a confutation of them ; like insects preserved for ages in amber, which otherwise would soon have returned to the common mass of things. But a firm belief of Christianity, and a practice suitable to it, will support and invigorate the mind to the last, and most of all at last, at that important hour, which must decide our hopes and apprehensions: and the wisdom, which, like our Saviour, cometh from above, will through his merits bring us thither. And indeed all our other studies and pursuits, however different, ought to be subservient to, and centre in this grand point, the pursuit of eternal happiness, by being good in ourselves, and useful to the world. Soon, very soon, the disputer of this world may be no more: of this world, says St. Paul; for disputes will have no place in another. But the meek and humble Christian, who chiefly desired to understand that he might direct his will, and to know that he might act rightly, is a character which will stand us in stead for ever—when pride and self-confidence shall be no more. For we shall no more know in part.

SERMON LXVII.

By JEREMIAH SEED, M. A.

On Evil-speaking.

Speak not evil one of another, brethren.

It is a melancholy consideration, that conversation runs very low; that if any topic of religion is started, it brings us under the odious imputation of cant and hypocrisy; if any topic of useful learning, it lays us open to the censure of pedantry and ill-breeding; that if the thread of conversation be very fine, it is often immediately and abruptly broken off; but if it be of a coarser and more homely contexture, it is generally more durable and lasting. Strange! that a set of creatures, distinguished by reason and religion from brutes, allied to angels, and capable of holding an intercourse with God, should rarely utter one religious sentiment worthy of a reasonable being; while several have recourse to oaths and imprecations, to fill up the mighty void of sense, and to supply the vacancy of their reason; making the sacred names of their Creator and Saviour, which ought to suggest the most awful and august ideas, to be in their discourse, what they themselves are too often in the world, idle insignificant expletives.

But what falls under my present consideration, is the reigning vice of evil-speaking. I shall therefore shew,

I. The extent of the precept in my text,

II. The causes of evil-speaking;

III. The unreasonableness of it.

I. Then, I am to shew the extent of the precept in my text.

In the first place, This precept does not extend so far as to hinder us from telling another man his faults, with a view to his amendment: we may speak evil of a man, with a design to do good to him. Thou shalt, in any wise, rebuke thy neighbour; thou shalt not suffer sin upon him. But we are guilty of a breach of our duty, when we give our advice in a supercilious magisterial manner, rather to shew our own authority and superiority in wisdom, than to benefit the party concerned. We must consult the gentlest manner and softest seasons of address; our advice must not fall, like a violent storm, bearing down and making that to droop which it was meant to cherish and refresh; it must descend, as the dew upon the tender herb, or like melting flakes of snow; the softer it falls, the longer it dwells upon, and the deeper it sinks into the mind. If there are few who have the humility to receive advice as they ought, it is often because there are as few who have the discretion to convey it in a proper vehicle, and to qualify the harshness and bitterness of reproof, against which corrupt nature is apt to revolt, 'y an artful mixture of sweetening and agreeable ingredients. To probe the wound to the bottom with all the boldness and resolution of a good spiritual surgeon, and yet with all the delicacy and tenderness of a friend, requires a very dexterous and masterly hand. An affable deportment, and a complacency of behaviour, will disarm the most obstinate; whereas if, instead of calmly pointing out their mistakes, we break out into unseemly sallies of passion, we cease to have any influence. So far then as men tell others of their faults with an intention to reform them,

Secondly, It is no crime to descant upon the faults of our neighbour, which are public and notorious. For where can be the harm for any man to talk of what every one knows?

Thirdly, Though nothing can justify ill-grounded uncharitable opinions, yet in cases where we have a sufficient information, a wide difference is to be made between what we say in a mixed company, and what we disclose to a particular friend, who is virtually under a covenant with us not to betray our private conversation; for we cannot forbear to communicate our whole soul, without any reserve, to him who is, as it were, a part of our soul. To be always upon our guard, is like being always in armour; it is cumbersome and uneasy; however we may wear it for our self-defence among enemies, or persons whom we do not know to be otherwise, yet among intimate friends one chooses to put it off, and to be free and disengaged.

Nor, fourthly, do we act contrary to the meaning of the text, when we are called upon by lawful authority to speak what we know against a criminal. For we are not obliged to bear no witness at all against our neighbour, we are only to bear no false witness. This rule extends to giving testimonials and characters of servants, or candidates for an employment. To give them no character at all, is to all intents and purposes the same as giving them a bad one; and to give them a good character upon the whole, when they do not deserve it, is to be easy and good-natured at the expence of truth and justice.

Fifthly, We are so far from acting against the precept of my text, that it is an act of charity, as well as justice, to strip the wolf of his sheep's clothing, which he has put on to make a prey of the innocent and unsuspecting. It is a matter of great consequence to the public, that the characters of wicked men sometimes should be universally known, as well as the characters of the virtuous. It is highly necessary those should be undeceived, who repose a confidence in one that may bear a fair character, but is no better than a villain. Accordingly our Saviour, who exemplified an universal good-will to mankind in all his actions, yet takes off the specious gilding from those hypocrites, who for a pretence made long prayers, that they might devour widows' houses. He removed the thin veil of hypocrisy, and discovered those mean designs which lurked beneath their pretensions to an uncommon sanctity. Where a man's vices only hurt himself, and terminate in his own person, there we have no right to publish them, because we can answer no good end thereby; but where they affect, or may affect, others, it is our duty to warn as many as we think proper, a due regard being had to our own safety. Only let us take this caution along with us; before we endeavour to undeceive others, let us be sure we are not deceived ourselves. That rule which a celebrated philosopher laid down for the conduct of the understanding in judging of the truth of things, is as necessary for our conduct in judging aright of the characters of men, viz. always to suspend our judgment, till we have got clear, distinct, and decisive evidence. Never proceed upon any slender surmises, and precarious conjectures, the workmanship of the brain. Proportion your assent to the clearness of the proofs upon which it is built.

The sum of all is this: We may speak ill of a man, after we have gained a competent knowledge, and formed a right judgment, of his character,—provided we think it necessary to detect him; either because the public good requires it, or lest any particular person, whose good we have at heart, should be infected by his company, or over-reached by his cunning; but where, as one expresseth it, there are no reasons of conscience to make a good man speak out, there are always reasons of prudence to make a wise man hold his tongue.

There is one remark, which falls under this head, that must not be omitted, viz. That we are obliged, by a principle of self-defence, to set a mark of infamy on those who have injuriously branded the reputation of their neighbours. For he who has injured one person either in his reputation or fortune, threatens every body.

And therefore common prudence will teach us to give such a man his just character, that he may not be able to make disadvantageous impressions upon the unwary and undesigning, by giving every man else a bad one.

If a man's vices are so flagrant, and his character so infamous, that there is no danger he should impose upon others; what are we to do in such a case? I do not say it is unlawful to speak evil of him; but the less we say of him, so much, I think, the better, unless it be our design to raise an indignation in ourselves or others against the like practices. To be often inveighing against his vices, however notorious, looks as if we took a complacency in dwelling on his faults. And it is not the property of charity, or of a charitable man, to rejoice in iniquity. Let the dead bury their dead: let those that are dead to all sentiments of virtue, delight to throw dirt upon men in the same state with themselves.

It may be asked, whether it be lawful to speak ill of the dead? and the answer is, that it either must be lawful in some cases, and under proper restrictions, or we must condemn all historians, (the sacred ones not excepted,) who have transmitted the faults as well as virtues of the dead to posterity. There is a tenderness due to the memories of those who are no longer in a capacity to speak for themselves; and therefore we ought to be very careful not to charge any crimes upon them, of which we have not strong authentic proofs, either from personal knowledge, or from persons of unsuspected veracity. Where there is even a faint probability, that the fact of which they are accused might be otherwise than it is represented, there we ought to be silent. But where the facts are so notorious, that they admit of no doubt, so flagrantly bad, that they need no aggravation, there we ought to consider, that there is a curse denounced upon the wicked, that their memories should rot: as there is a promise to the righteous, that they should be had in remembrance, and their memories be embalmed. It is wrong likewise to speak evil of the dead, for the sake of evil-speaking, without a view to the information of the living.

Lastly, Though it is our duty not to speak ill of any man, without some of the reasons which I have mentioned, yet it does not follow that we ought to speak well of every body promiscuously, and in general; because we ought to make a distinction where there is a difference, we ought to pay the tribute of praise where praise is due, otherwise we rob the good of that fame which is a debt to merit only, by putting all mankind upon a level. He who commends every one, in effect commends no one at all. An undistinguishing praise confounds the characters of men, as well as an undistinguishing censure: just as overmuch light has the same effect as overmuch darkness; we see nothing as it really is. By throwing an undistinguished glare of praise on every object, we perceive no object at all in its just and genuine light. There has been so much prostitution of applause, that scarce any commendation is valuable but what comes from those who can discommend with impunity, and commend without an expectation of a reward.

II. Having thus stated the extent of this duty, I proceed to point out the causes of evil-speaking.

To do justice to a great and good character, requires an uncommon judgment, delicacy, and discernment. But nothing is more easy than to turn any person, however deserving, into ridicule: it is only to exchange one idea, which furnishes no matter for ridicule, for another near akin to it which does; that of seriousness, for instance, and a composed behaviour, for that of a stiff formality and solemnity; and then the work is done. The vulgar may be easily made to mistake the one for the other; and when they have once viewed a valuable person in a ridiculous light, they are scarce capable ever after of considering him in any other; the ludicrous representation recurs to their memory, as often as the person thus misrepresented offers himself to view. Thus what is only the sport of a wanton fancy, may be worse than death to an innocent man.

But whatever pleasure men of this turn may take in ridicule, it is better to be innocently dull, than to have all the wit in the world, and yet, by the misapplication of it, to make one worthy man one's foe. One humane and generous sentiment is of more worth, than all the merely ludicrous and witty thoughts that ever were. For one humane sentiment towards our fellow-creatures touches the heart, and diffuses a sedate and lasting complacency there: but thoughts merely witty and ludicrous only please the fancy for a while, and raise a blaze of mirth as short-lived as the crackling of thorns, to which Solomon compares it. An ill-natured man may be a prodigy of parts, he may have an uncommon brightness, but then it is, like that of a summer's sun, an intolerable brightness; to shun its scorching beams we retreat to the shade, and had rather bury ourselves in retirement, than endure his conversation. That wit is truly amiable, which gladdens and enlivens every thing, which shines with a lustre, gentle, but not faint, and powerful, but not glaring.

He who endeavours to oblige the company by his good-nature, never fails of being beloved; he who strives to entertain it by his good sense, never fails of being esteemed; but he who is continually aiming to be witty, generally miscarries of his aim: his aim and intention are to be admired, but it is his misfortune either to be despised or detested; to be despised for want of judgment, or detested for want of humanity. For we seldom admire the wit when we dislike the man. There are a great many to whom the world would be so charitable, as to allow them to have a tolerable share of common sense, if they did not set up for something more than common, something very uncommon, bright and witty. If we would trace the faults of conversation up to their original source, most of them might, I believe, be resolved into this; that men had rather appear shining than be agreeable in company: they are endeavouring to raise admiration, instead of gaining love and good-will: whereas the latter is in every body's power, the former in that of very few.

The second cause is an hastiness or precipitancy in judging, before we know the whole of the case. Nothing is more common than to pronounce, with a decisive air, upon a man's whole character from a suspicious circumstance; and that too in cases where none but those who are intimate with him can have decisive evidence. Actions appear absurd, which are yet founded upon weighty and substantial reasons, known to the party concerned, but unknown to us. The motive he acts upon may be a secret confined to his own breast. Several have, I believe, incurred the imputation of covetousness, who really could not have expended more than they did, without being injurious to their families, and perhaps to their creditors.

A single circumstance slipped in, will envenom a whole relation; and there may be often a circumstance omitted which would give quite another turn to the whole. Incline always to the favourable side when things are doubtful. If you should be mistaken on the charitable side, God will overlook your mistake, and accept your charity. But if you mistake through uncharitableness,—all that I shall say is, may your hearers consider your invectives with judgment, and your Maker with mercy.

3. A third cause is malice. A good natured man will be far from thinking, that nothing can give life and spirit to conversation but scandal and raillery; he will take care that, after some hours spent in his company, none shall reflect upon any expression of his which shall dwell upon their minds with pain and uneasiness. Whereas unhappy tempers take a sullen satisfaction in blasting characters; and it must be owned, they have often a very unlucky turn that way; keen glances of censure proceeding generally from a dark involved temper, like flashes of lightning from a gloomy sky.

Or perhaps a malicious man shall go a more artful way to work. "Such a man," says he, "has several good qualities, and" "I cannot say but I have an esteem for" him. But what a pity is it that he "should act in so ridiculous a manner as "he has done lately? I am heartily sorry for it; I know more than I will say; but I love not to dwell upon faults." Thus he shall express a world of sorrow for his neighbour's misconduct; when, after all this extraordinary concern, he shall not fail to set it out in the most aggravating circumstances: he shall express more than is true, and intimate more than he expresses: he shall introduce what he has to say against a man with a recital of some valuable qualities, on purpose to give himself an air of impartiality; and then shall usher in a character, which would not be received from a declared enemy, or an angry man. A malignant praise has been always the most successful vehicle to insinuate slander, as poison is never more artfully conveyed than in perfumes.

It must be observed, for the honour of human nature, that a much larger majority in towns and villages are the peaceful and inoffensive inhabitants: except in very large and populous places, there are not, generally speaking, above five or six troublesome intermeddling persons, enemies unto peace, and the pests of society. And yet these, by forging falsehoods, and grafting upon the truth several inflaming circumstances, by misrepresenting what is innocent, perverting what is good, and aggravating what is evil, shall disturb the peace of the whole neighbourhood, spread lies, and foment divisions. I do not know what pleasure men of this stamp may take, in supposing themselves to stand clear of those vices which they charge upon others. But this I dare venture to say, that the same mean-ness and littleness of soul, which makes them so inquisitive to know, so glad to hear, and so industrious to spread any fault of others, would make them commit the very same, provided they had the same temptations and complexion. For vice proceeds from nothing but the meanness and baseness of a depraved soul.

To this class of ill-natured persons those must be reduced, who love, as they express it, to speak their minds upon all occasions, privileged talkers; affronting those above them, insulting those beneath them, and displeasing every body. But if they will always speak freely what they think, they shall first take care to think justly, as they ought, tenderly of others, humbly and soberly of themselves.

The most delicate pleasure is, to impart it to our fellow-creatures; complaisant, but never insipid; frank, but never rude and unguarded; general in our civility to all the company, and particular to each person by turns; when the discourse is directed to us, lending a favourable attention, and making pertinent replies; like a fine picture, which seems to fix an eye upon, and direct its views, to each person in the room, who looks upon it, and eyes it attentively. And if politeness (politeness I mean as to the main essentials) be an attention to say and do those things only which may send others away pleased with themselves and us, as far as it is consistent with reason and truth, then certainly politeness is a part of natural and revealed religion, the latter of which expressly commands us to be courteous; it is good-nature beautified and refined by art; good-nature, which, like the Author of nature, is not extreme to mark what is done amiss. Charity, the most lovely of virtues, represents others as lovely as possible. It does not merely let us see an object as it is; it is a kind of sunshine, which brightens what it lets us see. Whereas ill-nature passes over all the shining parts of a man's character, and dwells entirely on the dark side of it: as a painter of low rank shall throw those beauties into darkness and shade, which his eye cannot endure to behold, because his hand cannot reach them.

The fourth cause of evil-speaking is envy, or an uneasiness, arising from a reflection that the persons envied are our superiors in fortune, or other abilities. This prompts us to depreciate their worth, and to bring down their character to a level with ours, since we cannot advance ours to the same eminence. We cannot outstrip them by fair and direct means, and therefore we endeavour basely to supplant them.

Men of solid sense and virtue seldom envy others, or think themselves despised; because few or none are apt to think themselves slighted, except those that deserve to be so: they, on the other hand, have that genuine feeling that inward consciousness of goodness, that home-felt satisfaction, which the vain and conceited may pretend to, but never truly perceive. This makes them never out of humour with themselves; and when men are not out of humour with themselves, they see and represent others in the most lovely light. One need not envy any person, nor consequently detract from him. Let a person be our better, as he is called, provided he is not our better in, what is best of all, religion and virtue. The virtuous and the good are the only persons to be envied; if there were not a better way to be taken, which is to make ourselves as virtuous and good as they are, by doing all the good we can, and purposing more than we can do.

The fifth cause is, little personal animosities, just after a supposed or real injury, where there is no settled malice. And therefore it would be a good rule, that, before our passions are thoroughly cooled, we make a resolution to speak all the good we know of our adversary: but if we cannot do this, that then we resolve never to speak of him at all any further than our own self-defence obligeth us: because whatever good qualities we can allow him at that juncture, those, we may depend upon it, he has; but the ill qualities, with which we find a strong inclination to charge him, those, perhaps, he has not. For let your knowledge of mankind be never so great, yet you never can see persons or things in a true light, unless you view them coolly and dispassionately; the same sober and dispassionate temper, which qualifies a man for an inquiry into the truth of things, enable him likewise to form a just judgment of the characters of persons. Observe what your sentiments of the same person are, after he has done you some signal favour, and you will find this to be strictly true; you will find the judgment which you formed in the heat of your temper entirely reversed. Let this then be the fixed determination of your mind, to forbear all offensive words and actions till you are calm enough to examine the affair minutely and to give it a rehearing. Take it for granted, that whatever the ferment of passion suggests is either entirely, or at least in some measure, false. We all see through a glass darkly; but passion makes us see through a glass falsely, which magnifies injuries beyond their due proportion. This we all acknowledge in our cooler hours, yet it is ten to one we most unaccountably forget it upon the next provocation. Such is our nature, and it is amazing that he who has studied it, and knows his own weaknesses, should be severe upon any body but himself.

The sixth cause of evil-speaking is an ill life in general. Those who know a great deal of ill of themselves, are apt to suspect ill of every body else. Thou thoughtest wickedly, that I was such an one as thyself, is the character which the Psalmist gives of an immoral person. They accuse people of wickedness which they do not know to be true; and censure them for what they cannot know to be true, viz. their intentions, and the thoughts of their hearts. They shall fancy, as Nero did, all to be inwardly as bad as themselves, though some are more artful to save appearances. Thus their talk is a constant satire upon others, and their actions a living satire upon themselves. Let them say what hard things they please, they can do much harder things than they say. Their foul language is nothing but the overflowings of a much fouler heart.

The seventh cause of evil-speaking is talkativeness. There are several who have neither a fund of sense enough to talk well, nor modesty enough to be silent. They must either act the part of mutes upon the stage of life, or they must have recourse to the standing topics of conversation, which are to defame public parties, or vilify particular men. It is beneath the worthy to go about as a tale-bearer among the people; that is the province of the worthless; mere leaden pipes: though the metal be dull, base, and ignoble, they serve to convey fresh streams of intelligence to every place: we apply gold, and the nobler metals, to other uses.

It must, however, be owned, that men who deserve well in other respects, shall be sometimes guilty of this fashionable vice; either because, though they have a general and standing conviction that evil speaking is a crime, yet they do not consider and attend to the malignity of it at that juncture, or because the common-ness of the crime insensibly reconciles it to their thoughts; they see it practised every day, and that makes it familiar to them, and takes off every idea of horror. To obviate those ill effects which custom may have, let us consider,

III. The unreasonableness of evil-speaking.

For men are not more mistaken in any thing, than in the estimate they make of crimes. They seem to judge of them more from their uncommonness, than from the baneful consequences which attend them. Whatever crime is uncommon, is surprising, and consequently more shocking, than others perhaps of a deeper dye, which, because we see them committed every day, we therefore think very small or no crimes at all. They do not excite that striking disgust and aversion, which they would do, if more unusual and unfrequent. It is observable, that in fashions, opinions, and modes of dress, nothing seems absurd to which men have been accustomed from their infancy. It is the same in sins; nothing moves horror that is familiar to us. To rob a man of his good name, is not so shocking a vice as to rob him of a sum of money; yet he who does the latter, knows how much he has taken, and what restitution to make; but it is impossible for him who does the former to make an adequate judgment how much the injured person has suffered, and what reparation he ought to make; for he cannot tell what advantages the person might have received, if no disadvantageous impressions had been given of him.

Many value reputation more than life, which without reputation is but a burden. The tongue therefore that wounds that, may be a sharper sword than any other, which can only hurt the body. He whose teeth are spears and arrows, may pierce deeper to the heart, than if he, in a literal sense, employed those weapons against his adversary.

It is certain that, according to the common saying, so much reputation is so much power; and in proportion to men's credit, esteem, and character in the world, their weight, influence, and power to do themselves and others good, will be greater and more extensive. In some stations of life, to deprive a man of his good name, is to deprive him of his livelihood, of his all in this world, as in matters of trade and commerce; and in all stations and callings, a great deal depends upon the character which we maintain; and whatever sullies the brightness of our reputation lessens our usefulness.

Let us consider, whether it would do the world or ourselves any harm, if that scandal, that precious knowledge, of which we are so communicative, should die with us. If it would not do any harm, then it is one of the first principles of morality, not to give others pain and uneasiness, not to wound them, either in mind or body, without a sufficient cause, without a design to compass some valuable end; and take it for granted, whatever pleasure you may feel in giving utterance to ill-natured suggestions, there is a much greater in stifling them. But if out of the abundance of the heart the mouth must speak; if the fulness of your soul, impatient to asperse others upon every occasion, upon no occasion must have a vent, then you are certainly in the very gall of bitterness and the bond of iniquity. On the contrary, what commendations does he deserve, who, at the same time that he has too much good sense to think well of the worthless, has too much charity to speak ill of them, when there is no necessity for it?

What, if a person, who in the main has led a good life, should yet, contrary to the general tenor of it, be guilty of some unaccountable weakness? What should we learn from this? Not certainly some poor materials for idle conversation, in which, whatever expence of words there may be, there is no expence at all of thought: no, it ought to teach us something far more useful and noble, a lesson of diffidence of ourselves, watchfulness, and circumspection, lest we, who think we stand, should also fall. The mis-carriages of a good man, which give an ill-natured pleasure to little minds, suggest to every great mind the most melancholy ideas of the weakness of human nature in general, but no spiteful and venomous reflections against his weakness in particular. Far from insulting over his fallen worth, he views his downfall with a generous pity and warned by it, works out his own salvation with fear and trembling.

As when the young, the blooming, and the vigorous, who bade fair for length of days, yet pine away, or are cut off by some sudden sickness, it teacheth us to be more temperate, and cautious, to preserve the health of the body; so when the good and virtuous, from whose former actions we might expect an uninterrupted course of piety, are overtaken, we scarce know how, in any notorious and flagrant vice, this should put us upon our guard, and make us take all due precautions to preserve the health of the soul. This is the use we are to make of these pitiable instances: they are no subjects for wanton merriment, pleasantry, and witty spleen; no, they are subjects for a serious consideration on our own frailty; they teach us not to be too sanguine, or over-secure. "Tell me, O my conscience, have I ever done, or shall I ever do, any thing like this?" Would to God we would talk and commune oftener with ourselves; we should the seldomer talk vainly about ourselves, and uncharitably about others.

Lastly, It is no unusual thing to hear some complaining, that their abilities to do good, and to abound in works of charity, are cramped within a narrow sphere, though their inclinations are very large and extensive. Now, if these men are in earnest, I will point out one kind of charity, which will not be expensive to themselves, and yet endear them to their fellow creatures. Their circumstances may not enable them to cherish merit by their generosity, and to relieve distress by their charity; but this charitable office is daily in their power, to cast in shades their neighbour's misconduct, and to set out in the most advantageous point of view their good qualities; to extenuate their failings, and to do justice to their virtues; to produce an obscure character into light, and to rescue an injured one from obloquy. Silver and gold they may have little or none: but such as they have they may give, viz. what is better than silver and gold, a good name and reputation to their neighbours.

I shall conclude with some advice to those who suffer in their reputation.

Let them consider, that "if the invectives against them are true, they ought rather to correct themselves, than make reprisals upon others; but if false, a con-

"tempt of them will destroy the belief of them, but a concern will argue the truth of them." Let them endeavour to put to silence the ignorance of foolish men, by a well-doing. Let them make it their business to acquire a sufficient stock of merit; and great merit, like light, cannot be entirely concealed; though it is most amiable when it does not shew itself in too open and full a glare. The veil of modesty cannot long hide genuine worth, any more than the mask of hypocrisy can long cover our vices. He who is substantially good, will, in despite of all detraction, ere long appear so. The arrow may be drawn to the head, and levelled with a dexterous arm, but cannot reach a virtue which rises to an uncommon height. Let them, lastly, put their trust in that Bene who will, make their righteousness as clear as the light, and then just dealing as the noon-day.

On the Characters of those who pretend to Morality without Religion.

[Preached before the University of Oxford.]

COLOSSIANS, iii. 23.

Whatsoever ye do, do it heartily, as to the Lord, and not unto men.

HAVING in a former discourse endeavoured, I. To ascertain the foundation of morality, and fix it on its proper basis, viz. a regard to the Deity, I now proceed.

II. To inquire into the characters and motives of those, who, though strangers to piety and devotion, yet pretend to be animated with the most exalted sentiments of benevolence, humanity, and probity.

It is no easy matter to understand upon what principles they can act who make pretensions to an exalted worth, but are unfortunately lost to all sentiments of piety. If they disbelieve a future state then to think, that they shall shortly be as if they never had been, that they must soon be swallowed up in annihilation, that bottomless gulph, where all distinctions are lost, as rivers in the ocean, is enough to pall each exalted and noble thought, and to beget in them a sullenness, sourness, and discontent. A fruitfulness and impatience, that will grow upon them, will make them, so far from fulfilling the law by bearing one another's burdens, that they will be incapable of bearing their own. They must despise themselves and their fellow-creatures as a set of insignificant reptiles, that are to crawl for a while upon the face of the earth, and then to mix with the common mass of things. And as they who expect no other life ought to make the most of this, they must contract a narrow-spirited and illiberal cast of thought.

But if they believe a future state, how can they have any taste and relish for benevolence, and yet have no love for that Being, who has endowed morality and benevolence with an exceeding and eternal reward? On the other hand, what delightful perceptions must it give them to reflect, that at the same time that they are wishing, contriving, and promoting, the happiness of their fellow-creatures, they are fellow-workers with that great and good Being, who is able and willing to give them as great a happiness as their most unbounded good-will can wish, and far greater than their narrow understanding can conceive? How must their hearts burn within them, who have so fervent a zeal for charity, to find, that this charity shall never fail; that these short-lived instances of friendship and good-will, which we shew to one another here, will be succeeded by an uninterrupted intercourse of mutual endearments for ever and ever? And what will most heighten their humanity, will be, to consider that we shall all be partakers of the same common happiness from Him with whom is the fulness of joy, and from whom continual rivers of pleasures are ever streaming. It is then absurd to pretend a love for benevolence, and yet to be regardless of the most benevolent Being that is. And it is likewise absurd to pretend to love him, without a serious examination into his will, never dismissing what bears that venerable stamp, without a fair and impartial hearing of the evidences for the truth of it. For on whomsoever the world may bestow the title of moral men, yet an indifferent carelessness, and a wilful neglect to examine into his will and pleasure, is no part of morality. Nay, his will, whose pleasure we must either do, or whose displeasure we must unavoidably suffer, ought to be the uppermost consideration of every man. Can he deserve the name of a good man, who does not shew the least regard to that Being, to whom he owes every thing; the Deity being the fountain-head even of those blessings which are conveyed to him by his fellow-creatures, as through so many channels?

But is it not, you will say, true in fact, that there are several of strict probity, generosity, and worth, without the least tincture of piety? To which I answer, several have from their infancy associated the ideas of happiness and esteem, of misery and disgrace. This makes them decline those actions which may entail infamy and disgrace upon them, and pursue those which may beget an esteem for them: esteem being to them an essential ingredient of happiness. They have been taught to set an high value upon themselves; which high value of themselves is always, more or less, accompanied by a suspicion or mistrust, that they over-value themselves. For which reason they are impatient to have the favourable verdict which they pass upon themselves seconded and confirmed by the approbation of others, and unwilling to do any thing that may lessen them in the opinion of their fellow-creatures. It is then the desire of fame, not the love of virtue, which is their incentive to good actions. And if we look abroad into the world, we find it thus in fact. Persons of this stamp will scorn to do a little thing, through the abhorrence of any thing that may make them cheap and contemptible in the eye of the world: but they will not scruple to commit a sin, upon which the fashionable world has stamped a credit, and given a sanction to. A person who is ungrateful, much more, ungrateful to his sovereign Benefactor, must be void of everything which is great, glorious, and beautiful, in the soul. He may indeed be actuated by the love of applause, by caprice, by the prevailing mode and fashion of the age in which he lives; but his mind is too narrow, contracted, and ungenerous, to be swayed by any fixed and determined principle of goodness.

He who in a public sphere seems to have the good of his country much at heart, superior to all interested views, in private life blasts the honour, wounds the peace, of a deserving family, and does that which he would think so unreasonable, as to warrant the keenest resentments, if he were the party injured. You wonder at this motley mixture in his character: but why should you expect a consistency of life and manners from him, who has no religious, and therefore no consistent, principle to act upon? The case is this: what he acts in a public sphere, he acts not as a duty incumbent on him, but as it falls in with his reigning passion, his fondness for popularity, and a desire to be thought of by others as highly as he thinks of himself. In private life, when the eye of the world is no more upon him, his selfish and sordid passions operate with their full force, and draw him off from that goodness which he never practised for substantial reasons: he hoped, that what he did in privacy would escape the public notice; but if it took air, the world, the higher part of the world, has dignified these vices with the specious name of gallantry, given a countenance to them, and by the commonness of them, lessened the popular odium against them.

I answer further, that there is a distinction to be made between a complexional benevolence and a rational humanity. The former depends upon a finer texture of the body, a brisker circulation of the blood, and flow of the animal spirits; and is rather an happiness than a virtue. And it is observable, that this benevolence decays in some people as they advance in years: those who were open to every social and humane pleasure, sometimes grow contracted in old age, and centre every thing in themselves; like rivers freezing in winter, that before dispensed plenty and fruitfulness all around. The truth of the matter is, it was only an occasional complacency, operating by fits and starts, not deeply rooted in the soul, but founded on the temper and mechanism of the body; and therefore ceased of course when that mechanism was altered.

The true, genuine, uniform benevolence, which will stand the test, must be seated in the soul, and founded upon rational principles: and the question is, whether there can be such a rational benevolence, which is always the same, without any regard to that Being who is the same yesterday, to day, and for ever. Now, benevolence implies a disposition to part with some advantages which we enjoy, in order to promote the happiness of our fellow-creatures. And in so doing, the man who is actuated by a principle of piety acts very rationally; what he gives unto the poor, he lends unto the Lord, who will repay him again. But he who foregoes his own enjoyments for the sake of another, without any prospect of a recompence, must love his neighbour better than himself, contrary to the dictates of cool unbiassed reason. Though therefore there may be a constitutional or natural generosity, without any love of, or regard for, the Deity; yet there can be no such thing as a rational, steady, and manly benevolence, without it. For worldly pleasure, honour, or convenience, can be his only rational aim, whose views are terminated by this world.

There is a fashion in virtues as well as in vices. Now, charity has the good luck to be in fashion at present; and it happens very fortunately, that an age and tion which abound in sin and vices of all kinds, should be distinguished by a virtue which covers a multitude of sins. There have been, I know, some who, without any appearances of piety, have expended large sums of money in works of charity. Now, not to examine whether this were owing to a kindly impulse of nature, or to the desire of popularity and applause, let it be observed, that whatever they do by their charity, they undo by the influences of a bad example. When persons in low life observe those who move in an higher orb shewing an open neglect of the Deity, they are too apt to copy after them; and then, having no fear of God before their eyes, give a loose to those vices which impoverish them, and plunge them into miseries of all kinds. And thus irreligious men of rank and figure introduce those very miseries by their influence, which they can only relieve in part by their benevolence. Nay, this very benevolence, a glaring popular virtue, makes their example more dangerous, than if they were consummately wicked. Just as, according to the Mosaic law, a man that was le ^{meaning} only in part, was more to be avoided than he whose body was entirely overspread with the leprosy. For a man desperately wicked raises in us an abhorrence, and is a kind of antidote to vice: but when good as well as bad ingredients enter into the composition of the same man, it is to be feared that his shining qualities, and especially so shining an one as humanity, will give a lustre to his vices, and recommend them to our imitation. All the good which he can do will not counterbalance the ill consequences of an example tending to give disadvantageous impressions of religion, and to disconcertance that public and reverential awe of the Deity, which is the surest guard of virtue and the strongest restraint from vice. Imitation is confessedly a strong principle of action, and especially the imitation of the rich to the lower sort. Therefore he who is influenced by a consistent rational principle of benevolence will, for the same reason that he is benevolent, be, or at least appear to be, devout: which will be the greatest instance of his benevolence, as his good example may prevent those vices, and that distress, the consequence of those vices, which an abandoned profaneness and ungodliness never fail to produce.

Many of those who are void of religious principles make politeness, which should be only the ornament of their behaviour, the sole rule of their actions. Morality has nothing to do in the case, (whatever pretensions they may make to it,) which teaches men not to polish over their behaviour, but to be intrinsically good; not to disguise their passions, but to get the better of them. The passion, for instance, of malice, is equally strong in some men of a refined education, as in those who have wanted that advantage: the only difference is, the former hate with a well-veiled malice and a courtly civility, whereas the hatred of the latter is more frank and undissembled; it discharges itself, which that of the former never does, in unbecomingly, scurrilous, and outrageous language. For the clothing of men's thoughts differs just as the clothing of their bodies does, according to their different ranks: the vulgar clothe their thoughts, just as they do their persons, in the most homely and disagreeable attire; whereas men of condition ex-~~hibit~~ exhibit theirs, which are often as corrupt as those of the former, in a genteeler dress and more delicate apparel. Vice is the same in both: in the one it is an open sepulchre, foul, noisome, and unsightly; in the other, it is a sepulchre whited over and beautified; what is offensive is carefully removed out of sight, and nothing appears, whatever may be beneath, but what conveys genteel and polite ideas. This is all those persons mean, if they have any settled meaning, (as far as one can judge from their practice,) who have no regard for Christianity, but yet are advocates for the beauty of virtue. It is to practise some virtues, or rather to put on the appearance of some virtues, such as generosity, courage, &c. because they are becoming, genteel, and reputable, give them a considerable figure, and bespeak an elevation of mind answerable to their dignity: in the mean time, they leave others undone, such as humility, faith, meekness, and abstinence, though as much founded upon reason as any other virtues, merely because they have the misfortune to be unfashionable. They do not so much detest vice, properly speaking, as what is low, vulgar, and unbecoming in each vice, as I observed before in that of malice, and might give many more instances. Decency is the idol which engrosses all their homage, exclusive of true genuine inward virtue. And if that be the case, they may be said to do just as the heathens did, who sacrificed to the graces, but did not serve the God of heaven and earth. They do not abstain from sin as such, but from sin under such modifications as make it shocking and inconsistent with fine manners.

After all, I will not deny, that the head of man is deceitful, who can know it? It mistakes men's notions for realities, as some talk and write about chance, fortune, and necessity, as if they had an actual existence. It may, sometimes imagine, what is a mere notional beauty of virtue, viz. a beauty distinct from its advantages, to be something real and substantial. It may form a fine idea, and then fall in love with its own creation. For enthusiasm does not confine itself to religion, it extends itself to virtue and to every thing else. Our notions generally take a tincture from our temper. And men whose glowing and romantic imagination makes plain sense flat and tasteless to them, will disrelish such a morality as the Christian, who is founded on plain sober sense : they must image to themselves something rapturous and ecstatic ; and when they meet with no object of this kind in the nature of things, they strike out one for themselves by the heat of a prolific fancy. Rapt up into the airy regions of visions and chimeras, where they walk in a vain shew and please themselves in vain, they look down with disdain upon meaner mortals of a cooler turn, who follow unaffected virtue upon solid ground. Sanguine men are seldom content with things as they are : to take a liking to them, they must imagine beauties which they have not. And thus some may, for aught I know, have gone beyond the verge of cool reason, and worked themselves up into an enthusiastic ardour for virtue, by the help of I know not what visionary and disinterested charms, which they have supposed it to have, without any view to its real excellencies, the advantages it brings here and hereafter. The mystery of the affair lies here : they feel a warmth of soul, when they have been long contemplating the fair idea of virtue : now they imagine that it is the beauty of virtue, all lovely in itself, which warms them : and that that must be something real, not visionary, which can impart a real warmth ; whereas there is nothing real but the ferment and glow of the imagination, which always takes fire by dwelling very long upon any object. Instances, however, of this lovely frenzy are very rare : the gross of our species are not susceptible of so fine an enthusiasm.

The generality of men, who pretend to morality independently of religion, except those in whom the original goodness of their nature gets the better of the badness of their principles, are such as have studied and practised the art of being easy and agreeable, without incommoding themselves, or denying themselves any pleasure within bounds. The difference between the vulgar and them consists in this, that the former, like marble in the block, retain a native ruggedness, whereas the latter have an equally impenetrable, but a more smooth and polished hardness of heart. Cheap favours, an insignificance of good-manners, and all the outside of benevolence, you may expect from them : but do not expect from them any solid and material services ; do not expect that any thing you can say should touch their hearts, or that they will do any thing which comes warm from thence. Their pretended benevolence is somewhat like the religion of the Pharisees, who were insipidly exact, and frivolously punctual, in little unconcerning niceties, such as tilthing mint, anise, and cummin, but neglected the weightier matters of the law, such as judgment, mercy, and truth ; and to both may be applied our Saviour's saying, These ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone. Benevolence, any further than it is constitutional, in most of those who disclaim all piety and devotion, is a fine souring word, of which we hear a great deal in their conversation, but see little or nothing in their practice. Is there a man who, though a stranger to piety, yet, without being misled by caprice or ostentation, goes on in a regular, uniform, habitual practice of doing good ; who, raised above the common wants of life, feels the miseries of his fellow-creatures with almost as much sensibility as if he knew by experience what it was to want ; and relieves them with all the bounty of one who is not afraid to want himself ? Such a man would not be far from the kingdom of heaven. But I am afraid, such a character is, for the most part visionary and romantic. We run from one extreme to another ; and benevolence without piety, to which it is closely allied, is commonly as much mere pretence and hypocrisy, as piety without benevolence was during the time of the grand rebellion. Then men were for giving glory to God, without shewing good-will to men, or promoting peace upon earth : and, since that time, some have set up a principle of morality and good-will to man, exclusive of all devotion and homage to the Deity. Both are inseparably united ; and what God and reason have joined together, let not man put asunder. But folly, like matter, is continually shifting the scene, and subsisting under different modifications. It is the fate of some people to be governed by a set of words without any determinate meaning annexed to them. Seeking the Lord, when men were ravaging the nation, was not more a cant term and mere jargon, than the agreeable soft sound of benevolence is, generally speaking, at present, without that which must be the basis of it, an affectionate love of God. A man may indeed do good occasionally without any principle, the very brutes doing several acts that are materially good; but to be habitually good, to be all of a piece, and consistent throughout, there must be a fixed principle of goodness woven into the soul. And he that will not do good to his fellow-creatures for the sake of God who created him, cannot, consistently with reason, be obliged to do it upon other motives. To lessen therefore our love of God, is to weaken our love of mankind. That God would place to his own account whatever was done for his sake to our distressed brethren, is a motive to do good as much superior to all others, as he himself is to all other beings.

An excellent Grecian historian, who lived before those principles of irreligion had gotten footing in Rome, to which he ascribes the ruin of his own country, has an observation very apposite to my present purpose. I shall beg leave to transcribe it, as I find it translated by a very eminent writer.

"See now the difference," (i. e. between a strict observance of religion and a disregard to it.) "In Greece, he that is 'intrusted with the publick money,' (to pass by other matters,) 'though it be but of a single talent, and though he gives a tenfold security, cannot be brought to discharge his engagements: while among the Romans the mere religion of an oath keeps those, who in the public administration, or in the foreign negotiations, have vast sums of money passing through their hand, from violating their honour and uprightness. And whereas in other places,' (where irreligion prevails), 'it is rare to find a man who keeps his hands clean; on the contrary, among the Romans, it is as rare to find any offending in this kind.'"

Thus far this writer, from whose country those very irreligious notions were soon after introduced into Rome, which, in process of time, proved destructive to it too.

I shall close this discourse with the following remark, viz. That though a man should violate some, or even all, the social duties, yet as long as a regard to the Deity was not quite extinct in him, there would be still some hold to be taken, and some faint hopes of reclaiming him. The root of virtue (for the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom) is still in the ground; and it may yet put forth again, though several of the considerable branches have been maimed and lopped off, but when a reverential awe of his Maker is quite worn out and defaced, then indeed the axe is laid unto the root of the tree: the very foundation, upon which the hopes of amendment could be built, is destroyed: his recovery is desperate, and his ruin sealed: there is nothing left to curb him from vice, and bring him back again to the practice of virtue.

S E R M O N LXIX.

By JEREMIAH SEED, M. A.

Rector of Enham in Hampshire, and late Fellow of Queen's College, Oxford.

Religious Pleasures productive of the greatest Happiness.

PROV. iii. 17.

Her ways are ways of pleasantness.

THE turbulent passions, such as anger and revenge, are disagreeable to our nature, because they are open and declared enemies to our repose: they alarm the soul at their first insurrection, and afterwards command it with an overbearing tyranny. But pleasure steals upon us by insensible degrees, smooths its passage to the heart by a gentle and insinuating address, and softens and disarms the soul of all its strength. It is more therefore to be guarded against, as being more dangerous, and what we have a greater inclination to. To arm us then against the deceitfulness of unlawful sensual delights, I have chosen the words of Solomon, which set before us the genuine and sincere pleasure which religion affords : Her ways are ways of pleasantness. In discoursing on which words I shall endeavour to shew,

I. First, That the pleasures of religion and virtue are superior to the pleasures of the animal life ; and,

II. Secondly, How necessarily those must be disappointed, who place their happiness in any thing exclusive of religion and virtue.

First then I am to shew, that the pleasures of religion and virtue are superior to the pleasures of the animal life.

And here we expect to be told by the men of pleasure, that spiritual satisfactions are nothing but the product of an overheated fancy, and mere enthusiasm. But we except against them as very incompetent judges. A good man, by tasting the pleasures of sense, as far as they are consistent with reason, is very well qualified to form a true estimate of them. But the sensual man, by being an utter stranger to religion, is no more able to make a judgment of the satisfaction it yields, than a man of no taste is to pass a decisive verdict upon the elegancies of poetry, or an idiot upon a point of philosophy.

Dismissing him therefore as an improper judge, we appeal to the virtuous for the superiority of rational delights ; whether others are not for the most part either idle diversions to lull our unquiet thoughts to sleep, to sooth the mind into a forgetfulness of itself, and to make life pass away unperceived ; or rather, whether they are not tumultuous joys, that put us in a ferment, and give the soul too sudden and violent emotions. Whereas virtuous pleasures produce a serene and lasting composure of mind ; they satisfy but never satiate. They flow not, like a torrent, with a short-lived noise and impetuosity ; but like a peaceful river in its own channel, strong without violence, and gentle without dullness.

But what am I going to prove—that he who strives to resemble God in holiness and purity, must have superior gratifications to him who makes himself like the beasts that perish ? A man that is sunk into brutality may indeed deny that those delights must be the highest which are seated in the highest and noblest part of us, the soul : but all the world besides will own, that the joys which spring from a distempered appetite, and are accompanied with a feverishness of desire, are infinitely inferior to those of a well-regulated mind, and a conscience void of offence towards God and towards man.

We see in several instances, that men prefer their reputation before the gratification of a brutal appetite, when put in competition with each other ; and though free from conscience, they are yet slaves to fame. Now the pleasure of a good name is seated in the mind ; it comes not from sensation but reflection. They own then, that an intellectual good is preferable to the gross indulgences of the animal life. But if reputation, which is but the shadow of virtue, claims the ascendant and superiority over sensual enjoyments ; certainly virtue, which is the substance itself, ought to take place of them in the true and impartial estimate of things.

I would gladly persuade the voluptuary to try an experiment, and then tell me, when he has cherished the worthy, and relieved the distressed by some well-placed act of charity, whether the consciousness of having made an human heart to sing for joy, and the blessing of him that was ready to perish come upon him, did not impart a more liberal, manly, and unallayed complacency, than all the cheating blandishments and allurements of sense. The latter are the pleasures of the brute ; whereas the former are the pleasures of the man, shall I say ? rather of good angels, nay even of God, who, wanting nothing himself, supplies the wants of every other being. And what can more transport, what can more ennoble the soul, than to be so temperate, as to have as few wants as possible in ourselves ; and yet so charitable as to do as much good as possible to others ? A remarkable instance of this disinterested virtue, and the superior satisfaction that attends great and worthy actions, we have in the generous Scipio, who, in the bloom of youth, returned his fair captive, a masterpiece of beauty, to her future husband and parents, whom conquest gave him an absolute right to, in the opinion of the heathen world. When he refused a considerable sum of gold, which was offered by the parents; and when at last consenting to accept of it, at their repeated instances, he delivered it as a part of her dowry to her spouse; I desire to know, whether the commendations which his own heart gave him, seconded with the praises of an husband and parents, delivered from their jealous apprehensions, did not inspire him with a greater exultation of delight than the possession of an injured woman could have afforded. Their praises were the sincere tribute of grateful hearts, and flowed from the fullness of their souls; and nothing could be more acceptable to Scipio's ingenuous mind, except the consciousness of the beauty of his own action; whereas the thoughts of wounding the honour of a noble family, and the peace of aged parents, must have dashed his enjoyments, and rendered them distasteful. This delicate sentiment of Scipio was attended with much truer and more solid satisfaction than any sensual gratification could have been; it was the pleasure of reason, which will bear repeating in the mind, and improves upon reflection.

On the contrary, where the gross affections take place, they leave little room for virtue; they tarnish the lustre of the best actions, and make a man uneasy and dissatisfied with himself. For he that is good by halves, labours under a perpetual discord of life; he is agitated alternately by sentiments of unlawful pleasure and piety; and passeth his life in a perpetual round of following and condemning the same things. On the one hand, the remainders of virtue and conscience enter the sweets of vice; and, on the other hand, the practice of vice pulls the relish of virtue and spiritual delights. He is neither brute enough to indulge his appetites without remorse, nor man enough to govern them. Hence he is at perpetual variance with himself, having just religion enough to make him uneasy, but not enough to make him happy.

A man that is divided between piety and sin, is like one that lives on the confines of two mighty contending states;

his breast is a constant seat of war; and he is sometimes under the dominion of virtue, and sometimes under the tyranny of vice; whereas a person of advanced piety, like one that lives in the inmost part of the country, enjoys a secure and unmolested situation of soul.

Thus does uneasiness haunt the man, that, like a person struck with the dead palsy, is part dead and part alive; and thus it will disquiet him, till his conscience becomes seared as it were with a hot iron, and he thinks there is no difference between good and evil; and to be persuaded of this, is as difficult as to believe there is no God.

But to take a right estimate of a man of pleasure, we should view him in the last stage of life. Good God! how contemptible does he appear to the world, and I dare say, even to himself, when he has no more that sprightliness and outward form which raised the admiration of the unthinking; nor that virtue and knowledge which is necessary to gain the esteem of the wise. When young (however inconsiderate and inconsiderable in himself) he might be fancied for a pert stupidity and a sprightly impertinence; some bright sentence in favour of infidelity, or piece of ridicule in contempt of religion, might meet with the applause of his ingenious acquaintance, who would be apt enough to stare upon him with a foolish face of praise. But the gaiety of youth being gone off, he must wear out the remainder of his days undistinguished and neglected; not daring to be alone; abhorring his own company; listless and uneasy at the present, he has no pleasure in reflecting upon what is past, nor in the prospect of any thing to come.

If he has an ample fortune, riches, it is true, may command an insipid complaisance; a formal homage and ceremonious professions of respect; and teach a servile world to speak a language foreign to their hearts. But where true merit is wanting, riches can never procure an affectionate esteem, an undissembled love, the tribute which virtue alone can either expect or deserve.

Hence it is that men of this stamp are continually complaining that the times are much altered for the worse; because the sprightliness of their youth represented every thing in the most engaging light, and when people are pleased with themselves, they are apt to be so with all around them; the face of nature brightens up, and the sun shines with a more agreeable lustre? But when old age has cut them off from the enjoyments they so much delighted in, and habitual vice has given them a disrelish of the only true pleasure, whose leaf withers not, and whose verdure remains in the winter of our days; no wonder, that a soul thus dis-tempered, should view every object on its dark side: the change is not in the times, but in themselves, who have been forsaken by those gratifications, which they could not be prevailed with to forsake. How much otherwise is it with the virtuous, who have had up an inexhaustible fund of pleasures against old age! the current of whose virtue still increasing as it runs along, becomes more strong and vigorous the nearer it approaches to the ocean of eternity. But this brings me to shew, Secondly, How necessarily those must be disappointed, who place their happiness in any thing exclusive of religion and virtue.

When we first make our entrance into the world, we are too apt to form sanguine notions and gaudy prospects of bliss; a thousand luxuriant scenes present themselves to our view. But by that time we reach the noon of life, experience of the world, frequent crosses and disappointments, call home our straggling thoughts, lower our notions of happiness, and reduce them to a just sense of things; to what is really attainable in this state; which is at best (for any length of time) not true pleasure, but rather a freedom from pain.

And if a man, at the close of life, were to make an impartial estimate, I doubt he would think his sufferings more than equivalent to his enjoyments: he would be unwilling, were the choice given him, to tread the same round over, and to measure life back again.

Few will deny this as to the poor, whose daily labour serves for little else but to get their daily bread, and their daily bread just refreshes and strengthens them to undergo their daily labour.

But the rich, you will say, have much fairer pretensions to happiness. Here then we may expect to find it, if any where: and yet they differ from others more in show than reality; and perhaps their passions, being more importunate and clamorous in their demands, in proportion to the superiority of their fortune, may make them only more pompously wretched than the vulgar. Greatness, by making pleasure familiar to them, flattens their relish for it; but gives a keener edge to every pain, which they must feel as well as others: it dulls their enjoyments, but points and quickens the sense of anguish and affronts. Indeed they may with application pursue this or that new pleasure, they may be fond for a while of a new acquisition; but when the gloss of novelty is once worn off, the transition is very natural from fondness to indifference: and that becomes tasteless and insipid to them, which they before so affectionately coveted. The eagerness of desire being over, we find that our reason was but the dupe of our imagination, which had painted things bigger than the life. Hence there is a restless agitation in our minds, still craving something new, still unsatisfied with it when possessed. Hence we are continually shifting the scene, expecting that happiness from a variety of enjoyments which we cannot find in any one of them. All the rivers run into the sea, says the Wise Man, yet is the sea not full: just so, though all earthly pleasures should centre in one soul, yet would not that soul be filled and satisfied; because as the soul is a spiritual being, nothing but spiritual pleasures can, in propriety of speech, be suitable to its nature, and proportioned to its grandeur. Hence that great king, after he had travelled through, and curiously surveyed every region of pleasure, returned at last to virtue, the native country of the soul, in which only she could dwell with satisfaction.

Here then the mistake lies; people in their enquiries after happiness place it on improper objects; they are looking for it abroad, and have recourse to a thousand diversions and amusements, whilst it is only to be found at home, in the right use of reason; in passions well regulated and directed; in a delightful self-consciousness in having done all the good in our power; in having employed our time to the glory of God, and the benefit of mankind.

But if happiness be the exercise of our faculties upon proper objects, that surely must be the noblest happiness when our minds are exercised upon the noblest objects.

How comes it then, that this great truth is generally overlooked—that those especially, who make the pursuit of happiness the great business of their lives; that those, who should command a more spacious prospect by standing upon higher ground, and enjoying a more commodious situation in the world, are yet as dead to all sentiments of piety as the meanest peasant, or most illiterate mechanic? Why, the drudgery of business cannot more effectually sink and debase the mind of the latter, than a constant circle of gay follies does that of the former: for even innocent amusements, when too often repeated, and too much indulged, do as effectually destroy true piety as sensual pleasures themselves: because the mind, by being fixed on trifles, is disabled and indisposed for greater and more important business. These diversions, however innocent in themselves, may yet, by an excess of them, become criminal, as they are attended with very bad consequences; as they destroy all manliness of soul, and occasion that levity of temper, which exposes us to the inroads of temptation, and makes us susceptible of ill impressions. When steadiness, the anchorage of the soul, is once lost, she becomes the sport of the passions, and is carried away with every wind.

From this fountain, from that amazing folly of our great ones, in running after every public entertainment, how trifling and ridiculous soever it may be, has flowed that fashionable indifference and disregard for every thing that is serious and sacred. The day which is more immediately set apart for the service and worship of God, is generally profaned; and an habit of gaming has extinguished every sentiment of devotion. Nor does the misfortune end here: inferiors are proud to form themselves upon the model of their superiors: and when those who are bound by all the ties of gratitude to that God who giveth them all things richly to enjoy, to advance the interests of religion, and to enlarge its empire, stamp a credit upon vice and irreligion, by this means a gate is opened to all manner of profaneness; men commonly thinking it some excuse for their crimes, if they can plead the example of their betters in favour of them.

What then? will some one say; is this your way to happiness? Must we bid adieu to all diversions? By no means. I would not be understood to condemn amusements in general; I only condemn them, when they take up too much of our time, and interfere with nobler pursuits: for certainly we were not placed in this world, like the leviathan in the deep, only to take our pastime therein. There are duties to be performed by us; and, as a motive to our obedience, the great law-giver has made these duties and our happiness consistent with each other; they go hand in hand, and the pleasure which results from virtue is sufficient recommendation of it to our practice. Who ever relieved the indigent without feeling within himself the greatest complacency and satisfaction? Compare the pleasures of sobriety and temperance with those of rioting and excess; the sweet sleep of labour and industry with the broken and disturbed slumbers of idleness and luxury, and reason will soon convince you which deserves to have the preference.

We may therefore lay it down as a maxim of undoubted truth, that none is a greater epicure than the true sincere Christian; none are greater self-deniers than the abandoned in pleasure; as they cut themselves off from the most valuable enjoyments; as they contract a littleness of soul, and a disrelish and insensibility to every generous sentiment to humanity and goodness; as they must be obliged to a thousand trifles to fill up the mighty void of thought, to shut out that importunate intruder self-reflection, and to keep off that sullenness which must come upon a mind conscious of no intrinsic worth; and when some years, each more flat and insipid than another, are thus spent, they have no reason to value this life, but merely because they are afraid of a future.

The conclusion of all is, happiness consists in our placing it upon true and proper objects. We have seen, that the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, cannot secure it to us. Let us therefore seek for it where it is only to be found, in the practice of virtue and religion. And pure and undefiled religion is this, to relieve the distressed, to have an universal charity for all men, and to keep ourselves unspotted from the world.

SERMON LXX.

By JOHN TOTTIE, D. D.

Canon of Christ Church, and Archdeacon of Worcester.

Ridicule, so far as it affects Religion, considered and censured.

2 PETER, iii. 3.

Knowing this first, that there shall come in the last days scoffers.

It would be a great point gained in the cause of truth, if we could once persuade men to reason calmly and dispassionately about it; if they could be brought to debate on things serious in a serious manner, and to govern all their inquiries, in matters of an allowed importance, by the rules of decency and sobriety. No man that is a real friend to religion, can be willing to oppose a rational examination into the truth of any opinions or doctrines, that come recommended to us by the authority of so venerable a name: not only because this would be an impregnable security to error, where it had ever taken possession, but because the interest of truth itself must be injured by it; which may give room for suspicion, when it declines a scrutiny, but will, like gold in the furnace, retain all its weight and purity in the trial, and shine even with a greater lustre for the severity of it. But then likewise every man who professes himself to be a free inquirer into religious concerns, should bring with him a mind duly disciplined to render his inquiries successful. Having laid in a proper store of previous knowledge to inform his understanding, he must be satisfied of the vast importance of the matters he is about to take into consideration; he must approach them with modesty and reverence, examine them with meekness and sincerity, and judge of them with impartiality. Those who are already settled in true religious principles would not long be at variance with such a disposition as this. But it is one thing, to convince men who delight in instruction, and another, to prepare men to be capable of conviction. This is a task of difficulty and labour indeed. For whilst a levity of mind, an affectation of novelty, an undistinguishing aversion to superstition, the self-sufficiency of ignorance or superficial inquiry, the prevalence of fashion, or contagion of evil acquaintance, and, above all, strong prejudice in favour of vicious habits, determine men severally against the doctrines and duties of our holy religion, how shall we go about to explain or enforce either the one or the other? In vain to such unbelievers do we oppose the strength of reason and argument, when they lose all their force merely because they are advocates for religion; whilst, for the same reason, every little plausible plea that can be urged in favour of infidelity is pressed as a demonstration. And, to aggravate the misfortune, these are a generation so wise in their own eyes, that as they will not give ear to admonition, so neither will they be prevailed upon to be silent; obstinate in error, they labour for proselytes to it; like the deaf adder, they will not hear the voice of the charmer, and the poison of it is under their lips. It is notwithstanding our duty, with whatever success it may be attended, to persevere in recommending the interests of Christ and his religion, by the force of our doctrine, and by the example of our lives; and especially it behoves us, since we place the success of our cause upon the truth of it, that we neither defend it ourselves in such a manner as to weaken it, nor suffer our adversaries to overthrow it by subtlety and stratagem; and that, as we may be sure, they can be furnished with no arguments against us from right reason, so we suffer them not, without detection, to substitute fallacies in their room.

It falls not within my present design, to enumerate or distinguish by their several kinds all the arts of false reasoning by which they pervert the judgment of mankind, seduce the illiterate and unwary and even sometimes perplex the diligent and more learned inquirer. As sophistry is their science, it must be owned that some of them are great proficients in it, and can furnish out examples to every rule. But my text confines me to the consideration of a particular artifice, which, though it has little to do with reason, and rarely with the appearance of it, has perhaps done more mischief in general to true religion, than every other craft beside ; I mean that of mockery and ridicule. And I am supported in this assertion by an author of great name, who, though he has loudly declared himself an advocate for the free use of them upon all subjects, yet seems to think, that if they had but been seasonably applied, they might have crushed Christianity in its infancy. "He never heard that the ancient Heathens (though the irreligious part of them had long before tried the same method, unsuccessfully it seems, against some of their own philosophers) were so well advised in their ill purpose of suppressing the Christian religion in its first rise, as to make use at any time of what he calls a Bartlemew-fair method ; but this he is persuaded of, that had the truth of the gospel been any way surmountable, they would have bid much fairer for the silencing it, if they had chose to bring our primitive founders up on the stage in a pleasanter way than that of bear-skins and pitch-barrels ; and he is apt to think, that if the Jews had tried their wit and malice this way against our Saviour and his Apostles, they might possibly have done our religion more harm than by all their other ways of severity." Now though we know that Christianity is built upon a sure foundation which can never be removed, and accordingly has from the beginning surmounted the united efforts of mockery and persecution, (as Christ himself was clothed with a robe of purple, and hailed as a mock-king, before he was led to his crucifixion ; and as the apostles of Christ were exposed to the derision as well as to the cruelty of their enemies,) yet so far we must agree, that nothing has done or can do our religion greater harm than ridicule, in totally subverting the faith of many, and weakening that of more. A persuasion of the truth of this remark will be apt to make us startle a little at another of the same author's, which is not easily to be reconciled with this, and may deserve to be taken into consideration. For in another place he would have "ridicule to be the proper test of what is serious, as gravity is of ridicule ; because a subject that will not bear raillery is suspicious, just as a jest that will not bear a serious examination is false wit." The reason of this he had given us before. "For that, says he, which can be shewn only in a certain light is questionable. Truth, it is supposed, may bear all lights ; and one of those principal lights or natural mediums by which things are to be viewed in order to a thorough recognition is ridicule itself ; which he calls that manner of proof, by which we discern whatever is liable to just raillery in any subject." The insinuation designed is obvious, that true religion can never suffer by this method, though imposture may. Now, forasmuch as ridicule is here represented in such a light as to render it upon all occasions not only innocent but laudable, as being a sure guide to lead us to the knowledge of the truth, and a never-failing test to try the worth of every principle and opinion ; and because an acquiescence in this notion may be attended with very fatal consequences, (even where the ridicule is as genteel as this author pleases ; a quality that may in some cases render it even more dangerous, as it engages the favour of mankind to whatever it accompanies,) I shall endeavour in the remaining part of my discourse to shew,

I. That an inclination to ridicule is apt to lead men off from any serious inquiries at all : that it cannot in itself avail to the discovery or the trial of religious truths ; and that the practice of it is neither a proper nor effectual method to promote the interest of them.

II. I shall observe how those who pretend most to this talent of ridicule do in reality employ it : and shall expostulate with them a little upon their conduct.

III. In order to render this discourse more useful, I shall briefly recommend some means of securing our religion and ourselves against any attacks that may come from this quarter.

I. If, as I have laid down in my first observation, a fondness for ridicule is apt to lead men off from any serious inquiries at all, it will follow, that we ought to be cautious how we indulge ourselves in a propensity or inclination to it; because, allowing that it might be of service if properly applied, yet in all likelihood we never shall make that right application. And that the foregoing observation is just, experience will teach us, and reason may account for what experience teaches us to be true.

For whatever qualities may be necessary to furnish men with a talent for ridicule, yet we shall almost universally find a levity of mind to be the main spring that acts in action, as it disposes them to merriment and to treat every thing ludicrously that falls in their way. And accordingly we may observe, that what those, who are eminent in this character, seek after and labour for, is only something to be witty upon: and so fond are they of showing their abilities at a jest, that whenever it occurs, they throw it out, in season or out of season; at friends, at religion, and on the most solemn occasions. Nor indeed is it to be presumed, that men bigotted to this kind of wit will ever lose an opportunity of exerting it; or that they will be restrained in what they say to propriety and decency, when sprightliness and humour is all that they aim at. It is evident that men of this turn must be impatient, if not incapable, of cool and sedate reflection, and must have a frame of spirit opposite to every thing that is grave and manly. They can be no more inclined to, than they are qualified for, sober inquiries. For how should they, think ye, perplex themselves with abstracted reasonings, with examination of first principles, and pursue a tedious deduction of consequences from them, in order to settle (what they are in no care to have at all settled) their thoughts? Is it likely that these should give themselves the pain of long and laborious searches, which the perverse dispositions of men have in many cases made necessary for the disentangling of truth, whose profession is only to make themselves sport? Or is it probable, that they should concern themselves to any useful purpose with the more obvious duties of religion, which carries too grave an aspect to recommend itself to such an acquaintance, which condemns all foolish jesting, and is itself the most serious thing in the world?

Indeed, that men of this turn should have made some superficial inquiries into religious matters, and that by a slender application they should have furnished themselves with a kind of skill therein, which is worse than ignorance, namely, that of raising doubts and difficulties without knowing, or caring for, a solution, is as readily to be accounted for as admitted: because hence is raised their lasting fund for ridicule, without which they would have but few opportunities of displaying their talent. For as true ridicule should be levelled at things really and nothing more than absurd, such as are fit to excite no other passion than the bare derision of mankind, so we shall find it to be a work of too delicate and subtle a spirit, to be performed by every pretender to it: whereas there is a kind of it that is open to the most bungling capacity, which consists entirely in misrepresenting, by a ludicrous manner, things truly serious and solemn. And the more they are so, the more is the ridicule heightened by it; as persons are the more exposed by an antic representation in proportion to the gravity of their characters. Thus will a fondness for ridicule in all probability prevent men from entering at all into any inquiries relating to religious matters, any further than as they will furnish materials to them for the exercise of their wit.

But supposing that it was possible for men of this trivial and fantastical frame of mind to busy themselves in earnest in an inquiry into religious opinions and doctrines, in order to think aright, and to act agreeably to a deliberate judgment; yet I must further observe, that their talent of ridicule would not in the least avail them in this case, either as an assistant in the pursuit, or as a criterion for the trial, of the truth. This will effectually appear from the nature of truth itself, and the means which that will necessarily point out for the attainment of it. Now truth, as far as human understanding is the subject of it, "consists in the perception of the visible or probable agreement or disagreement of ideas, as they are affirmed or denied one of another." It is evident, that in order to this perception, judgment is the most useful faculty of the mind, which is that of discerning and distinguishing between the several ideas it has. Without this, all our thinking would be nothing but confusion, and upon it depends the evidence and certainty of every truth which the mind of man can, by the assistance of its own powers, attain to. And the nicety and exactness of judgment consists in accurately separating, one from another, ideas wherein can be found the least difference, thereby to avoid being misled by similitude, and by affinity, to take one thing for another. Whatever therefore tends to disturb, to pervert, or to embarrass, this faculty, must in proportion render us less capable of attaining to, or discerning the truth. That ridicule has such a tendency, the very nature of it will inform us. For as it is properly that species of wit, which aims to expose things to laughter by a fantastical and ludicrous representation of them, it will so far appear to partake of the nature of wit in general, as to lie rather in putting together, in order to please and to surprise, ideas wherein can be found any distant resemblance or congruity, than in a careful observation wherein they differ; and whilst the great aim of it is to form burlesque pictures rather than true images in the mind, and it must of consequence be more solicitous to divert the imagination than to instruct the understanding, we shall find, that for once that it will lead to us the knowledge of truth, it will a thousand times misguide us. Nay, in some particular instances, ridicule may not only probably, but must necessarily lead us, from a right of notion of things, namely, whenever it intermeddles with any doctrines of religion, that should happen to be agreeable to truth; although it is pretended, that these can possibly receive no prejudice from it. For as it is the end of ridicule to expose things to laughter and derision, and as truly religious matters we have not any thing in them that is liable to this sort of treatment, so they must necessarily be disguised and misrepresented by false colours, before they can in any degree be capable of it. Where then will be the possibility of knowing and distinguishing the truth, when it shall so resemble error, that we shall be no longer able to delineate the genuine features of it? or how can that be an assistant towards the discovery of it, which is the very thing that puts on it the mask?

But, further: Neither is ridicule at all a better criterion for the trial of truth, than it is an assistant to us in the pursuit of it. It is by no means proving it to be so, by asserting that truth is to be tried by ridicule, because it never can prevail against the truth; that if it be wrong placed, it will recoil upon itself, and be its own corrector in the end: and that mocking at things truly serious and venerable, fixes a reproach upon the understanding of him only that attempts it. For though we know that truth will so far prevail, as to be incapable of being made false by any artifices whatsoever, yet may it not by being ridiculed appear to be so; and lose much of that good effect which it might otherwise have produced? and may not a hasty determination be made to the prejudice of it, before the ridicule is discerned to be false? Nay, may not persecution, or any other the most injurious treatment of religion, be as well recommended upon this principle for the trial of truth, because in the end it will be superior to them all? And though we allow that a man may, by a misapplication of his wit, make himself truly ridiculous to those who have just notions of things; yet we must be sensible that the generality of men are not competent judges whether it be exercised unreasonably or duly; nor are they able truly to distinguish between what falls under ridicule, and what really deserves to do so. And I would ask even those who are capable of weighing things in an equal balance, and of making just and equitable determinations, how it is that they themselves can tell, whether ridicule is pointed at its proper object, or not? Can it be known any otherwise than by the cool deliberation of the understanding, which must take things as they are in themselves under examination, and conclude from a judicious inquiry into the true nature of them, whether they deserve to be treated ludicrously or not? Or can they justify even to themselves their raillery of any thing, till they have by reason and reflection first satisfied themselves that it is irrational and absurd? Now what kind of a test that is, which must itself be tried by another criterion, namely that of strict reason, before it can be admitted as such, when this latter is capable of answering every purpose much better without it; and how useless such a rule must be to measure religious truth by; I shall leave to the determination of every serious and unprejudiced mind.

But the most specious plea of all in behalf of this practice is yet behind, and which carries the greater weight with it, because it has sometimes been espoused by those who have been indisputably friends to the cause of virtue and religion. It has been urged, that though ridicule is in no wise to be proposed as a guide to conduct us to the knowledge of religious truths, or as a standard to prove them by, yet when they are once established upon their proper foundation, and have approved themselves to our calm and deliberate judgment, that then it may be of considerable service, both in the defence and recommendation of them: that it may be prevalent to silence unreasonable opposition; to keep true piety in countenance, and to make irreligion ashamed. That that weapon may be successfully employed on the righteous side, which has so often fought the battles of profaneness and infidelity; or to make use of an ingenious allusion, that it is truly useful and good so long as it retains, "the nature of that salt to which it is usually compared, which preserves and keeps sweet the good and the sound parts of all bodies, and only fets, dries up, and destroys, those humours which putrify and corrupt."

It is not because I would deprive religion of any aid whatsoever that can contribute to the security of it, but because I would have no auxiliaries called in to its assistance, whose fidelity and services are questionable, that I proceed notwithstanding to observe, that ridicule is neither a proper nor effectual method to promote the real interest of religion.

As for the gainsayers, it is in vain to think of silencing them by retaliation of raillery; who then only are enabled to oppose the truth with success, when the trial of it is put upon a wrong issue: it never can be effectually done but by serious argumentation proposed in the spirit of meekness and charity. The former alone will secure our cause, and the latter will contribute much to win over our adversaries. Whilst we rely upon strict reasoning only, we secure to ourselves a sure foundation; and a soft answer is a recommendation to others of the reasonings it contains. Whereas there is an acrimony in ridicule, which will exasperate rather than reclaim men, and make them incapable of receiving the truth by prejudicing them against it; and ourselves it will be apt to delude by setting up false lights, and may give our adversaries an advantage over us by leading us out of the way.

Much less should ridicule intrude itself into matters of controversy betwixt Christians themselves; as it seems to carry in it a spirit directly contrary to that of the religion they profess; as it lays both parties open to the scoffs of their common enemies; and as it can only shew at last, not which has the most righteous cause, but which has the keenest pen. Experience may teach us some of the mischiefs of this practice: for instances may be given wherein men have set out in a serious dispute on matters of importance, and have seemed to promise much success therein from their debates, while they were confined to argument and directed by moderation; till, raillery and ridicule having supplanted reasoning, the point in question was no longer in view: what was before a friendly contest for the truth, became a spiteful trial of wit, and from a difference of opinion grew an irreconcilable hatred in the heart. So much more likely is ridicule to perpetuate quarrels, than to decide a dispute.

If upon any religious occasions, ridicule seems to be allowable, it must be with regard to such opinions, as are evidently erroneous; such especially as are so big with absurdities, and so contradictory to common sense, that it seems below the dignity of reason to undertake the refutation of them. And yet of what service can it be even in this case? Whatever gave birth to such monsters, it is plain that strong prejudice alone keeps them alive; which even impresses on them a sacred character. To endeavour to laugh men out of such prejudices, is to confine them the more in them; as their conversion is never likely to be brought about by such means as must inspire them with horror. Rather let kindness and persuasion remove the prejudice, and then the error will be dispelled of course.

Neither is ridicule at all fit to be trusted as proper to promote the practice of religion and virtue, by endeavouring to put vice and immorality out of countenance. These, I fear, are not of so modest a nature as to be capable of blushing; and if arguments of a more sublime kind, and such as are drawn from nobler motives, will not prevail against them, they are not to be vanquished by being laughed at. The obligation we are under to conform to the will of God, which is the foundation of duty; the essential and eternal differences of things, which constitute virtue and vice; the conformity of the one, and the disagreement of the other, to our nature; and the improvement or debasement of it consequent upon our different choice of acting; are the true motives to influence and determine a rational creature. The love of God to mankind, and his abhorrence of wickedness, exhibited in the mystery of our redemption; the precepts, the example, and the sufferings of our blessed Lord and Master; the life and immortality which he has revealed; the gracious promises of the gospel to allure men to goodness; and the dreadful judgments denounced against the obstinately profane; are still more forcible motives to persuade and to animate a Christian. If men's minds are steeled against receiving any impression from such topics as these, it is even a kind of presumption to expect it from ridicule; which besides we are not authorised to make use of, either by revelation or by reason. It was not the practice of Christ and his apostles to make a jest of men's vices; but they discountenanced all such behaviour, as much as might be, both by their doctrine and by their examples. Even Solomon himself, who insists so much upon the folly of wickedness, does not treat it ludicrously as for his diversion, but speaks of it as a folly more apt to move melancholy than mirth, even as the folly of foolishness and madness. And reason itself may likewise inform us, that nothing is so likely to lessen the natural veneration and awe in men, with which the consideration of religious matters is attended, and upon which in a great measure depends the good effect they are likely to produce in the mind, as a light and ludicrous treatment of them. Men will be apt to think that things cannot be of any mighty consequence, which even those who recommend them make so free withal themselves; and that neither danger nor death is at hand, where those that denounce them are themselves in sport.

Is ridicule then of no real use at all? and is it absolutely to be banished out of the world? To assert this would seem too severe perhaps to those, who think they have a talent for it. But so long as it is left in full possession of every folly, of every absurdity and extravagance in life; in short, of all things that are blemishes in human conduct, rather than vices, the advocates for it will have no reason to complain that it will ever want employment. And though I have been labouring to exclude it from all concerns in religion, even where it offers its assistance and friendship, yet I have not done it by representing it in this last case as a thing criminal, so much as imprudent to admit of it: neither do I accuse those who are for enlisting it in the service of religion of any treacherous designs, but have only offered my reasons why I disapprove of their judgment.

And if from the foregoing considerations it shall appear, that ridicule is not even fit to be allowed of in the support of religion, how strong must be the conclusion, that it never should be employed to the destruction of it? If it stands in need of excuse even in a good man and in a good cause, how utterly unpardonable must it be, when used by bad men to bad purposes? For it is not to be expected that the pleasantry of wickedness should take away the malignity of it, or that wit should atone for sin. And yet that there is a daring tribe of men, that declare open war with it against every thing that is sacred, it is now time to shew under my second general head, where I am,

II. To observe, how those who pretend most to this talent of ridicule do in reality employ it, and to expostulate with them a little upon their conduct.

The first sort of men that fall under our notice, are those who shoot out their arrows against all religion in general; who have no just notions of God and his attribute; deny or disregard his providence; confound all distinctions of moral good and evil; and have no sense at all of the dignity of human nature. These having, as they call it, enlarged their thoughts, and being under no manner of restraint from principles, look down with pity and contempt upon those who are still shackled with them, and have not thrown off all regard to reason and conscience. How do these men of unlimited freedom make diversion with slaves who own themselves to be under inspection, and accountable for their actions! It is matter to them of endless derision, that we, who are but a better kind of brutes, should pay such homage to virtue, as to renounce the pleasures of the world, and often subject ourselves to present cares and inconveniences, for the sake of it, when all that we can propose to ourselves is a precarious expectancy in reversion; much more, when this idol Virtue that we fall down before, is nothing but a phantom, the creature of our own foolish imaginations; or at best depends only upon custom, and the arbitrary constitution of human laws. And, accordingly, there is not a single moral virtue, which they would not banter out of the world, by miscalling it by some reproachful name. If we shew zeal for the honour of God, they will mock at our enthusiasm; if we worship and fear him, at our superstition. Whatever generous things have been done for the welfare of mankind, will meet with no better a name than that of folly, or vanity, or design; and all private goodness will be exposed by them as grimace, hypocrisy, and preciseness. In a word, Whatever things are true, and honest, and just, and pure, and lovely, and of good report, if there be any virtue, if there be any praise; these things they make the constant subject of their mockery and abuse, ridicule and railery. On the contrary, whatever things are profane, and impure, and vile, and dishonourable, these things they are industrious to represent as harmless and indifferent, and to laugh men out of their natural shame and abhorrence of them; nay, even to recommend them with their utmost wit.

If these men could be supposed capable of sober reflection, I would expostulate with them in the following manner: What (in the name of all that's sacred!) is there ridiculous in the belief of a supreme, infinite, intelligent Mind, the Creator and Governor of the universe? Is it not most absurd and foolish to suppose the contrary, if we will but reflect upon the vastness and regularity and exactness of this beautiful system? And may not the surprising harmony continually preserved in all the parts of it, very reasonably persuade us, that the great Author of it still holds it together by his providence, keeping it uniformly in subjection to the laws he at first prescribed? What is there ludicrous in supposing also this being to be just, and holy and good, and therefore the same God of order in the moral world as he is in the natural? That for that reason, he created man with an excellent understanding to discern good from evil; and with freedom of will, to make him capable, according to his behaviour, of reward or punishment? Can it excite any but the laughter of fools, when we place the excellency of man's nature in his rational faculties, and the justness of his conduct in the regulation of it by reason: What folly is there in submitting ourselves to that which was given us for our guide and instructor? Or how can we find any thing ridiculous in those actions, which our governing principle not only approves of but commands? Is there any thing weak or extravagant in the reverence and love of God, in such a mission to his government, in celebrating his perfections, and acknowledging his constant dependence upon him? Justice and probity, as the trodden become a grity and benevolence towards us, the scoffer? likewise nothing in them that such are delight become a the scoffer?
ation of such

to be laughed at; but, on the contrary, both from the reasonableness and the usefulness of them are truly valuable. Temperance, sobriety, and chastity, though they are common subjects of derision, are upon every account to be embraced, and have at all times been held in esteem by men of sense and worth. In short, there is not in any principle of natural religion, nor in any duty it recommends, any thing wild or absurd, or fantastical or trifling; nothing, on the contrary, but what is highly rational, important, sacred. How great then is the folly and madness and impiety of those, who thus wantonly shoot arrows against Heaven, that must return upon their own heads; and who scatter fire-brands and death among men, and say are we not in sport? Too much, it is to be feared, does the world abound even with this sort of men: but the other class that falls under our censure is perhaps yet more numerous; which consists of those Who would be thought to be convinced of the obligation, and to allow of the duties of natural religion, but are declared enemies to all revealed, and ridicule the belief of it upon every occasion with all the malice of wit. Now considering the great antiquity that revelation lays claim to, which in some instances, to give a probable account of things, must have been coeval with mankind itself; together with the general belief of it, which, however impaired, has prevailed more or less in almost all places and ages; even this alone should screen it from any insolent abuse of those who disbelieve it themselves; and considering that Christianity itself pleads a prescription of seventeen hundred years, and is at this time the established religion of our own country, it ought at least by those who suspect the grounds of it, to be examined with candour, and to be proceeded against with discretion and gentleness. For there is a decent regard due to the religion of a country, though it shall prove an erroneous

To laugh at the public upon any point, is to be wanting in that respect is due to common society; much is the insolence when private nature to deride those things which are the object of public veneration. Whoever, therefore, instead of refuting errors by reason and temper, will treat in a contemptuous manner what carries with it to others a sacred character, can only give scandal where he should endeavour at a reformation, and must shew himself to be equally a stranger to good sense and to good manners. And yet this is the favourite method of infidelity. Ridicule is the vein that runs through the writings, and what seasons the conversation of the unbelievers of the age. And then as much triumph arises from having flung a bold jest at Christianity, as if they had actually overthrown it by mere dint of reasoning. The ancient enemies of it were no strangers to this practice; and the arts of those have been revived and improved too in these latter days. The grossest misrepresentations have received an edge from ridicule, in order to make our religion despised, that it might finally be rejected of men. In order to this, has not the necessity, nay expediency, of Christianity been scoffed at as a jest? Have not the strong evidence and testimonies by which it is supported, all in their turn, been the subject of much drollery and licentious mirth? Has not almost every particular doctrine of it been attacked in the most scurrilous manner; and the sacred pages, which contain those doctrines, been derided, vilified, exploded; and perverted by ludicrous quotations to every profane and impious purpose? And the better to complete their design, have not those who, by Christ's own institution, are more particularly appointed to teach and to defend his religion, been the standing mark at which they incessantly shoot their sharpest arrows, even bitter words? And has not their satire against them been generally of that kind, which is of all others the most scurrilous and illiberal?

I must here again beg leave to renew my expostulation, and to inquire a little into the justifiableness of such proceedings.

With regard to the foundation of Christianity, I would ask of them, whether there is any thing ridiculous in supposing (what cannot well be denied) that all mankind had transgressed the original law of God, whether it was natural only, or also revealed; and that they had consequently involved themselves in the guilt of sin: that God is a being infinite in justice as well as mercy; and that, according to our conceptions, it is as much the property of the one, before a reconciliation with offenders, to insist upon some atonement, as it is a token of the other, graciously to accept it: that his purity would likewise incline him to stigmatize wickedness with the most flagrant marks of his displeasure, that righteousness might be the more effectually established: that accordingly he sent his only begotten Son into the world, to take human nature upon him; and in that to be a sacrifice and propitiation for the sins of the whole world: that by any extraordinary revelation, (communicated at a time when ignorance and vice had almost universally overspread the face of the earth, and when the footsteps of religion could only be traced in the ruins that superstition had wrought,) he taught mankind their duty in a more perfect and explicit manner, than it had ever been known before; that he fenced in his laws with the most proper sanctions, and promised us such assistance for the fulfilling of them, concurrent with our own endeavours, as the mere natural man must want, both as an encouragement and as a support. This is but an imperfect sketch of the Christian scheme; but enough to discover that there is much in it to excite our adoration of the divine goodness, but nothing to create our mirth.

With regard to the external evidence of this religion, I would ask, whether (beside the concurrence of other testimony) the completion of many prophecies that went before concerning Christ, and the miracles which he himself wrought, are not a sufficient attestation of the truth of it? As this is too clear a point to be denied, allowing their authority, I would ask concerning the prophecies, whether in answer to all the cavils brought against this kind of proof, it has not been undeniably shewn by the labours of the learned, that they are truly of the date they pretend to; that the interpretations of them are consistent and warrantable;

and that the Jews, to whom they were more immediately directed, did all along apply them to the Messiah, although they must know that some of them had likewise a view to other events: and whether they were not all in general fulfilled by Jesus Christ so minutely, as they never were nor could be by any body else? And in relation to the miracles of our Saviour, which have been bantered as illusions, or what is even less than that, as mere allegories; it may likewise be demanded, whether they have not in general been proved to carry in them all the genuine marks that it is possible for any true miracle to have, and whether every one in particular has not been clearly vindicated from the imputation of some imaginary incongruities with which they have been unreasonably charged? If the opposers of Christianity, upon account of its evidence, have not seriously taken into consideration the arguments that have been brought in support of it, it would be decent in them to suspend their wit till they have better informed their judgment; and if they have, they should confute before they ridicule.

If we proceed to examine into the intrinsic value of our religion, are the doctrines of it a proper subject of derision, which are beyond dispute a better system of morality, than is to be collected from the wisdom of philosophy scattered through all the writings of the world beside? And if there are some few more speculative ones (which may have their moral uses too) relating to the divine essence, and to the work of man's redemption, which may be attended with some difficulties inexplicable by human understanding, are they therefore to be rejected with mockery; because the whole mystery of God's wonderful dispensations is not laid open to our view; or because we cannot comprehend the manner of an infinite existence, though we are absolute strangers to that of our own? Or is it fit that the sacred books themselves, the repository of these doctrines, which are the refuge, the consolation, and the delight, of every good man, should be trodden under foot and vilified, and become a bye-word to the profane and the scoffer? Or is it a sufficient justification of such usage, because men will venture rashly to pronounce upon them, without any one requisite qualification; or because some particular expressions and passages in them, occasioned by the peculiarities of the language, or of the manners and customs of a remote age, give offence to those, whose extent of knowledge reaches only to modern notions and practices? Or, lastly, is it at all becoming, that those who by the appointment of Christ himself are the guardians and teachers of his doctrines, should upon that very account alone, be exposed to ridicule and mockery, to scurrility and abuse? But if that which ought to raise their character tends only to depreciate it, and if the scoffers are resolved to despise all men in their hearts, that have any peculiar relation to the religion of Christ; yet other considerations should induce them to be more decent in their behaviour, and to put some restraint upon their tongues. Some motive to this it should be to reflect, that the clergy are under the common protection of the same civil government with themselves, and have therefore a title to common civility, even by virtue of the laws of their country: that they are men of a liberal education, that they may be duly qualified for, and are sequestered from every inconsistent employment, that they may without interruption attend upon the services of religion: that it is by no means matter of just offence, that some also amongst them, should by their station and authority have a proper influence to guard the interests of it: that they do in general discharge their duty conscientiously and well; teaching the religion of Christ in its primitive purity; defending it by their learning, of which perhaps no body of men in the world has a larger share, and adorning it by the integrity of their lives; that where some are ignorant or vicious, the reproach should fall upon the persons culpable, and not upon the order; but that they rather should be counted worthy of double honour, who have maintained the dignity of their character, and preserved it without spot or blemish. But this practice, however reasonable in itself, is not to be expected from the scoffers: for as decency is nearly allied to virtue, we shall find the enemies of the one to be generally as much strangers to the other. Leaving them therefore to their own conduct,

III. It remains only, in the last place, to recommend briefly some means of best securing our religion and ourselves against the attacks that may come from this quarter.

1. The first thing necessary for this purpose, is a thorough knowledge of the grounds and principles of our religion. When we know the reason of the hope that is in us, it then becomes an anchor of the soul both sure and steadfast; which will hinder us from fluctuating amidst a diversity of unsettled opinions, and will keep us firm and immoveable against all the overflowings of infidelity: conviction arising from an insight to truth, will inspire us in every conflict, and will be a defence to us against the craft of sophistry and the sting of ridicule. Secure in the strength of a rational belief, the enemy can have no advantage over us, nor the wicked approach to hurt us. But if we profess to teach a religion that we have only taken upon trust, as our notions concerning it will be erroneous, so our instructions will misrepresent it, and our defences betray it. An injurious exposition, or an injudicious vindication, will run the best of causes, and lay the author of them open to certain mockery and contempt. How careful therefore should we be to furnish ourselves by proper application, with all necessary and useful knowledge for the service of religion, lest peradventure we be found to fight against God, even out of a zeal for his honour!

2. The second thing requisite for our security in the case before mentioned, is courage and constancy in our persuasion; or, in the apostle's phrase, boldness in the faith. Our first business should be, to be well acquainted with the truth, the next to hold it fast. If we cannot withstand a little banter and ridicule when we have Christ himself on our side, how scandalous must be our retreat, and how vigorously must we expect the advantage to be pursued! We give a satirical enemy great opportunities of triumph, when we give ground ever so little through fear, irresolution, or shame. And well may the great Captain of our Salvation disown such service as withdraws itself upon being laughed at only, when he insists upon the fidelity of it, even in the fiery trial of persecution. Hear, and tremble at the consequence of such a base desertion: Whoever shall be ashamed of me and of my words in this adulterous and sinful generation, of him also shall the Son of Man be ashamed, when he cometh in the glory of his Father with the holy angels. (Mark, viii. 38.) But if we have boldness in him, we shall find it to be our security here, as well as our confidence (when we most shall want it) in the day of judgment.

3. A third thing which may be a defence to us against the scoffers, is that truly christian temper, a spirit of meekness. For a resolution to defend our religion, and an inoffensive manner of doing it, are by no means inconsistent. This behaviour is not only in itself becoming, but it is enjoined us. It is our Saviour's own express command, learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart (Matt. xi. 29.) and it is part of his character, that when he was reviled he reviled not again. The religion of Christ will allow of no arts in its defence or recommendation, that are not perfectly conformable to its rules. And this conduct may be particularly useful in blunting those arrows that are directed against ourselves; as skilful contenders will oft-times best elude the force of a blow, by not bearing up too rashly against it, and yet at the same time can resolutely maintain their ground. This, likewise, is the most probable method of disarming our adversaries themselves, who must, by this means, if by any, be won over to a decent behaviour, when they see that all their calumny and spite and abuse cannot provoke us to a return of ill usage; but that our only aim is, by all gentle arguments of persuasion, to reduce them from error to the acknowledgment of the truth. It is, in short, the duty of a Christian, not to be overcome of evil; and it is no less his duty, to overcome evil with good.

4. The last thing I shall mention, necessary for the security of our religion, and of ourselves, against the scoffers, is holiness of life. As unreasonable a thing as it is, to make Christianity accountable for that wickedness which it utterly condemns, yet we may observe, that the deepest and most incurable wounds are given it through those who dishonour it more by professing, than they could injure by denying it. Truth, however bright in itself, may yet be obscured, and lose much of its native splendour in the eyes of men, by the foulness of the medium through which it is viewed. Such will be the influence of the life of a wicked Christian, who is both a scandal to himself, and a reproach to his profession. But a virtuous and holy conversation is the ornament and defence of both. It renders religion graceful and amiable to mankind; and esteem and affection arising from thence, will best guard it from every abuse. But, if it should at any time fall under contempt and ridicule, yet an exemplary Christian will be able to reply with a good grace to the scorner, when his own life is a vindication of his cause, not his cause, as it too often happens, a condemnation of himself. And what better support against particular abuse can a good man wish for, than a consciousness of sharing the same fate with religion itself? or can he be dismayed in suffering for the sake of it, when that also bears a part with him in the unjust reproach that he sustains? A religious man must be ill-treated by an irreligious world; but let this be his confidence, that the scene will soon be changed. Honour, and glory, and immortality, will be his portion, while insupportable shame and confusion shall overwhelm the scoffers. For then shall the righteous man stand in great boldness before the face of such as have afflicted him, and made no account of his labours. When they see it, they shall be troubled with terrible fear, and shall be amazed at the strangeness of his salvation, so far beyond all that they looked for. And they repenting and groaning for anguish of spirit, shall say within themselves, this was he, whom we had sometimes in derision, and a proverb of reproach. We fools counted his life madness, and his end to be without honour: how is he numbered with the children of God, and his lot is among the saints! (Wisd. v. 1—5.)

By Dr. TOTTIE.

The pernicious Effects of an intemperate Indulgence in sensual Pleasures.

[Preached before the University of Oxford, at St. Mary's, March 13, 1717 3.]

2 TIM. iii. 4.

Lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God.

THE lovers of pleasures here mentioned by the Apostle are, as the original word properly imports, the lovers of sensual pleasures: and they are described as inordinate lovers of them; as men addicted to voluptuousness beyond a sense of duty, or the restraint of reason and religion. And, doubtless, this is designed to be represented to us as a denomination of great malignity, because it is ranked with a long train of the most enormous and profligate sinners, such as, we are told at the first verse of this chapter, were to be the characteristic and disgrace of the last days, when perilous times should come. Without inquiring how far these dangerous days began to discover themselves even in the apostolic age, let it suffice, that we ourselves are certainly within the period of time here described: and whatever may be our proportion of other guilt, so far as an avowed attachment to pleasures is destructive of the principles, and inconsistent with the regular duties of religion, and is an inlet to vice and disorder, so far perilous times are come. For, to be lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God and our duty, is one of the apparent distinctions of this age: a character so familiar to us, that it seems to have lost its natural deformity, and is rather looked upon with complacency than abhorrence. But opinion does not alter the reality of things: a life of dissoluteness cannot be innocent: and it will ever remain a most certain truth, that an irregular indulgence in sensual pleasures is that, which, above all things, debases human nature, and ever has been, and must be, the bane of human happiness.

Can we therefore employ our time more usefully, than in endeavouring to rescue ourselves from the enchantment of such delusive, but unmanly and pernicious pleasures? Can I apply to you for this purpose in a more interesting manner, than by laying before you the fatal mischiefs of sensuality, by considering particularly, what devastation it makes in every constitution that is under the dominion of it, from the lowest stage of the animal life, to the highest powers and graces of the intellectual and the spiritual one? And although some of the following remarks may seem rather to belong to an abandoned prostitution, than to the lesser proficiencies in voluptuousness, yet they will be often found to be proportionably just in respect of the latter: or may serve, at least, as a friendly caution to those who are making gradual advances in vices of this kind, without reflecting upon their deceitful, insinuating, and encroaching nature.

We will then consider man, in the first place, as a creature endued with animal life, and furnished with all those sensations and appetites which are its necessary appendages. And here, before we proceed, it may be proper to observe, that, as they are born with us into the world, and are an essential part of our constitution, an imagination that the perfection of our being, in its present state, consists in I know not what annihilation and extirpation of them, is mere enthusiasm, as contrary to the sentiments of reason as of nature. This degree of perfection we cannot attain to, until this corruptible shall have put on incorruption. If, in the degenerate condition of humanity, they are too apt to be licentious and inordinate, all that is expected from our strength and discretion, is to watch over them with care, to direct them to their proper objects, and to govern them with a prudent restraint; lest our natural desires should grow impetuous and headstrong, and run wild into sinful concupiscence. Let it be further remarked, that, when concupiscence itself is said to have the nature of sin, it is because it is an irregular tendency of the appetites, either desiring that which is not lawful, or pursuing that which is so beyond the limits of reason and duty. Otherwise, the desires are natural, and therefore not criminal, and the gratification of them must be innocent, because it is necessary. We are placed by Providence in this world not only under a necessity of satisfying them for the support of life, but with a gracious permission to gratify them with some degree of indulgence beyond strict necessity, for the comfort and well-being of it. This would not have been the case, had there been no possibility for us to have satisfied our appetites with innocence. They are not, therefore, absolutely, and in their own nature, sinful; but they are too apt to be the occasions and incitements to sin. Even good men may fall into their snare, through frailty or inadvertency; and, in this case, they cannot but feel and lament, as they will be allowed to offer in plea at the great tribunal, the infirmities of human nature. But as for those who submit to their dominion without reluctance, and joyfully obey the call of every vicious inclination, let them not vainly impute that guilt to an original depravity, which is an acquired corruption; nor charge those miseries to the account of nature, which are strictly and properly their own.

And here, indeed, it is, in the early prevalence of education and habit, that our infelicity begins. For, were we accustomed from the beginning to live according to nature, we should find the appetites in themselves, reasonable and modest; asking little, satisfied with little; but, like favourite children, they are soon corrupted by indulgence, and being trained up in the school of luxury, they find many wants which are not natural to them: being accustomed to be humoured, they become restless and importunate, and grow upon us in their demands by every compliance. It is evident, therefore, that every unreasonable gratification is only raising a new desire, and, whilst it seems to appease the appetites, irritates them the more. Could we, therefore, lay an early restraint upon them, and learn to gratify them no farther than God and nature allow, it would be the way to avoid much trouble and disquietude; we should be less solicited, and they would be more contented.

Add to this, that, when they have thus gained strength and vigour, and their wants multiply upon them through indulgence, then they soon grow wanton and fantastical; are roving from pleasure to pleasure; tired with the present enjoyment, and eagerly exploring and pursuing fresh objects of delight: so that we are in a state of perpetual agitation and uneasiness, not only from the violence of our desires, but from the frowardness and inconstancy of their humour. And what is still more, and cannot but necessarily happen, we must feel in proportion to the cravings of our irregular appetites, impatience and fretfulness from difficulties and delays, and vexation from frequent disappointments. Such are the disagreeable sensations that embitter the life of a voluptuary, and multiply with the increase of his pleasures.

As the scene opens upon us, it grows far more distressful. The appetites have been long indulged, they have the mastery, they have now the reins in their hands, and are hastening to put a final period to all the pleasurable sensations of their votaries, even by such means as must be continually extinguishing and deadening the very sensation itself. For an unwearied application to pleasures satiates and surfeits, rather than satisfies; it weakens the tone of the animal powers, and wears them gradually into disrelish, and perhaps into disuse, even before the course of nature brings on the years, when thou shalt say, I have no pleasure in them. Enjoyments of this kind must be destructive of themselves, because they impair and destroy that quickness of the faculties, and that health of constitution upon which their very nature depends. When the senses themselves grow dull, and wear away, the pleasures of them must of necessity be languid. And yet such is the peculiar infatuation of the voluptuous man, and, what would be utterly incredible, did not every day's observation confirm the truth of it in many a fatal instance, so absolute is their dominion, so strong is their enchantment, that though they chastise him with pain and diseases, and bring on the daily decay of health and strength, with trembling nerves and faltering steps, he crawls on in the same slippery path, till he falls and drops into the grave.

For the truth of the foregoing observations, we may appeal to experience. Inquire of those who have led a life of pleasure, as it is falsely called, whether, in respect of self-enjoyment, it be indeed preferable to a life of temperance and regularity. Ask the sensualist, who says, there is nothing better for a man than that he should eat and drink, and whose happiness depends upon the unwilling returns of a jaded appetite, whether that compound of high and delicate meats which luxury improved into an art can supply, be not an offence to the stomach, a load to the constitution, and poison to the health. Whereas the man that is not surfeited with intemperance finds an enjoyment in his frugal repasts which artifice cannot give; he has no loathings of the appetite, no oppression of spirits; his sleep is sweet; he eats the labour of his hands, and finds that the bread of industry and temperance is far more delicious than the dainties of indolent luxury. Or those that sit long at the wine, what real pleasure do they find in that nausea and sickness, that relaxation and feebleness of body, which excess never fails to create? Look not thou upon the wine when it is red, says the Wise Man, when it giveth his colour in the cup, when it moveth itself aright: at the last, it biteeth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder. (Prov. xxiii. 31.) Ask the bludinous man; nay, rather, does not his very appearance declare, that lawless pleasures are dearly bought; and that he has reason, in the bitterness of his soul, to curse those impurities which prey upon the constitution, and are rottenness to the bones; which make youth decrepid, and hasten on an early and unnatural old age? It is difficult to mention this vice, and the foul train of miseries that attend it, in a decent and inoffensive manner: let me therefore close this branch of my discourse in the words of high and sacred authority, that will command your reverence and awe: I beheld, says Solomon, among the simple ones, I discerned among the youths, a young man void of understanding. And behold! there met him a woman with the attire of an harlot, and subtle of heart. With her much fair speech she caused him to yield; with the flattering of her lips she forced him. He goeth after her straightway, as an ox goeth to the slaughter, or as a fool to the correction of the stocks: till a dart strike through his liver, as a bird hasteth to the snare, and knoweth not that it is for his life. (Prov. vii. 7, 9, 21, 22, 23.) Remove thy way, therefore, far from a strange woman, and come not nigh the door of her house; lest thou mourn at the last, when thy flesh and thy body are consumed, and say, how have I hated instruction, and despised reproof? (Prov. v. 8, 11, 12.)

I have been hitherto speaking to the sensualist as a creature possessed of animal life, and furnished with those appetites which are its necessary appendages; and have shewn the expediency of his putting a curb and restraint upon them, while possibly they may bear it, even upon his own principles, for the sake of preserving that very nature upon which all his pleasurable sensations depend. But he must likewise consider himself, however unwilling he may seem to do so, as a being of a much higher order, as one endued with the superior power of reason and understanding. Let our next inquiry, therefore, be, in what manner an intemperate pursuit of sensual pleasures must affect the intellectual part of us, which raises us far above the brutal life, even to a participation of the angelic nature.

And here the first consideration that offers itself arises, in some measure, from the foregoing ones, and results from that union of our souls and bodies, by which, in our present state, they mutually act upon each other, and sympathize in each other's affections. Hence, as any violent or continued disorder in the mind introduces a languid indisposition in our bodily frame, so the infirmities of the body do reciprocally enfeeble and dispirit the mind. If, therefore, an insidious application to sensual pleasures does certainly impair our bodily health and strength, it will proportionably waste the health and strength of the mind: it is not possible, where incontinence, riot, and luxury, have enervated the constitution, the soul should still retain its vigour, or have elasticity enough to exert itself in speculation or action. View but the man of pleasures, after a few years spent in the pursuit of them, and behold! frequently, in the end, what insupportable dejection, what gloominess and horrors overshadow and sit heavy on his soul!

But this is not all: sensual pleasures are hurtful to the mind other ways than by depressing it; and the mischief they do is often felt in the intellectual faculties, even before it is derived from the constitution. They shut out, in the first place, the necessary supplies of knowledge, which is the food and nourishment of the understanding, and without which it cannot grow up to its full proportion and maturity. For an advancement in knowledge supposes discipline, application, assiduity, labour; exercises which are directly opposite to the whole scope and system of the man of pleasures, who cannot well be thought to have either leisure or inclination for such painful employments: for painful they must be to those who can have little taste or relish for the pleasures of the understanding, which are of a quite different and superior kind to those of sense, and to which it must seem against nature for them to rise, who wallow in the mire, and are entangled in sensuality. By this means, through the want of cultivation and improvement the intellectuals lose their ability, and grow unserviceable by too little use, as the senses decay and are worn out by too much.

Add to this, that sensual pleasures are directly injurious to the very essence of the mind, and maim it in all its faculties; so as to frustrate, in a great measure, any degree of application, could we be supposed to make use of it. It is with the constitution of the mind as of the body, no strength of it can withstand the repeated assaults of intemperance and excess. They spread a torpor, as it were, over the rational soul, and render it impotent in all its functions. The ferment of wine, and the fire of lust, raise an impure vapour in the brain, which overclouds and darkens the understanding. The imagination, that admirable faculty, whose proper employment it is to bring into our view all the wonderful and beautiful scenes of the creation, is no longer the handmaid of reason, but the creature of our appetites. This fair mirror is blotted over with the traces of foul desire, and every avenue is shut up against the admission of any object that might polish and refine it. Invention cannot expatiate, because it cannot break loose from those earthly, sensual incumbrances which oppress it. The memory becomes impaired; nor would it be any great misforture, should it be entirely obliterated, since it is at best but the storehouse of sensuality and impurity; nor has contemplation laid up there any treasures that can deserve a review. No time has been employed in the exercise of thought and reflection; whence arises not only an impatience, but an inability of thinking. In short, the rational part of the voluptuous man is incorporated, as it were, into the animal one; all his thoughts are the thoughts of his heart, and are like that, sensual and polluted; prompted, directed, and circumscribed, by the appetites. This is by no means an imaginary representation; on the contrary, they are the observations of common experience: for how often have we seen and lamented, that the brightest natural parts have fallen a victim to pleasures, having been devoted to their service and command, till they have been gradually worn away, and have been utterly stupified and lost?

Here doubtless the libertine will be ready, with an air of triumph, to ask, where else is to be found that gaiety and sprightliness, that flow of mirth, and those sallies of wit, which enliven the conversation of the men of pleasure, beyond all that temperance and sobriety can pretend to? Does this argue the want or decay of parts; is it not rather a proof of their energy and vivacity? Be it so. But, alas! all this boasted fire is, in the scripture language, like the crackling of thorns under a pot (Eccles. vii. 6.); so long as the fuel continues to be supplied, it may raise violent ebullitions; it may give a glaring light: but it is all the while raging, noisy, and self-consuming; it is a flame that is rather scorching than refreshing; and how soon is it extinguished, and leaves no remains but ashes! To quit the metaphor—This liveliness of wit, as it is called, is seldom rational, or reconcilable to good sense or decency: it is not the offspring of the understanding; and the passions themselves must be either vitiated or inflamed to have a relish for it. For what is it after all, but either the extravagance and phrenzy of an over-heated fancy, or the offensive impurity of a debauched one? Is it the voice of that serene permanent joy which is in the dwellings of the righteous ; the companion of wisdom and virtue ? Can it exist but in the midst of laughter and folly ? Or will it bear the review of one moment's cool reflection ? And when the ravings of this fever-fit is over, does it not end in weariness, faintness and remorse ? So that, upon the whole, we have little reason either to envy or imitate the gayest and wittiest debaucheries of the men of pleasure ; though much it is to be feared, that some few pernicious examples in this kind have been the most prevailing inducements to unexperienced youth to run with an absurd emulation into the same excess of riot with themselves. But ought they not rather to be looked upon as so many lights to warn us of our danger, and prevent our splitting upon the rock, than to steer by in the course of life, if perchance there are some rare and illustrious instances of such uncommon talents, as a licentious and profligate life cannot easily get the better of ? It appears, they cannot indeed altogether extinguish them, they can only abuse and prostitute them ; prostitute those gifts which were bestowed upon them for the glory of God, and for the honour of human nature, even to the vilest purposes of obscenity, immorality, and profaneness. But is not this, in effect, the worst way of losing our understanding, thus infamously to degrade and disgrace it ?

This ascendancy of the appetites over our intellectual faculties generally brings on, sooner or later, the last and greatest injury they can receive, in the lowest and most scandalous prostitution of them ; namely, when all that remains of our reason is solely employed to cater for and pamper the appetites ; when it has lost all authority and rule, and is become the mere vile instrument of that blind impulse which it was born to govern, direct, and controul. Little do we deserve the name of reasonable creatures, when, by an unaccountable inversion of the order of nature, the appetites have at length, by continual encroachment, gained an absolute sovereignty, and the master is become the slave. Then when our reason is led captive of our lusts, no creature is less rational than man :

When the light which is in us is darkness, how great is that darkness ! Instead of order and harmony, and the peace of a regular self-government, the whole frame of our being is out of proportion, and what can be the effect of such anarchy but confusion, and every evil work ?

But this reflection suggests the latter part of my inquiry, namely, how an intemperate indulgence in sensual pleasures must affect a man in his moral and religious capacity.

I have already observed, that there may be an innocent and lawful, as well as an irregular and criminal gratification of the appetites ; and therefore, to assert with a stoical severity, that pleasure arising from the senses can have no possible intercourse or communion with the virtues, and that to think of introducing it as a companion to them, is tanquam meretricem in matronarum cœtum adducere (Cic. de Fin. lib. ii.), is neither serviceable to the cause of virtue, nor agreeable to reason and truth. On the contrary, the good providence of God has so disposed the general plan of this world, that, in order to subdue the natural desires to the interest of virtue, which has, in the ordinary appointment of things, the promise of this life, as well as that which is to come, men have never, upon the whole, so real and sincere an enjoyment of pleasures as when they are innocent. But then it must be allowed, that unless we use great circumspection, and are carefully upon our guard, they are extremely apt to become the baits and allurements to evil, and to seduce us gradually into a dissolute and irregular course of life, fatal to every moral virtue, and fruitful of almost every vice.

For when men, as in this case, become once habituated to take their estimate of good and evil from the mere animal sensations, (for vicious pleasures are as great corrupters of principles as of practice,) they have not in them the root and origin of virtue ; they have extinguished all moral taste, all relish of sublime and spiritual pleasures, without which it is impossible that any habit of virtue can fix itself in the soul. To become virtuous, we must find a pleasure in being so ; and every pleasure must have its faculty of perception suited and adapted to it; and we are no more capable of moral pleasures without a virtuous disposition, than of animal gratifications without the senses. Or could a principle of virtue be supposed to subsist in the sensualist, how could it exert itself in action, or what possible employment could it find there? For what is the chief business of virtue but to discipline, controul, and govern the appetites and the animal passions, to assuage the violence of their current, and to deduce and gently lead them in their proper channels? But is a moderation of desires, is the government of the appetites, to be found in men whose very profession it is to inflame them? What! shall we look for abstemiousness in the drunkard, or for continence in the adulterer?

We may go on to observe, that a voluptuous life is not only at variance with every act of personal conduct and self-government, but is likewise found to have little fellowship or alliance with any kind or degree of social virtue. There is as natural a connection between the several sorts of the vices as of the virtues; and the gradation is as easy from the one to the other; so that we need not wonder, if those that have indulged themselves in the vices of concupiscence, should soon make the rest familiar to them. They that cannot regulate their appetites, will be as little able to govern the passions that are excited and inflamed by them; and when these, in each other's aid and assistance, demand to be gratified, what opposite principle shall we seek for to counteract and repress their united force? Shall we expect to find in the voluptuary the kind beneficent sentiments of humanity? No. Self-indulgence centers in itself; hates all avocation from pleasures; turns away its face from the sight of misery, or hardens itself to behold it without sympathy: it is not grieved for the affliction of Joseph, but it can abundantly create the distress which it cannot feel. Does he possess the useful virtues of the generous neighbour, or the disinterested ones of the faithful friend? On the contrary, where do we find, that the man inflamed with wine, or transported with lust, is at all apt to consider whom he offends, or whom he injures; whose reputation he wounds, or whose peace he destroys; whose confidence he abuses, or whose innocence he betrays; what friendship he violates, or what enmities he creates? Nay, is he not frequently seen to break through the strongest ties, even of natural affection itself; for what degree of it can he be supposed to retain who abandons himself to vices which must certainly waste his fortune as well as his health, and too often entail upon his unhappy descendants infamy, poverty, and diseases? Or, in short, can he be in any respect a useful member of the community, when voluptuousness is so evidently destructive of all social happiness, as it eradicates all those virtues which are the support and strength of society, and ushers in all those vices which disorder, enfeeble, and, should they become epidemical, must dissolve it? For as industry and frugality are nursed by temperance, so a prostitution to pleasures engenders sloth and luxury, and must be fed by extravagance; and as that cannot long be supported by integrity and honesty, the great pillars of civil society will support itself by force and every act of injustice. From whence says St. James, come wars and fighting among you? Come then not hence, even of your lusts? (James, iv. 1.) And in the catalogue of the works of the flesh enumerated by St. Paul, to adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, succeed hatred, variance, emulation, wrath, strife, envyings, murders. (Gal. v. 19, 20, 21.) And who hath we? says the Wise Man, who hath sorrow? who hath contentions? who hath babbling? who hath wounds without cause? They that tarry long at the wine, they that go to seek mixt wine. (Prov. xxiii. 29, 30.)

Let us advance yet one step further, to see what ruin and desolation is made by an irregular indulgence in sensual pleasures in the highest attainment of man's nature, the Christian life. And if it has been made appear that such an indulgence does greatly enervate and corrupt the mind in its mere natural and moral state, how much more must it war against and wound the soul in its spiritual one? A voluptuous life is a variance with the very essence of the Christian institution, the great end and design of which was to rescue us from the dominion of our lusts, to spiritualize our affections, and to purify our nature by the means of grace, that we might be vessels of honour, sanctified and prepared for glory. It is the first engagement we enter into upon our admission into the Christian covenant by baptism, "that we renounce all carnal desires of the flesh, so that we will not follow nor be led by them." The external rite is the emblem of purity, and by the inward operation of it we are dedicated as holy unto God: Our bodies are the temples of the Holy Ghost, who cannot inhabit impurity and corruption. In consequence of this, the works of the flesh are constantly set in opposition to the works of the spirit; and the carnal mind is represented as enmity against God, for it is not subject to the law of God, nor indeed can be. (Rom. vii. 5.) For the flesh (says the same apostle) lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh; and these are contrary the one to the other. (Gal. v. 17.) So that there is no reconciling the profession of the spiritual religion of Christ with an indulgence in sensual lusts; as there is not a single Christian grace that can take root and grow in our hearts, unless they are first purified from all evil and corrupt affections, from every impure and inordinate desire: but, if a man purge himself from these, he shall be a vessel unto honour, sanctified and meet for the Master's use, and prepared for every good work. (3 Tim. ii. 21.) Prepared for the reception of every virtue and grace that can adorn the Christian in this life, and prepared for the exaltation and reward of them in a better. For indeed this purity of heart which our religion requires of us is no more than what is absolutely necessary to qualify us for heaven, and cannot be dispensed with from the very nature of the happiness that is there to be revealed. The kingdom of glory is a spiritual kingdom, and all the enjoyments of it are of a spiritual nature; and they who will be partakers of them must first endeavour to acquire a relish and savour of things spiritual, and must begin their preparations for heaven by cultivating those graces which they shall exercise hereafter, and by restraining those appetites which can meet with no gratification there. It is a notion to which the light of nature carried several of the more exalted heathens, and which many eminent Christian writers have thought not disagreeable to the revealed notices of a future state, that the vicious inclinations which the soul contracts in the body through habits of lust and sensuality, and their consequent train of vices, do insinuate themselves into the very substance of the soul, and adhere to it, like a leprosy, in its separate state. In this light it appears, that the sensualist cannot partake of the joys of heaven, not only through an exclusion from them by a moral decree, but through an inability to taste them from a natural incapacity; and that, with all his depraved appetites about him, he could have no sense of the pleasures of heaven were he placed there. But however that may be, this is certain—that he will never be put to the trial. Whether the inclinations themselves subsist in the soul or not, we know at least the guilt which they communicate will inseparably cleave to it for ever; and no pollution will ever be admitted into the presence of God, who is of purer eyes than to behold impurity: he placeth before his throne those only that are in the white robes of righteousness; but neither drunkards, nor adulterers, nor fornicators, nor unclean persons, can have any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God.

I have now gone through the several considerations I purposed to lay before you, in order to shew what fatal mischiefs and irretrievable ruin an intemperate pursuit of sensual pleasures brings upon the whole man, in every stage and condition of his being. And certainly they must have great weight with all that retain any sense of the dignity and perfection of human nature; that have any regard for their health and peace; for the regular enjoyment of their faculties; for the improvement of their understanding; for their increase in virtue; in short, that have any true relish for happiness in this world, or expectation of bliss in that which is to come. These indeed are considerations of general concern, and affect all orders and degrees of men and of Christians. But there is something so peculiar in the circumstances of a learned and religious education, and the topics of this discourse may be applied with such singular propriety and force to those who have the advantages of it, that I shall entreat your patience and attention a little longer, while I make this special application, which, I trust, may prove as useful as it is apposite.

From a thorough insight into human nature, with a watchful eye and kind attention to the vanity and intemperate heat of youth, with well-weighted measures for the advancement of all useful literature, and the continual support and increase of virtue and piety, have the wise and religious institutors of the rules of conduct and government in places of education, done all that human prudence could do to promote the most excellent and beneficial design, by the most rational and well-concerned means. They first laid the foundation well, in the discipline and regulation of the appetites. They put them under the restraint of wholesome and frugal rules, to place them out of the reach of intemperance, and to preclude an excess that would serve only to corrupt, inflame, and torment them. They are fed with food convenient for them; with simplicity yet sufficiency; with a kind though cautious hand. By this means the seeds of vice are stifled in their birth; young persons are here removed from temptations, to which others, from a less happy situation, are too frequently exposed; and by an early habit of temperance and self-command they may learn either to prevent all irregular solicitations, or with ease to control them. Happy are they, who by a thankful enjoyment of these advantages, and a willing compliance with these rules, lay up in store for the rest of their life virtue, health, and peace!

Vain indeed would be the expectation of any real progress in intellectual and moral improvements, were not the foundation thus laid in strict regularity and temperance; were the sensual appetites to be pampered in youth, or even vitiated with that degree of indulgence which an extravagant world may allow and call elegance, but in a place of education would be downright luxury. The taste of sensual pleasures must be checked and abated in them, that they may acquire a relish of the more sublime pleasures that result from reason and religion; that they may pursue them with effect, and enjoy them without avocation. And have they not in this place every motive, assistance, and encouragement, to engage them in a virtuous and moral life, and to animate them in the attainment of useful learning? What rank or condition of youth is there that has not daily and hourly opportunities of laying in supplies of knowledge and virtue, that will in every station of life be equally serviceable and ornamental to themselves, and beneficial to mankind?

And shall any one dare to convert this house of discipline and learning into a house of dissoluteness, extravagance, and riot? With what an aggravation of guilt do they load themselves, who at the same time that they are pursuing their own unhappiness, sacrilegiously break through all the fences of good order and government, and by their practice, seducement, and example, do what in them lies to introduce into these schools of frugality, sobriety, and temperance, all the mad vices and vanities of a licentious and voluptuous age? What have they to answer for, who, while they profligately squander away that most precious part of time, which is the only season of application and improvement, to their own irretrievable loss, encourage one another in an idle and sensual course of life, and by spreading wide the contagion, reflect a scandal upon, and strive to bring into public disrepute, the place of their education, where industry, literature, virtue, decency, and whatever else is praise-worthy, did for ages flourish and abound? Is this the genuine fruit of the pious care of our ancestors for the security and propagation of religion and good manners to the latest posterity? Is this at last the reward of their munificent or does this conduct correction for their views, or with the just expectations and demands of your friends at your country?

Nor let any one vainly imagine, that the time and valuable opportunities, which are now lost, can hereafter be recalled at will; or that he, who has run out his youthful days in dissipation and pleasure, will have it in his power to stop when he pleases, and make a wiser use of his riper years. Yet this is too generally the fallacious hope that flatters the youth in his sensual indulgences, and leads him insensibly on in the treacherous ways of vice, till it is now too late to return. There are few who at one plunge so totally immerse in pleasures as to drown at once all power of reason and conscience. They promise themselves that they can indulge their appetites to such a point only, and can check and turn them back when they have run their allotted race. I do not indeed say that there never have been persons in whom the strong ferment of youthful lusts may have happily subsided, and who may have brought forth fruits of amendment, and displayed many eminent virtues. God forbid! that even the most licentious vices of youth should be absolutely incorrigible. But I may venture to affirm, that the instances in this case have been so rare, that it is very dangerous for any one to trust to the experiment upon a presumption that he shall add to the number. The only sure way to make any proficiency in a virtuous life is to set out in it betimes. It is then, when our inclinations are trained upon the way that they should lead us, that custom soon makes the best habits the most agreeable; the ways of wisdom become the ways of pleasantness, and every step we advance they grow more easy and more delightful. But on the contrary, when vicious headstrong appetites are to be reclaimed, and inveterate habits to be corrected, what security can we give ourselves that we shall have either inclination, resolution, or power, to stop, and turn back, and recover the right way, from which we have so long and so widely wandered, and enter upon a new life, when perhaps our strength now faileth us, and we know not how near we may be to our journey's end?

These reflections I have suggested principally for the sake of those, who allowing themselves in greater indulgences than are consistent with a liberal and virtuous education, give evident proofs that they are not sufficiently aware of the dangerous encroachments and the peculiar deceitfulness of pleasurable sin. Happy for them! would they once seriously consider their ways; and no time can be more proper than when these solemn seasons of recollection and religious discipline should particularly dispose them to seriousness and thought. They would then discover, that though they are a while carried gently and supinely down the smooth stream of pleasure, yet soon the torrent will grow too violent to be stemmed; the waves will arise, and dash them upon rocks, or sink them in whirlpools. It is therefore the part of prudence to stop short while they may; and to divert their course into a different channel, which, whatever obstructions and difficulties they may labour with at first, will every day become more practicable and pleasing, and will assuredly carry them to a serene and secure haven. But if neither the apprehension of the dangers, anxieties, and miseries, that are the sure attendants upon vice and voluptuousness in this life, can awaken their fears; nor the assurance of that calm self-possession, that regular enjoyment of all the faculties of body and mind, that health, peace, and joy, which are the associates of temperance and virtue, can win upon their inclinations; then—Rejoice. O young man, in thy youth, and let thy heart cheer thee, in the days of thy youth, and walk in the ways of thy heart, and in the sight of thine eyes: but know thou, that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment. (Eccles. xi. 9.)

SERMON LXXII.

By Dr. TOTTIE.

The Excellency of the Christian Morality.

[Preached before the University of Oxford, at Christ Church, Nov. 15, 1761.]

PHIL. iv. 8.

Finally, brethren, whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report: if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things.

THE apostle has here given us in one view, a complete and beautiful system of the Christian morality. Such is the propriety and extent of the words he has made use of, as to express every essential virtue, and every ornamental grace. Not only the things that are true, and honest, and just, and pure, are recommended to us, but those likewise that are lovely and of good report. If there be any virtue—that we are to think upon and contemplate; to esteem and value it highly, and to fix it in our minds. But this, it seems, is not sufficient; we must go on to greater perfection; and if there be any praise; Si quid cum virtute conjunctum, et laudabile est, says Castalio upon the place: if there be any thing truly laudable, that is connected with virtue, and renders it amiable and graceful in the eyes of men—that likewise must be the object of our contemplation and pursuit.

In order to shew the extent and perfection of the Christian morals, I shall first inquire into the general nature of the virtues recited in my text:

And, secondly, I shall consider them under the advantages of that cultivation and improvement, which the apostle recommends.

Upon a critical view of the passage before us, we shall find that St. Paul first introduces to our notice the general principle of virtue; and then proceeds to a perfect and distinct enumeration of the several species of it, with that accu-which a careful and judicious reader may always discover in his writings. An examination into the sense of the words he makes use of, in the order in which they lie, will shew the justness of this remark.

First, then; whatsoever things are true, these we are to think upon, and implant in our minds, as the fixed principles of our conduct. Truth is the great foundation and test of morality. For which reason, we find in the most ancient writers, both sacred and profane, that it is a comprehensive name for the whole system of virtue; and a lie is often used as an equivalent term to vice. When the old heathen moralists would recommend a right and virtuous conduct, they advise men to pay the same regard to truth in actions as in words; to live a life of truth; to be no more guilty of a lie in practice than in conversation. And the scriptures speak the same kind of language. In them, the great Creator himself is styled the God of truth; and his law is the truth. The Saviour of the world, who came to teach men the perfect will of God, calls himself the truth and the life: his divine doctrine is, through the whole New Testament, called the truth as it is in Jesus; the word of truth; the way of truth; and truth itself. And, on the contrary, the wicked one, the original author of all evil principles and practices, is intitled the father of lies.

And there is a strict propriety in this kind of language. For all the moral virtues are of eternal truth and goodness, correspondent to the immutable nature and perfections of God, and invariable as the origin from which they are derived. And therefore it is certain, we may as well contradict the truth of things in practice, as deny it in speculation. Thus, for instance, if I neglect to pay any homage to God, and live in a presumptuous violation of his laws, is it not, in effect, to declare, that I, a dependent creature, owe him neither submission or obedience? which is absolutely false. If I refuse to acknowledge his mercies in the redemption of mankind by Christ Jesus, is it not the same thing as to say, that I wanted no assurance of pardon for my transgressions, no means of reconcilliation to my offended God; or that I had no need of an instructor or an assistant to lead me in the way of life? both which presumptions are undoubtedly contrary to truth: and as in these instances we disclaim the general principles of natural or revealed religion, so by every immoral action we contradict some particular truth. If I am guilty of injustice, I disallow the fixed maxim of equity, in not doing to others, what I would they should do to me. If I am ungrateful to my benefactor, I deny that kindness deserves a requital; and if I am intemperate and voluptuous, I plainly declare, that there is no occasion for the appetites to be under the controul and guidance of the superior faculty of reason. In short, whenever we deviate from virtue, we adopt some false principle or maxim, as the governing rule of our actions in that instance; whereas truth is the one invariable standard, to which we are obliged to conform, by making the course of our life and manners correspondent to the will of God; suitable to that state and order of things which he has constituted in nature; and agreeable to our own frame and situation, to the relation we bear, and the various obligations we are under, to other beings. Thus we see, that virtue in general consists in the conformity of our actions to truth; and that St. Paul has prescribed to us an universal rule of life, taking in the whole compass of our moral conduct, when he says, whatsoever things are true, think on these things.

But he thought it not sufficient to define virtue in its general nature only; to give us a more distinct idea of it, he proceeds to recount its several species by a perfect and exact enumeration. These are comprehended in the following expressions: whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure.

The term honest in this place, though you allow it the same force as the Latin honestum, is very far from reaching the sense of the original word σεμνος, which is rendered in the margin of our bibles, with much more propriety, venerable: nor does even this word, in our language, come up to the full meaning of the original, unless you include in it the notion of what is sacred, on account of its relation to God. The root, whose signification it retains, properly imports an act of religious worship. σεμνίον, a word of the same origin, signifies the holy place where religious mysteries were celebrated. And a few instances will serve to shew that this sense is by no means foreign to the derivative of my text. The author of the second book of Maccabees expresses by it the majesty and sanctity of the temple: he uses it likewise as descriptive of the sabbath, calling it the most sacred day: he gives it as an epithet to their venerable and holy laws: and he ascribes it to God, as an attribute of his most holy and glorious name. To the same sense it is applied by the primitive ecclesiastical writers. One instance among many may serve for an example. Clement of Alexandria, speaking of image worship, condemns the practice of it for this reason, because it infringes τὴν σεμνότητα τοῦ Θεοῦ; it is an encroachment upon the venerability of the Deity. From this use and sense of the original word, the precept of St. Paul will appear to have this meaning:—Whatsoever is truly reverend and sacred, whatsoever, as such, is the proper object of your veneration, think on these things.

Under this head therefore must, in a particular manner, be included all the duties we owe to God, all the offices of piety and religious worship. These necessarily arise from a contemplation of the adorable perfections of that infinite Being, who will for ever be the object of the highest degree of veneration to all rational creatures in the universe. A relative and subordinate veneration has likewise been paid in all ages and countries to every thing that has a connection with divine worship; for which reason, places and things dedicated to the service of God have always been esteemed sacred. οἱ διακόνες ὡσαύτως εἶναι σεμνοὺς: the ministers of the gospel are to remember, that they likewise have a sacred and reverend character to support. When we are called upon therefore to think upon whatsoever things are venerable, we are excited especially to form in our minds the most awful sentiments of the majesty of God, and not to be wanting in the homage and duty we owe to him, in veneration of what belongs to him, or in any expressions of reverence in the performance of our religious adoration.

The apostle having thus secured our regard to the first class of moral duties, namely, such as we owe to God, he proceeds next to recommend those that are due to men—Whatsoever things are just, think on these things.—By this expression he denotes the general principles of justice and equity; and the offices that flow from these are of great variety and extent. An exact and scrupulous regard to the rights of others, with a deliberate and fixed purpose to preserve them upon all occasions inviolate, wherein the essence of justice consists, secures the practice of the whole system of social virtues. For the rights of men exact from us whatever they have a just and reasonable claim to in their persons, properties, and characters. It is a very low and imperfect kind of justice, merely to abstain from injuries.

We must be active in the exercise of this virtue; as occasions and circumstances require, we must be just to the merits of men by commendation and favour; we must be just to their necessities by charitable relief; we must be just to their infirmities by candour and humanity. In short, the exercise of justice does not only exclude oppression and fraud, and the grosser kinds of iniquity, but it is inconsistent likewise with rigour and severity in the pursuit of our legal demands; with envious competitions, and undermining arts; with slander, detraction, and censoriousness; and with every thing that betrays a malevolent and ungenerous spirit. So that when St. Paul recommends to us whatsoever things are just, he recommends the practice of every virtue, that men can exercise towards each other, that has any tendency to establish or promote the welfare, regularity, or happiness of society.

The remaining branch of moral virtue produces such as regard ourselves; and these are contained in the expression, whatsoever things are pure. This word, perhaps, in its strict and primary sense, may be confined to the virtues of continence and chastity; but we may extend its signification farther, so as to import a strict abstinence from all such polluted pleasures as are contrary to temperance in general: from all irregular gratifications whatsoever of the sensual appetites. For all irrational and base indulgences of this kind spread a defilement and taint over the soul, by enslaving it to gross conceptions, and blotting it with the traces of foul desires, and by that means rendering it utterly incapable of refinement for any intellectual and spiritual employment. The scriptures always speak of them in such a manner, as to shew, that whatever is contrary to a life of temperance, sobriety, and chastity, is pollution. Sensuality of every kind turns the man into the brute: it destroys the purity and sanctity of the rational nature; it profanes the temple of the Holy Ghost, and actually disqualifies us from rising to that exalted state of happiness in heaven, where nothing that defileth can make its approach.

St. Paul having thus far recommended to us the contemplation and pursuit of virtue, first under the character of its general nature, and then in the accurate distribution of it into its three great branches of piety, justice, and temperance; he proceeds, in the next place, to carry our virtues to their greatest improvement and perfection, by prescribing to us the cultivation of every thing that has a connection with them, so as to render them amiable and reputable: Whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report—think on these things. As if he had said—Pursue virtue upon its right principle; admit nothing into your practice but what is consistent with truth: and follow this, where it leads you, through the comprehensive division of the duties you owe to God, to men, and to yourselves. But be careful, at the same time, that you discharge these duties in such a manner as to throw a light upon your good works, adding grace to your virtues, and making them, as much as possible, the object of imitation and praise.

This is by no means an unnecessary addition to virtue; as will plainly appear,

if we reflect upon the very different appearances it assumes from the manner in which it is practised. It is this which makes as great a distinction in moral behaviour as in civil; so that actions, founded on the same principle, shall in one view make virtue desirable and lovely, inviting the public regard; and in another, shall make it unamiable and distasteful, deterring men from the pursuit of it, and forbidding them to embrace it.

How venerable, for instance, is the appearance of rational and manly piety, manifesting the inward sentiments of the heart in the performance of religious adoration, by decent gesture, by a composed and serious deportment, by looks full of affiance, gratitude, and affection, where fervour is tempered with sobriety, and confidence with humility! Very different from this is the indolent and unanimated demeanour of some, and the enthusiastic air of others, who, though both may possibly have their thoughts fixed upon heaven, yet certainly they neither of them contribute to make the beauty of holiness apparent in the public worship of God, but rather deaden or distort the genuine features of piety, by neglecting or overstraining the forms of it.

The case is the same with respect to the social virtues, which are very ill recommended by a cynical moroseness, or a stoical inflexibility. In what a different light are liberality and generosity seen, when the manner of conferring the benefaction shall either double the kindness, or shall make the person obliged out of humour, and almost unthankful for the favour he receives? Sincerity scarce appears to be the same virtue, when it expresses itself with an unbecoming freedom or an unguarded bluntness of speech, regarding neither persons nor seasons; and when it maintains the same regard to truth, with a civility and decency in words and actions. In short, we always do an injury to virtue, when we do not clothe it in a becoming dress, and give it all the advantages and lustre it is capable of receiving. Nay, in truth, we take away from its very essence, and hinder every good action from being the res integra that it ought to be, whenever we suffer any thing heterogeneous or disagreeable to its nature to be mixed with it. No man therefore should be contented with himself as a real lover and practiser of virtue, unless he aims to excel in virtue; which he cannot do, unless he makes a good life a graceful one, and performs every right action in the best and most becoming manner.

Tully, in his Book of Offices, is very particular in his observations upon the honestum et decorum; for this reason, because there is no time or situation of life, which has not a correspondent duty belonging to it; nor is there a duty without a certain decency accompanying it, by which every virtue it is joined to will appear to be doubled. And he recommends the same harmonious exactness in the conduct of human life, as is required in musical compositions. In these, not only the grosser discords are avoided, but the least dissonance that would be offensive to the nicest ear. And therefore, says he, be careful to preserve the most minute accuracy and proportion in moral behaviour, as harmony in actions is much more excellent than in sounds.

The book of Proverbs and that of Ecclesiasticus abound with precepts and observations regarding these lesser moralities, as they have been called, but without which the greater ones cannot be complete. Rules of prudence and decorum are intermixed therein with those of the most essential duties; and wherever they are uniformly put in practice, the former will be a support and ornament to the latter, and will dignify and recommend the character of the moral and religious man.

Of the same kind likewise are those precepts of the New Testament, which require our behaviour to be such as becometh (or is ornamental to) godliness; which enjoins us to abstain from all appearance of evil—not to let our good be evil-spoken of—to have our conversation honest—and, to provide things honest (καλὰ, beautiful) in the sight of all men. These and such like passages plainly suppose, that even good actions may be performed in such a manner, as not only to lose that engaging lustre which should make them appear lovely, and entitle them to reputation and praise, but even so as to give offence. And the same decorum which must be observed, if we would give a beauty and perfection to our moral conduct, St. Paul likewise extends to our conversation; let your speech be always with grace, seasoned with salt. It is by this exactness of behaviour, governed by propriety and decency, as well as duty, that we obey the same apostle's command, in approving the things that are excellent, and in seeking to excel: and by this we adorn, as it becomes us to do, the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things; we arrive at that degree of Christian perfection required of us, as not only to be blameless and harmless, without rebuke, but to shine as lights in the world. For it is not enough for us to be innocent; we must likewise, be exemplary: and virtue can never effectually recommend itself to imitation, unless it is lovely and of good report.

Indeed many great things have been very truly said of the native beauty and intrinsic charms of virtue; but it is meant when they are properly displayed. For these certainly will appear to greater or less advantage, from the different light she is shewn in, and the dress that she wears. The more amiable and the fairer she is in her own genuine features and complexion, the more careful should we be to keep her clear from every blemish that will for that reason be the more visible, and will give the greater disgust. Certainly she loses much by a negligent and slovenly appearance; and she is disfigured by the trappings that affectation gives her; but it is no inconsiderable improvement that she receives from the neat and graceful attire she puts on, when decency is her handmaid.

Thus have I endeavoured to deduce from the words of my text the plan of Christian morality, which is constituted by the apostle upon the eternal and immutable foundation of truth; and is expanded by him into the various branches that produce the virtues of every different species in their full extent, and under all the advantages they are capable of receiving from every thing that has an alliance with virtue, that can make it desirable and lovely in the eyes

But wherein, you will say, does the Christian morality differ from the Pagan morality? Have not the heathen writers built theirs upon the same foundation? Have they not distinguished the several duties of it in the same manner? And have they not very strongly recommended that decorum of actions, which is so necessary to make virtue amiable? It is allowed, they have done all this: and yet the Christian morality may very justly claim the preference. The heathen sages laid their foundation well, when they established moral virtue upon truth. They would have done still better, could they have told us what truth was, and where it was to be found. But this they could not do, because they never discovered it themselves in many points of the greatest importance. They were shamefully ignorant in the first principle and ground-work of all morality. For it is certain, that the best and wisest of them never arrived at such true notions of the Deity, as to think idolatrous worship unlawful. They offered sacrifices to false gods, according to the rites of their country, and were all idolaters—I do not except the great Socrates himself—they were all idolaters to a man. One sect of philosophers, of which many who had the greatest influence of power and authority professed themselves to be, absolutely rejected the providence of God: and those who allowed it, seem to have had but very dark and contracted notions of its real operation and constant interposition in all human events. Their notions of morality were likewise in other respects very imperfect or erroneous. Conceit and pride, angry disputation and envious competition, and a furious contention for victory rather than truth, were virtues among the learned in the heathen world; whilst those of meekness and humility, so ornamental to human nature, and so agreeable to the condition of it, had no place either in their systems or their practice. On the contrary, a quick sense and resentment of injuries, and even a spirit of revenge, if not carried into execution by any mean and base methods, were deemed the marks of a noble mind.

And in some cases and persons, that sacrilegious impiety of self-murder was applauded as the most heroical action. Then as to the vices of impurity; it is amazing, how licentious they were both in principle and practice, to the disgrace of human nature. Even the great Athenian legislator, when he restrained only the slaves of his community from the commission of the most unnatural and abominable of all vices, virtually permitted a free indulgence in it to the citizens, and established this great iniquity by law.

Very different from this is the truth, as it is in Jesus. He modelled his system of morality by the invariable standard of truth—the perfect will of God. By making this fully known to us, he has secured the worship of the one true God upon the basis of a rational piety, in spirit and in truth. He hath comforted and sustained us by the assurance of our being, every moment of our lives, under the kind and constant care of God's watchful providence; without whose notice not a sparrow falleth unto the ground, and by whom the hairs of our head are all numbered. He hath taught us to extend our benevolence to enemies, as well as friends; to submit ourselves one to another; and to give the honour that is due to all men. He has laboured to inspire his disciples with the most perfect and exalted charity towards one another; a love that reaches to heaven as well as earth, and is the beginning of an eternal union, which neither death nor time can dissolve. Nor is there any virtue that can contribute to the real happiness of society, or to the inward peace and tranquillity of our own minds, that does not make a part of his divine religion. Resignation, contentment, humility, forgiveness, forbearance, meekness, gentleness, and goodness; every ornament of a quiet and inoffensive, unoffended spirit, is taken into the Christian morals. They give a perfection to every other virtue that can be named, and refine all the duties we owe to God, to man, and to ourselves. And hence we may observe, that the becoming and pleasing gracefulness of the good Christian's demeanour is not acquired from rules of decorum, that reach only to outward appearances, and teach the art of behaviour; but it springs from the very spirit of his religion, and grows upon the mild and gentle virtues that are peculiar to it as its natural fruit.

There is yet one thing more to be added, that must shew the perfection and sublimity of the Christian scheme of morality above any other, which is, that it has a respect to man, not merely as an inhabitant of this world, but as a citizen of heaven. It is for this reason, that it takes in many virtues as essential and ornamental to the Christian life, which were very little esteemed by the most moral heathens. Nor indeed could it be expected, that such virtues as consist in a generous disregard and contempt for the things of this world; in the mortification of our appetites; in the forgiveness of injuries upon a principle of religion, and many others, should be adopted by those, whose languid and uncertain hopes in a future state, left them too much under the influence of an attachment to the honours, riches, or pleasures, of this present life. Whereas the sure prospect of eternity, that animates every sincere believer in Christ, not only shews the reasonableness and propriety of those virtues, but makes them practicable, easy, and delightful. The contemplation of the infinite mercy and love of God, so eminently displayed to him in his redemption, carries him with irresistible motives to the practice of every moral duty, and every Christian grace; that can purify his nature, and refine his manners; so as to make him a fit companion for angels and glorified saints in heaven, where the beauty of holiness is perfect without spot or blemish, and its everlasting happiness as complete as the presence of God can make it.

The Reality and Efficacy of the ordinary Operations of the Holy Spirit.

[Preached before the University of Oxford, at Christ Church, June 1, 1766.]

JOHN, iii. 8.

The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it cometh and whither it goeth: so is every one that is born of the Spirit.

It has been observed, that there is something obscure, and seemingly abrupt in the conversation which our blessed Lord held with Nicodemus, as related in this chapter. But if we can discover the intention of this eminent Pharisee in coming to our Lord, the obscurity will probably vanish, and the connection of this whole discourse, with the declaration that occasioned it, will be evident. We may reasonably suppose, that it was not a vain curiosity, but a serious desire of getting information in a matter of real importance, that induced Nicodemus to pay this secret and cautious visit. At the first interview, this ruler of the Jews, this member of the great sanhedrim, or council, bears an honest testimony to the reality and greatness of our Saviour's miracles, as a thing indisputable; and he proceeds to draw the necessary conclusion arising from those miracles — that he must be a teacher come from God. You see, he acknowledges him to be a prophet; and the general expectation which prevailed at this time of the coming of that great one, together with the evidence of such mighty works, might naturally incline him to suspect that Jesus was the person. But he came, doubtless, with the prejudices of his countrymen about him; and could not discover those marks of royalty, which they imagined would peculiarly distinguish their great deliverer, who was to restore the kingdom unto Israel. Our Saviour seems to understand him, as if he meant, to put the same question to him, under this uncertainty of mind, as was asked by John's disciples — Art thou he that should come, or do we look for another? He does not indeed satisfy him as to this point directly, but endeavours to enable him to give an answer to himself, by explaining to him the spiritual nature of that kingdom he was going to erect. And, at the same time, he expresses his surprise, that a master of Israel should want to be informed, that a more plentiful effusion of the divine spirit was to be a characteristic of the Messiah's reign. Except a man, saith he, be born again, he cannot see, he can neither discern nor be partaker of, the kingdom of God. The Pharisee misunderstanding the expression of being born again, our Saviour thus explains it to him: except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, except he be born again, or hath his nature renewed by that cleansing spirit which washeth and purifieth from sin, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God; that kingdom which is begun in this world by virtue, righteousness, and peace, and will be completed in the next by perfect holiness and happiness. He goes on to this effect: Mistake me not; I speak not of a natural birth, but a spiritual one; for that which is born of the flesh is flesh, frail and perishing, subject to dissolution and death; but that which is born of the spirit is spirit, of heavenly extraction, the immediate creature of God, and heir of immortality. I see you marvel at this, and want to be instructed in the manner of this new birth. It is very discernible in its effects, though the cause is not seen: that aerial spirit, called the wind, will illustrate to you the working of the true divine spirit: The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof but canst not tell whence it cometh, and whither it goeth: so is every one that is born of the Spirit. Thou perceivest the gentle murmurs and breathings of the wind; thou feelest the refreshment of it; thou knowest its salutary influence, that it keeps the air sweet, and purges it from noxious and putrifying vapours: but in what manner its motion begins, what progress it takes, how, and when, and where, it arises and subsides, that thou knowest not, and canst not explain. The same kind of operation hath the Spirit of God. The inspiration of it flows like the soft and warm breezes of the air: it refreshes the soul with peaceful and pleasing thoughts; it keeps the conscience pure and undetiled, and preserves it from the pestilential contagion of sin. All this may be perceived and felt; but in what way the influences of the Spirit are derived to men; how the workings of it begin in the mind; or to what height and force they may arise; how far it may carry them with a prosperous gale, or where it may cease and expire; the author of it best knows, but thou canst not discover. But though we know not the manner and extent of the operation, we may with certainty find out the cause: we may know by the effects what the cause is; for whether it be in the natural or spiritual world, the primary and never-ceasing cause of every good production is God.

In this text of scripture, which I have commented upon, it was our Saviour's design to give an illustration of the ordinary agency and gifts of the Holy Ghost; for it represents the state of every one that is born of the Spirit; of every regenerate person or true believer. When the extraordinary gifts of the same Divine Spirit were poured, on the day of Pentecost, upon the apostles, they were attended with a rushing mighty wind, which filled the place where they sat. In this case, the gifts themselves being of an uncommon nature, the manner of their communication was so, too. But, in the ordinary dispensations of grace, there is no alarming demonstration of it from without, and every thing within is calm and quiet. And therefore the operation of it is compared to the gentle spirations of the air; for the original word, where there is no adjunct expressive of force, does not properly denote its violent and tempestuous commotions.

It will be the business, then, of this discourse, to treat of the ordinary operations and gifts of the Holy Spirit of God: and, in doing this, I shall,

First, Shew the reality and efficacy of them: and then I shall add some observations that may be of use in the consideration of this subject.

The inquiry, you will observe, is not how, or with what manner of agency, the Spirit of God works upon our spirit, but whether it does really work upon it or not. The connection between causes and effects is often viable and certain, where we are totally ignorant of the operation of the one, or the production of the other. This is universally the case in all the appearances of nature. We know the natural principles that produce vegetation; but how they produce it we cannot comprehend or explain. We know that light gives form and colour to the creation, and that sounds are conveyed by the vibrations of the air; but how they occasion these different sensations, reason and learning are at a loss to account for. We know, by the most certain experience of what passes within ourselves, that the mind acts upon the body, and the body upon the mind, and yet philosophy will not take upon itself to give us any conception how either of these acts upon the other. And why may not spirit act upon spirit, as well as upon body? Nor can it be any objection to the reality of this action, that we are ignorant how it is performed. And surely the Spirit of God may act upon the spirit of man, though the mode of his operation in the spiritual as well as the material world may be very remote from our conception. In truth, it is altogether as unphilosophical as it is irreligious, to imagine that the universal Infinite Spirit, which created all things, which sustains all things, and which is as intimately present to every being as that being is to itself, cannot, or does not, influence, direct, impel, or controul, according to the purposes of his own divine providence, every creature of his own, which only lives, and moves, and has his being in him.

None of the wiser heathens have ever called in question the possibility of the agency of the Divine Spirit upon the human mind; and some of the virtuous ones have acknowledged its reality in the direction of their thoughts and inclinations. The patriarchs before the law, and the prophets under the law, had communications of it in an extraordinary manner; and they likewise professed their dependence upon it as their ordinary guide and support. But, under the dispensation of the gospel, the gifts and graces of it are shed abroad in a more diffusive manner; they are imparted to every sincere believer in Christ, nor can any man be a real Christian, who has not an intimate union with this heavenly companion. The declarations of the scriptures upon this point are so frequent, determinate, and clear, as to leave no room for doubt or mistake. The true Christian, you will there find, from the beginning to the end of his conversation, is led by the hand of God; is assisted, guided, and forwarded, in all his thoughts and actions, by his holy Spirit; he advances by the power of grace to the kingdom of glory, and can make no progress in his journey, any farther than he is conducted, animated, and supported by this divine comforter and assistant.

Let us proceed to consider more particularly the efficacy of this spirit of grace; and we shall find, that its operations are directed to such purposes as are most necessary for our condition, and most conducive to our happiness. The state of the natural unregenerate man is represented in scripture to be a state of enmity with God. And the causes assigned for his being alienated from God are, the ignorance that is in him, and wicked works. His understanding being darkened and perverted, he does not sufficiently apprehend and consider the law that is to direct his conduct, nor attend to the obligations of it; and his passions and appetites being unsubdued, he is led captive by them, and made a slave to sin, even against the knowledge which he has, and under the condemnation of his own mind. In this unhappy state, the Spirit of God is graciously pleased to interpose, and converts him, as it were, into a new creature, by enlightening his understanding, and reducing his affections into due subjection and order. I shall enlarge upon each of these points.

It is evident from fact, that human reason, under its best cultivation and improvement, was never able to arrive at a complete knowledge of the perfect law of God. This knowledge has, however, been graciously communicated to the world by the extraordinary manifestation of the Divine Spirit, which inspired the teachers of Christianity with wisdom and understanding, to declare the whole counsel of God in the redemption of mankind, and which bore a divine testimony to the truth of their doctrines by many wonderful works. But this revelation never had, nor ever can have, any salutary effect but upon minds prepared to receive it. And the operation of the same Divine Spirit is still necessary to enlarge and qualify our understanding for the discernment of spiritual truths, and of the excellency of the gospel of Christ: it is necessary to dispel those clouds of ignorance and prejudice that intercept the view of heavenly objects, and to correct that pride and self-sufficiency, which, by making us wise in our own conceits, more effectually fortifies us in error. At the publication of the gospel, not many wise men, not many learned, were called to the profession of it. Their wisdom and learning were a bar to their conversion, which could not take place, so long as it depended upon reasoning from their own principles. For the cross of Christ was a stumbling-block to the Jews, and foolishness to the Greeks; and nothing but the special grace of God, imparted by his Spirit, could extinguish those false lights which misled them in their search after truth, and opened their understanding to the perception of the power and wisdom of God. The same pride of an unenlightened understanding, refusing and setting at nought the assistance and direction of this divine counsellor, will always disqualify it from making any progress in religious knowledge, and will render the best natural intellectual abilities not only useless to the possessors of them, but in the highest degree mischievous to themselves and to mankind. Of this a late dogmatical writer will furnish us with a striking example. The natural powers of his understanding seem to have been of superior growth and strength; these were enlarged by an extensive knowledge of philosophy, history, and mankind; and this knowledge has been communicated to the world with great force of language and confidence of assertion. And where have these great carried him? Even into the very dregs and sink of atheism.—“To ascribe to God the moral attributes of holiness, justice, and goodness, is, with him, enthusiasm and blasphemy; that God exercises any special providence over his creatures, or has any regard to the events that befall individuals, is folly to believe; that man should survive his dissolution by death, and that there is, on the other side of the grave, a future state of retribution, is an idle tale, which has no real foundation in nature or reason.”

Had the least ray of the Divine Spirit enlightened the understanding of this daring writer, could he possibly have prostituted it to the contrivance and support of a wretched system of such abominable and exploded absurdities as these? In instances of this nature, we see that the pride of reason, which disdains to submit to be directed by the light of Heaven and the admonitions of grace, prevents its apprehension of the most clear and evident truths, even of natural religion; much less will it suffer itself to embrace those divine truths which are made known by revelation only.

Great reason, therefore, had St. Paul to pray, as he often prays in behalf of his converts, that God would enlighten their minds and understanding; that he would increase their knowledge; that he would give them a right judgment in all things.

And here I shall just stop to observe, that the apostle is so far from denying men the use of their reason in religious matters, that he prays for the improvement of its faculties for their greater proficiency in them; knowing, that they will see farther and better into the things pertaining to their salvation, if it shall please God to give them a sober understanding, to increase their portion of it, to assist them in the exercise and application of it, and dispose them to delight in the attainment of religious knowledge.

And I must further observe, that Christianity is so far from declining an appeal to reason, in the examination of its proofs and doctrines, that it requires the most perfect and unbiassed exercise of it, to know its nature and value: and where the mind is most enlightened, the communications of real knowledge most extensive, and judgment most discerning, there it will always be best understood, and most willingly embraced.

But I proceed to consider the operations of the Spirit, as they are concerned in the regulation of the passions and appetites. Now the Spirit of God influences the mind of man, not only by giving light to the understanding, by restraining it within the proper limits of its powers, by directing its application to the pursuit of religious knowledge, and by giving it that steadiness and complacency which arises from a well-grounded conviction of the truth, importance, and excellence of the gospel of Christ; but it likewise gives vigour to its authority, by reducing the inferior faculties, which are so apt to disturb its operations, into due subordination and obedience; it bends the will and subdues the affections to submit to its commands. This St. Paul, in his description of the unregenerate Jew or heathen, in the seventh chapter of his epistle to the Romans, represents to be a thing impossible to be done by the mere powers of nature; and even a Christian must have been trained up and practised in the discipline of the gospel, and, through the constant supplies and increase of grace, must have made great progress in his profession, before he can put his reason in quiet possession of its dominion, and reduce his irregular passions to pay a ready obedience to it without pain or reluctance. In the case both of the unregenerate heathen and undisciplined Christian, the law of righteousness arising from the will of God is supposed; and that the understanding is capable of discovering the excellency and obligation of it, though in different degrees. But the misfortune is, that the actions of men are not always regulated by the conviction of the understanding. The passions and sensual appetites overbear its authority, and despise its commands; and man pays an obedience to the law of sin, at the very time that he disapproves and condemns it in his own conscience. He owns the authority of his true and natural Lord, and yet pays obedience to an usurper and a tyrant. He knows the commands of the one to be reasonable, and subjection to his rule and government to be honourable; this subjection he refuses to pay, and at the same time submits to the arbitrary and debasing sway of the most cruel master. He approves the law which he violates, and obeys the law which he condemns. Captivated and enthralled by his lusts, he rebels against his own reason and understanding, and all the while that he is the slave of sin, he is the approver and admirer of virtue. There cannot be a state of more complete and miserable servitude than this. And what can deliver us from this wretched captivity? Nothing can do this but the mercy of God, vouchsafed to us through the redemption which is in Christ Jesus, and the effectual assistance of his Holy Spirit, which alone can give us victory in this unequal contest. Accordingly, by the mighty power of the Spirit of life, the complete and real Christian is represented to be made free from the law of sin and death. There is no longer any conflict between the law of his mind and the law in his members. Passion and appetite are contented to pay due homage and obedience to the superior faculty of the understanding; they aim not to force or to seduce it to rebel against duty. All the powers within him act in their proper sphere and regular order. He knows the will of God, and it is his comfort and delight to obey it. He walks uniformly on in the ways of virtue and peace, without disturbance or weariness, and safely arrives at his journey's end, with the near prospect of immortality before him.

Now, if the unregenerate heathen, when destitute of the divine grace, and the imperfect Christian, who undervalues and rejects its aid, cannot pay a due obedience to the law of righteousness, though they own its authority, and approve its excellence; and if the same persons, when converted to a truly Christian life, are enabled, by that assistance, only to pay such a regular obedience to the law of God, as will be accepted by him, and will be rewarded with eternal happiness; then it is plain, that to order the unruly wills and affections of sinful men, which are our great seducers, and carry us astray from our duty, is strictly and properly the work of the Spirit of God; and that all our proficiency in goodness is as much owing to his grace, as the reward of our obedience is to his mercy.

The scriptures have not only given us a general assurance of the operation and influence of this Divine Spirit, both upon the understanding and affections, but they have moreover specified various particulars, wherein he has engaged and promised his assistance, if we are willing to receive this heavenly guest into our hearts, to listen to his silent admonitions, and to be directed by his wholesome counsels. He will further us in all our religious undertakings; will settle us in the true knowledge and faith of Christ; will lift up our thoughts and desires to Heaven; will help our devotion, and give wings to our prayers. He will direct us in our doubts; comfort us in our afflictions; support us in our troubles; fortify us against temptations; give us strength and courage in trials and persecutions; and will arm us against the fear of death. Where he finds a ready disposition to receive him, and an honest and upright heart, he will come, and will make his abode with us, and will be our companion, our guard, our comforter. We shall feel and confess the enlivening presence of this Holy Spirit in the peace of conscience, in an unruffled composure and serenity of mind, in having a delight in virtue, in the possession of all those Christian graces that purify and refine the soul, in the assurance of God's favour, and in hopes full of immortality. These are the blessed effects which the scriptures, in various passages, attribute to the Holy Spirit of God; and these effects the pious and good Christian, who is led by the Spirit, does, according to the measure and proportion of it, most undoubtedly feel. And although he may not be at all times equally sensible of his presence and consolation, yet, so long as he continues in the fear and love of God, and the regular practice of his duty, he may be assured that this divine guide has his residence still with him, and that he will not leave him nor forsake him.

It now remains that I make an observation or two, that may be of use to us in the consideration of this subject.

And first, I observe, that the operations of the divine grace are consistent with the free exercise of our own natural faculties. God having given us understanding and freedom of will, deals with us, in the communication of his Spirit, as rational and free agents; and whatever additional strength he may give us in the use of our faculties, he does not supersede the faculties themselves, nor take away the use of them. Because God worketh in us both to will and to do of his own good pleasure, is no reason why we should sit still in a state of indolence and quietism, and do nothing for ourselves; but it is the very reason given by the apostle, why we should endeavour to work out our own salvation. If our minds are enlightened, our knowledge increased, and our judgment corrected by the Spirit of God, he designs, no doubt, that we should make a proper use of these advantages, and bend the whole force of our understanding thus improved, to make the divine law our incitation and study, and to advance in that knowledge, which will make us wise unto salvation. If he puts the reins of our passions and appetites into our hands, it is with an intention that we should make use of them; and if he gives us an inward conviction, that all his laws are holy, and just, and good; if he makes our obedience to them practicable and easy, and annexes to the regular performance of our duty that delight and joy which the good Christian only can feel, and the spirit of consolation inspire; then, doubtless, he gives us this assistance and encouragement, not to make us careless and remiss in running the race that is set before us, but to call forth all our powers, under the animating confidence, that the strength which we want the Spirit of Grace will supply. And there cannot be a stronger motive to induce us to summon the little strength that we have, and to set forward, with all our might, in the way that leadeth unto life, than the assurance that we can depend upon greater strength than our own, which will invigorate our weakness, and carry us successfully to our journey's end.

I observe, secondly, that the production of the fruits of the Spirit is the only sure evidence we can have or give, of our being under the power and direction of it. It appears, that in the communication of the ordinary gifts of the Spirit, which every true Christian partakes of, there is no outward sensible operation; there is neither a rushing mighty wind to be heard nor cloven tongues of fire to be seen. It acts silently and invisibly, and is only felt in the comfort and refreshment it gives to the soul, and discovers itself by the effects which it produces. What those are, the scriptures have told us, namely, love, joy, peace, in all goodness, righteousness, and truth; with gentleness, faith, meekness, temperance—all the enlivening, mild, and pleasing virtues that belong to the Christian life. And to these they every where refer us, for the evidence of the Spirit, and not to feelings which are occasioned by the passionate emotions of an over-heated imagination or enthusiastic phrenzy.—They give us no intimations of any other feelings, but what arise from a delight in God's commandments, from peace of conscience, from a present sense of God's favour and support, and from well-grounded hopes of everlasting happiness hereafter. These are the feelings of a reasonable nature, which do not tempestuously agitate the mind, but give it a serene composure; which do not overwhelm its faculties, but assist them; which do not play upon the imagination, and transport it with fanatical ecstasies, but fill the heart with a rational comfort and sober joy. Is any one then desirous to know, whether he is truly under the guidance and power of the Divine Spirit, let him examine his own state, and inquire, whether he finds in himself a sincere desire of doing the will of God, and an ability to put in practice the duties of his profession; and whether his mind be at peace with God and with itself;—and, the answer will determine the point. If he believes in the Lord Jesus Christ with all his heart, and relies solely upon his merits for the remission of his sins, and his acceptance with God; if he sincerely desires to do God's will, and takes a delight in doing it; if he is punctual and regular in the discharge of the duties of his religion; if he keeps himself free from presumptuous and habitual sins, and guards himself, as much as possible, from those of infirmity and surprise, and is grieved and penitent on the commission of them; if upon an impartial review of his present state his conscience condemns him not, he feels no guilty upbraidings and remorse, but is full of consolation and holy hope—we may then venture to pronounce, upon the surest evidence, that he is guided by the Spirit of God, and is in a state of grace.

The third, and last observation I shall make, is this:—That great care is necessary on our parts to secure the continuance of the divine assistance of the Spirit of Grace, as it is possible that we may be deserted by it, and fall in the end from the life and hopes of a Christian. The holy scriptures, in the various representations they give of a Christian state, always suppose that this may be the case. When the Christian is resembled to one that runs in a race, that he may obtain the prize, he is exhorted to a resolute perseverance in his course, and is cautioned not to stop or faint by the way. St. Paul tells us, that even he himself constantly used the same degree of discipline, and laboured to invigorate himself by spiritual exercises, with the same care and anxiety as they shewed who endeavoured to prepare themselves for the Olympic races, lest he might after all be a cast-away, and fall short of the prize. When the state of a Christian is likened to that of an heir, who is born to the inheritance of a great possession, it is still supposed that he may defeat his own claim. For an heir is not in actual possession, nor will he be put into it, if he ever cancels his title by such acts of disobedience as the law declares to be a forfeiture of it. Nay, where the Holy Spirit is represented to have set his seal to the conveyance, it is not even then irrevocable: for St. Paul, when writing to the Ephesians, he tells them, they were sealed by the Spirit of God to the day of redemption, in the very same passage supposes, that the seal might be torn off, and their inheritance forfeited. Otherwise, he would not have cautioned them against grieving the Holy Spirit of God, if it had now been no longer in their power to offend or provoke him; nor could the Spirit be grieved by those who could not commit sin, which is the only thing that could give them certain assurance of their final salvation. In truth, the condition of human life is inconsistent with such assurance; for it is, in every stage of it, as it is represented by the scriptures to be, a state of trial and probation; it is impossible it can be a state of absolute security. And indeed the presumption of such security would be the most likely thing in the world to defeat itself. A persuasion, that we had already won the prize, before our race was finished, would naturally cause in us that remissness, which would be the very occasion of our losing it. It will better become our condition, and contribute more to our safety, to believe, that so long as we are in a state of mortality we are in a state of danger—beset with many powerful enemies, who, if they cannot seduce us by other temptations, will endeavour to puff us up with spiritual pride; and, by giving us false conceptions of the gifts we may possess, will make them the very instruments of our destruction. Happy are we, if we have sufficient assurance of God's protection and favour in our present state, to make our minds easy and contented. This we may have, as long as we delight in his commandments, and pay a regular obedience to his laws: but such assurance as may be likely to carry us into carelessness and disobedience, would be inconsistent with God's wisdom to give, and our own prudence to desire. And therefore whatever measure of his grace it may please God to impart to any one, it will always be his interest and duty, were he the most perfect man upon earth, to pray for the continuance and increase of it; knowing, that he can have no security for his perseverance, but from the divine assistance and support, and that he, and he only, who perseveres unto the end, will be saved.

Faith the Basis of all Christian Virtues.

[Preached before the University, of Oxford, at Christ Church, April 29, 1770.]

2 PET. i. 5, 6, 7.

Add to your faith, virtue; and to virtue, knowledge; and to knowledge, temperance; and to temperance, patience; and to patience, godliness; and to godliness, brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness, charity.

IN these words the apostle has connected, in a regular and artificial gradation, all the several virtues that form the life, and complete the character, of a Christian. They are not thrown together in a confused and disorderly manner, but are judiciously placed in a proper and well-disposed arrangement. The first link of the chain is fixed to the throne of God; and the rest hang by each other, supporting, and being supported by those to which they are immediately joined. This orderly assemblage is suggested to us by the etymology of the word ἡτοιμασμένη; which imports something more than the bare addition of one virtue to another; it denotes the introduction of them in concert with, and in aid of each other, so as to form a complete circle or crown of virtues; for so is the word χορηγία (χορηγία—κύριος, εὐαγγελιστής. Hesych.) explained by Hesychius. The truth of this representation will appear, by taking an accurate view of the virtues enumerated in my text, in the order in which they lie.

I. The first in the catalogue is faith; which is laid down by the apostle as the principle upon which all that follow, in a due subordination, depend. But as we must be cautious and careful in establishing a principle, which is made the great support of all the essential duties of Christianity, it concerns us to avoid all mistakes in our notions of it; and the more so, as faith is known to be a word that bears different senses in the New Testament. Without inquiring what sense it does not bear in my text, I shall lay before you that which it does; and that you may be sure it is the true one, St. Peter himself shall explain it to you.

In the first verse of this chapter, he makes mention of the faith, which is common to all true Christians, to whom he says it is alike precious; i. e. it equally entitles them to its valuable claims and privileges; not through their own righteousness, but through the righteousness of God, and of our Saviour Jesus Christ. The object of this faith, he tells us at the third and fourth verses, are the exceeding great and precious promises, assured to us by the power of God, through the knowledge of Christ, by which we are called to glory and virtue, and are thereby made partakers of the divine nature. He then enumerates the virtues which are dependent upon this faith; and exhorts the brethren to use all diligence to make their calling and election sure, by the practice of them; the never-failing consequence and reward of which, will be an entrance into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

We find the same notion of faith in St. Peter's first epistle. At the third verse of the first chapter, he describes the state of Christians to be that of those, whom God, by his abundant mercy, had begotten again unto a lively hope, through the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for us. The joys of heaven are here represented to be the objects of a Christian's hope. But hope has its foundation in faith; and the objects of both must be the same: for we must believe a thing to be attainable, before we can hope to attain it. They are accordingly, at the twenty-first verse, both joined together, and stand upon the same foundation, that of Christ's resurrection. For we are there said to believe in God, who raised up Jesus from the dead, and gave him glory, that our faith and hope might be in God. And, at the ninth verse, he expressly declares the end, or ultimate aim of our faith to be the salvation of our souls. By this it appears, that the faith, which is the foundation of virtue, is a firm reliance upon the promises of God, for the enjoyment of a blessed immortality made known to us by the revelation of the gospel, procured through the righteousness, and assured to us by the resurrection, of our Saviour Jesus Christ.

This is the true faith of a Christian, to which all the great and precious promises of the gospel belong. All other intermediate acts of faith are subordinate to this, which is the ultimate end and perfection of the gospel; and they have no value, but as they lead to, and center in, this great and operative principle of religion. For although we believe Jesus to be the Messiah foretold and described in the ancient prophecies; though we believe him to be the eternal Son of God, whose power was made manifest to the world in signs and wonders and mighty works; though we receive the gospel as an authentic relation of his life and words and actions;—yet if these acts of faith did not open to us the prospect of everlasting life, and direct our views and hopes towards the happiness of heaven, our faith would be a mere speculative amusement in matters wherein we had no concern, and from which we could receive no possible advantage. The ultimate faith of a Christian therefore is that which terminates in the promises of God, and the glory which is hereafter to be revealed.

II. The apostle having thus laid the basis of the Christian life in faith, he then directs us how to raise upon it the structure of moral virtue. Add to your faith, virtue. Some expositors considering, that the original word ἀρετή often denotes military virtue, which consists in bravery and fortitude, and that the Christian state is properly represented to be a state of warfare, have confined it to this sense. And the connection is well preserved by it. For in times of trial and conflict, courage and constancy are necessary supports to faith. But others, and I think truly, understand it in its more common and general sense; in which it is used by St. Paul, on a similar occasion, in his epistle to the Philippians, chap. iv. ver. 8. where he recommends virtue at large, and distinguishes the several branches of it in the very same manner as St. Peter in my text will be found to do.

The connection between faith and the general practice of virtue needs no illustration. For since faith is a religious reliance upon the promises of God, for the future possession of a blessed immortality, made known to us by the revelation of the gospel, and procured for us through the merits of Christ; and since the same gospel declares holiness and virtue to be the express conditions upon which the promises of God are founded; it is evident, that faith cannot be divided from virtue; for it is not the faith of the gospel, nor is it entitled to the rewards of it, if it be barren and unfruitful in the works of righteousness. And in this connection the Christian morality has a support, which was wanting in all the moral systems of the philosophers. They defined virtue, and distinguished the several species of it, with great exactness; they found it to be consonant to nature and reason; and from this consideration alone they deduced our obligations to the practice of it. But was nature so pure, or reason so perfect, as to want no additional enforcements in support of virtue against the corruption of the one, or the weakness and instability of the other? This great omission the gospel has supplied; and the exercise of faith, which fixes our dependence upon the promises of God, and our views upon the happiness of heaven, will keep us steady and immovable in the paths of virtue, so long as we lose not sight of the great recompense of its reward.

III. Knowledge is next introduced; in order to make our faith and virtue complete. This is properly an intellectual endowment, but yet, in the application of it, partakes of a moral nature. For we must know and understand our duty before we can practise it. Knowledge has respect both to faith and virtue; and the wrong and imperfect notions that have been entertained concerning each of these, and which have been very injurious to religion, shew the necessity of our being furnished with it in matters both of belief and practice. We must know the nature and object of our faith; otherwise it will be an erroneous and deceitful guide; we must know the foundation of it, or the grounds upon which it is built, otherwise it will not be rational; we must know the inseparable connection that faith has with virtue, otherwise it will be vain and useless. Knowledge is no less necessary to give us right apprehensions of the nature and power of virtue. Knowledge, in general, is acquired by the contemplation of truth, and consists in an adequate perception of it. It is necessary, therefore, to enable us to distinguish real virtue from that which is only such in opinion, and to fix the precise boundaries of moral truth and falsehood. For want of this, many qualities and actions have been deemed virtuous, which, in truth, are of a contrary nature, and have been as detrimental and mischievous to mankind as the worst of vices.—And knowledge likewise, which is the mother of prudence, is what must regulate the virtues themselves. It is this which fixes them at their true point, that golden mean where all the virtues arrive at their perfection; for if they fall short of this, or go beyond it, they lose their name and nature.—But the knowledge we gain from revelation will carry us further. Having enlarged our views, and improved our discernment, in the contemplation of virtue, by laying the foundation of it in religion, it has strengthened its obligation, refined its nature, and extended its branches.—Place the principle of virtue, as the heathen moralists did, in the rectitude and decorum of action, and in social relation only, making it to depend upon the sense of right and wrong, and temporal advantage or disadvantage, of worldly praise or blame; or, superadd to these motives, which the gospel does by no means reject, the fear of God, and a reliance upon his promises for the certain and inestimable rewards of virtue in a future state; and our obligations to the practice of it will rise in the same proportion, as divine sanctions are superior to human.—The gospel has likewise refined and exalted the nature of virtue. For it is there represented as a transcript from him who is the great archetype of all goodness;

and it dignifies human nature by an assimilation to the divine. It resides in us the image of our Maker, by taking possession of the heart, and making it its repository. It extends to the regulation of our very thoughts and desires; for the seeds of corruption must be rooted out of our minds, before we can arrive at that state of virtuous perfection which the gospel requires.—But revealed knowledge has moreover introduced to our acquaintance a new train of the most amiable virtues, to which they must be strangers, whose actions are regulated, how wisely soever, by a regard to the relations and concerns of this life only. For when we have learned to consider ourselves as pilgrims and sojourners in this world, whose inheritance is in a better,—resignation to the will of God; complacency and humility; equality, unruffled by provocations and injuries; forbearance and forgiveness; meekness, gentleness, and goodness; contentment and patience; moderation of desires; and a generous contempt of every thing that interferes with our views and hopes of immortality; all these will be adopted by us, as the genuine virtues and the peculiar ornaments of the Christian state.

By these remarks it appears, that our knowledge of virtue must take in the consideration of its nature, obligation, and extent. In this last respect it will be of farther use to us, by giving us a distinct and comprehensive division of its several branches. For it is this distribution of the virtues, according to the rules of science, which forms them into a regular system, and at once lays open to our view the whole compass of moral duty. We are not at liberty to suppose, that the virtues which follow are introduced by the apostle in a careless and confused manner, when they are evidently classed under the general distinction of personal virtues, of those which have God for their object, and of such as relate to man. And there is no impropriety in giving the personal virtues the first place in the catalogue. For to know ourselves is the primary essential knowledge, upon which the knowledge of our relation to other beings, and the duties that arise from it, which take in the whole compass of morality, depend.

IV. The personal virtues are comprised under the general denomination of temperance and patience. The knowledge of ourselves will naturally lead us to temperance; or as the original word byadā properly signifies, the command and government of ourselves in the use and enjoyment of the good things of this life. For if we know that our passions and appetites are eager in the pursuit of such gratifications as are suited to their respective cravings, we know likewise that we are in possession of a superior faculty, whose business it is to watch over and controul their irregularities and excess. And we shall think it fit and right, that a blind impulse, which has no power of self-restraint, should be put under the conduct of reason. From knowing ourselves, we shall likewise know the advantages of a regular self-government. Our frame and constitution require it, in order to preserve the vigour and harmony of our faculties both in body and mind. It is this which gives us the true enjoyment of life, and is the parent of health, and peace, and joy.—Beyond this, the knowledge of ourselves supposes the knowledge of our origin and dependence; from which the personal virtues receive a stronger enforcement and obligation. For we must be accountable for our conduct to our Maker and Governor: and it is the will of him who made us rational creatures, that we should act agreeably to reason. So that it is not left to our own prudence and discretion, whether we will retain the command of ourselves or not, but it is a matter of strict duty; and whenever we deviate in our self-government from the rule of right reason, we transgress the law of God.—But this class of virtues is still further improved, and receives an additional force, by the knowledge we gain from revelation. For as we are thereby taught, that our bodies are the temples of the Holy Ghost, whose residence prepares and fits us for immortality, we must necessarily cleanse our hearts from all evil and corrupt affections, and furnish them with the virtues of temperance and sobriety, continence and chastity, moderation of desires and purity of thoughts, before they can be qualified for the reception of this heavenly guest, and be honoured with the habitation of God through the Spirit.

V. Were this world the constant and unvaried scene of a regular enjoyment of the blessings of life, temperance, in its comprehensive signification, would be the only personal virtue we should have occasion to put in practice. But the great and various troubles and misfortunes, incident to our nature and situation, have made patience a necessary and useful virtue. This is no other than the right government of ourselves in adversity, as temperance is in prosperity. In lighter afflictions the spirit of a man may sustain his infirmities; but when the trial is severe, how is this command of ourselves to be acquired; where is this difficult virtue of patience to be learned? Our natural fortitude will fail us, when it has itself no support; when we look around us, and there is no remedy to be found without; when we search our own spirit, and there is no consolation from within. Our sufferings will beat down the powers of nature and reason, and sink us into the miseries of despair. Nevertheless, our case is not desperate; there is still a remedy to be found in patience; but it must be in Christian patience; and this is no where to be learned but in the rudiments of the gospel. For the good Christian is there taught to consider afflictions not merely as natural evils, but as the chastisements of our Heavenly Father, inflicted for the correction of sin, or for the trial and improvement of virtue. And when he sees afflictions in this light, a patient resignation to the will of God, a confidence in the divine protection, and a view to the increase of the recompence of his reward, will be his support and comfort, and make him more than conqueror in all the fiery trials of adversity.

VI. This shews the intimate connection and union that patience has with piety; and therefore godliness is next introduced by the apostle in its due place and order. The original word doxō denotes the reverence, adoration, and honour, we owe to the Supreme Being, on account of the several relations we stand in to him. The good centurion Cornelius is said to have been ~~not~~ a man of piety, and one that truly feared God. This is the character of a truly religious man. And therefore godliness, or the fear of God, (which is an equivalent expression,) comprehends all the offices of piety, all the religious duties which are due to God, as the Maker of all things, the Judge of all men, and the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. Christian knowledge has enlarged this branch of duty likewise; and made it more fruitful. The light of reason had discovered to those few, who would suffer themselves to be guided by it, the being and attributes of God, whom they found in his works, and acknowledged him to be their Father and Governor, Preserver and Benefactor. The duties arising from these relations are obvious, and easy to be deduced. And yet the fact is certain, that though they knew God, they honoured him not as God, neither obeyed him, nor did they worship him in the manner that the purity and holiness of his nature required. How much then are we indebted to the gospel, which has confirmed and published to the whole world the true principles of natural religion in this its primary and fundamental article; has taught us to pay a reasonable service to our Maker in spirit and in truth; and has moreover included all the virtues in that service, by making them duties, and referring the obligation of them to the Supreme Author of every good work? But the gospel has gone further, and has discovered to us a new relation we stand in to God, as our Redeemer. For all the duties (including those of a positive nature) which gratitude and affection can pay, in return for the most amazing instance of infinite mercy and love, as an offering acceptable to God, which purity of heart and fervour of devotion must sanctify, are bound upon us by the gospel, and make an essential part of Christian morality.

The virtues that follow and close the train are the social ones. And these have a necessary connection with piety; for he who loveth God must love his brother also. If we consider ourselves as Christians, and the children of God by adoption and grace, united by one spirit, under one common Lord and Master, partakers of the same redemption, and heirs of the same salvation, brotherly love and kindness cannot be separated from such an intimate relation and conjunction. And if we consider God as the common Father of mankind, who embraces all his children with the tenderness and affection of a father, and is kind even to the disobedient and unthankful, we must break the ties of our own relation to him, if we are not kind and tender towards those who are the children of God; if we do not cultivate a spirit of universal benevolence and charity. Add therefore to godliness, first of all, brotherly kindness—φιλανθρωπία, or the love of our Christian brethren. For this appellation, in the New Testament, appropriated to Christians.

VII. The relation that Christians stand in to one another produces so intimate an union, that it is compared by St. Paul to that which subsists between the members of the same natural body, wherein one common sensation is diffused throughout the whole, and if one member suffers, all the members suffer with it; and if one member rejoice, all the members rejoice with it. And our Saviour illustrates it by the union of the branches in a vine, which, deriving their sustenance from the same root, are all partakers of one common life. These comparisons shew, not only that it is unreasonable, but that it is unnatural and impossible, for those who are members of the body of Christ, and are actuated by the true spirit of his religion, ever to be wanting in fellow-feeling, in affection, and kindness towards their Christian brethren. For this reason, our blessed Saviour has declared love to be the distinguishing badge and characteristic of the Christian profession; so that he who divides his interest from that of the community, and breaks that bond of union which holds it together in one spirit, under one head, has in effect detached himself from it, and is no longer a branch of the same heavenly vine, no longer a member of the same spiritual body. The nature of this union is different from, and superior in kind to, any other. By the Spirit of Christ, which diffuses itself through all the members of this church militant and triumphant, it connects us not only with all his faithful followers upon earth, and with the blessed saints in heaven. It results from the relation that spirits immortal, joint heirs of one common salvation, have to each other, and is a spiritual and sacred union, which neither death nor time can dissolve.

VIII. But as an intimate union in separate societies, especially when they are distinguished by peculiar privileges and honours, is apt to produce a disregard and contempt of all other men, who have not the same pre-eminence of distinction, the Apostle has added charity, or universal benevolence, as a proper supplement to brotherly love; and with this he closes the catalogue of Christian virtues.—Charity, in this sense, comprehends all the social virtues which depend upon our relation to one another as men, connected by various ties in this life. And this relation, at the same time that it takes in all mankind, subsists betwixt Christians themselves. Hence arise the natural duties of parental, filial, and conjugal relation, and those which we owe to our neighbours, or to all men with whom we have any interest or concern. To these must perform all acts of humanity, benevolence, and kindness, as the relation is more near or remote, and as our respective situations and circumstances require. No clashing of interest, no difference of religious opinions, no distinctions of country or party, will exempt us from these. So general is the gospel law of good-will towards men, that it extends to our very enemies. It requires us to forgive their injuries, and as far as prudence, the guide of every virtue, will permit, to retaliate with beneficence. But the description given of charity by St. Paul will best shew the nature and extent of this virtue. Charity suffereth long and is kind; charity envieth not; charity vaunteth not itself; is not puffed up; doth not behave itself unseemly; seeketh not her own; is not easily provoked; thinketh no evil; rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth; beareth all things; believeth all things; hopeth all things; endureth all things. How extensive is this virtue, and how fruitful of blessings to mankind! It cuts up by the root all the causes of contention and mischief. It drives from the heart of man pride, hatred, and envy, impatience and anger, peevish animosities, suspicions and jealousies. It plants in the room of them, the love of truth and justice; integrity, equity, and moderation; kindness and forbearance; candour and condescension; a courteous disposition, and a decent and obliging behaviour. Thus does our religion endeavour to secure, by this excellent and comprehensive virtue of charity, the good order and peace and happiness of this world, whilst it opens to us the prospect of a better.

I have now gone through the several virtues enumerated in my text, which form a complete and perfect system of the Christian morality; and I have endeavoured to shew, that they are judiciously ranged, by an artificial gradation, in a regular and penance one upon another. It has indeed generally been allowed, that the Apostle's catalogue of virtues is complete; but I think sufficient attention has not been given to the propriety of their order and disposition. It has been my principal aim to do justice to the Apostle in this point, without offering any violence to the strict and proper sense of the words, or forcing them into an unnatural connection.

This connection may perhaps be further illustrated and confirmed, by comparing St. Peter's system of Christian morality with that of St. Paul's before mentioned, as he has given it us at the 8th verse of the 4th chapter of his epistle to the Philippians. In the foregoing chapter (vid. verse 9, 10, 11.) he has laid the same foundation of a Christian's life and conversation, as St. Peter has done, in faith: and, in like manner, he makes the glories of a future state the object of it. Upon this foundation he builds his system of moral virtues in the following order: Whatsoever things are true, and honest, and just, and pure; these we are to think upon and regard as the essential duties of Christianity: And whatsoever things are lovely and of good report, these are the ornamental graces of it. By truth St. Paul denotes the general nature of virtue; moral truth and virtue being one and the same thing. For truth in speculation is virtue in practice. And therefore knowledge, which consists in the perception and discovery of truth, is that which must lead us to virtue. He then resolves the general idea of virtue into its several species, comprised under the terms, honest, just, and pure. It would be impossible not to see that this division comprehends the three great branches of duty, which relate to God, to man, and to ourselves, did not the wrong translation of the word σεμνός (honest) mislead us, and preposterously introduce a very illogical distribution of the Apostle's subject. It properly denotes, in this place, whatsoever things are the object of religious veneration. For this acceptance of the word, we have the authority of Heathen, Jewish, and Christian writers, who frequently use it as an appellation belonging to the most solemn acts and mysteries of religion, to the laws, to the temple, and to the name of God. In this sense it answers to the σεβασμ of St. Peter. They are both derived from the same root; and though they both admit a latitude of construction, yet in their strict and original signification, which we have no reason to depart from, they are descriptive of some religious or devout act, performed with an intention to honour God thereby. The foundation therefore of virtue, and the division of it into its several species, is the same in both the Apostles. For though the words are different, yet in their extended sense they are of the same import. For as brotherly love and charity evidently oblige us to all acts of justice, so justice extends to all acts of brotherly love and charity; for all men have, in a due proportion, a strict right and claim to these; and it is an act of injustice not to pay them their dues, as different relations and circumstances require. And purity bears a sense equivalent to that of temperance. For all indulgences in pleasures of any kind, inconsistent with a regular self-government, are sensuality; and all sensuality, in the Scripture account, is impurity and pollution. And all the subordinate virtues will range themselves alike under the correspondent branches of the general division of each of the Apostle's systems. St. Paul indeed seems to have given his virtues an additional improvement, by requiring the embellishment of that decorum and grace which are necessary to make virtue amiable and attractive. But this improvement, though not expressed by St. Peter, is necessarily implied. For, in truth, it is an appendage inseparable from Christian virtue. For whosoever is possessed of the true spirit of Christianity, and duly cultivates the virtues that are peculiar to it, will, of course, have his mind and manners framed to gentleness and decency, to grace and goodness; and that behaviour, which is formed by the heart, and is the natural result of all those lovely virtues, which make up the train of charity, will have more genuine gracefulness in it, will be more engaging and amiable, than its counterfeit, which consists in appearances only, is acquired by art, and is oftentimes false and deceitful.

Thus have these two great Apostles, concurring in the same general plan, and in a similar disposition of the parts, raised upon a solid foundation a complete and beautiful structure of moral virtue in just symmetry and proportion. It is our duty, and it will be our happiness, to contemplate this regular and comprehensive system of virtues; to fix them in our memories and minds, and to transcribe them into our practice. There is a mutual connection betwixt them, and a dependence one upon another. We cannot leave a single virtue of the scale, without breaking the chain that reaches from heaven to earth, and by which we must ascend from earth to heaven. After we have washed away our sins by repentance, it is the integrity and uniformity of a virtuous conduct, that must raise us to Christian perfection, and entitle us to the prize of our high calling. We can build our hopes of it upon no other foundation, than that which is laid, namely, faith in Christ Jesus; and if faith is our guide to virtue, virtue will lead us to glory.

SERMON LXXV.

By Dr. TOTTIE.

A proper Resurrection of the Body, the primitive Faith of God's People from the earliest Ages.[Preached before the University of Oxford, at Christ Church, Feb. 16th, 1772.]

MATTHEW, xii. 31, 32.

But as touching the resurrection of the dead, have you not read that which was spoken unto you by God, saying, I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob? God is not the God of the dead, but of the living.

THE Sadducees, it is well-known, were a sect among the Jews who denied the resurrection of the dead. This error seems to have been founded in other wrong notions which they had adopted, namely, that no Scriptures had authority to establish any doctrines which were not contained in the writings of Moses; and that in these no discovery had been made of any resurrection. It appears, by St. Matthew's narrative, that some of this sect came to encounter our Saviour upon this point of doctrine; and imagined, no doubt, that they should puzzle him with an argument, which, according to their notions of a resurrection, seemed a very shrewd one. It was that of a woman having had seven husbands in her lifetime; the question was, whose wife she should be in the resurrection? Here again was another mistake; for they supposed that, if there was any such thing as another world, men would carry with them into it the same passions, appetites, and affections, as were natural to them in this; and that sensual gratifications were to make the chief part of their happiness there.

All these errors our blessed Lord, in his reply, takes upon him to correct. In doing this, he first lays open to them the source of their fundamental and capital mistake, in rejecting the doctrine of a resurrection. Ye do err, says he, not knowing the Scriptures, nor the power of God. Which words, with those that follow, may be thus illustrated: If God has power to raise the dead to life again, and has declared that he will raise them, then this article of faith is established upon a sure foundation. Of the former you can have no reasonable doubt; for to make a man originally out of the dust of the earth, and to raise him up again out of the same dust, are evidently similar acts of the same power. Of the latter you have the evidence not only of the Scriptures, which you reject in this case without cause, but even of those which you admit; as I shall presently shew you. In the mean time I must observe, that you are greatly mistaken in your notion of a resurrection. The relations which are necessary in this life will have no place in the next: the faculties of man will be there suited to his situation; and he will be like the angels of God in heaven, having undergone such a change both of soul and body, as will qualify him for the everlasting enjoyment of celestial happiness. And the reality of this future state, which you disbelieve, you may collect from the writings even of Moses himself. Consider the words which were spoken unto you, or for your information, by God, when he said, I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. These words certainly denote an eminent degree of God's favour and blessing bestowed, or intended to be bestowed, upon these patriarchs. But it does not appear that they were distinguished by worldly blessings in such a manner, as to give a reason to think them, in this respect, the peculiar favourites of Heaven. They had in this world as great a share of trouble and afflictions as other men. One of them in particular declared, in his old age, few and evil, or unhappy, have the days of my life been. The happiness, therefore, which these righteous men found not upon earth, must have been reserved for them in a better country, that is, an heavenly. Immortality must have been the object of their views, and the intended reward of their faith: for God is not the God of the dead, who had a short, temporal, painful existence; but of the living, who shall exist in happiness for ever.

Here then you have the great moral argument for a state of future retribution, arising from the insufficiency and defects of it in this life, confirmed and authenticated by the declaration of God himself. And we must allow the argument to be as clear as it is decisive for a future state of retribution. But the thing to be proved was, the resurrection of the body; of which the argument is not a direct proof, if the souls of men are supposed to survive them, and are capable of constituting such a self-conscious personality as will subject them to rewards or punishments hereafter. This, we know, was the opinion of some of the philosophers, who rejected the notion of a resurrection with scorn. To these, therefore, our Saviour's argument for it would have been by no means conclusive: but it was conclusive to those who thought the doctrine of a future state to be inseparably connected with that of the resurrection. And of the reality of this connection the Jews, at the time of our Saviour's appearance, were universally persuaded. And not only so, but the same persuasion had prevailed among the people of God, from the earliest ages of the world.

It will be no improper employment of our time, as it will be an illustration and confirmation of our Saviour's argument, if we endeavour to investigate the origin of this notion, and to learn what foundation it stands upon in holy writ.

It cannot, with any degree of probability, be supposed, that the doctrine of a resurrection took its rise from any imagination or conception of man. It is a thing contrary to all sense and experience. Death has reigned over all men from the beginning of the world, and will reign as long as the world shall endure. And of all that are gone down to the grave, no one ever was known to return, nor was it ever surmised that any will return, from any possible effort of nature. Nature indeed has furnished us with hopes, and reason with a persuasion, that the spirit will return unto God who gave it. But of the doctrine of the resurrection of the body, nature has no support, and reason is bewildered in the contemplation of it. We must therefore necessarily conclude, that the resurrection of the body, which nothing in nature could lead men to the discovery of, and therefore could make no principle of natural reli-
